169. In Africa, the Namibian people is still struggling to achieve its independence and its right to self-determination, despite all the efforts exerted by the international community, as well as the initiatives of the Secretary-General aimed at implementing Security Council resolution 435 (1978). This is the result of the intransigence of the apartheid régime in South Africa in its persistence in illegally occupying Namibia. It is crystal clear that the apartheid régime has used the negotiations conducted in the past few years to gain time and delay the implementation of that resolution by resorting to flimsy pretexts and prevarications, as well as manoeuvres aimed at diverting attention from the essence of the problem and impeding Namibia's accession to independence. Their latest manoeuvre was to inject a new element which is totally extraneous to the United Nations plan for the independence of Namibia: the linkage of independence to the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola, a matter considered as interference in the internal affairs of Angola that has been condemned by the international community. There is no doubt that South Africa is also trying to perpetuate the internal solution and sidestep SWAPO, the sole legitimate representative of the Namibian people, through the installation of a puppet régime in Namibia nurturing its interests as well as those of the colonial Powers that encourage the régime to persist in such a policy by providing it with assistance of all kinds. Hence South Africa has flouted the will of the international community and continued to occupy Namibia and part of the territory of Angola.

170. As for South Africa itself, the black citizens are still struggling to attain majority rule and eliminate the abhorrent system of apartheid. They expect increased assistance from the international community to secure their fundamental rights.

171. Lately, the racist régime has resorted to new methods to reinforce its policy through the establishment of a sham bicameral parliament for the Coloureds and those of Asian origins in an effort to spread disunion among various groups of people, and through the recruitment of Asians and Coloureds, using them in acts of suppression against their black brothers. The international community has not been deceived by this ploy. Both the General Assembly and the Security Council have rejected this attempt and have underlined the fact that the policy of apartheid is irreparable and should be eliminated altogether.

172. On this occasion the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya confirms that it is necessary to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions against the apartheid régime in South Africa in order to compel it to abandon its policy of apartheid and put an end to its illegal occupation of Namibia, thus enabling the peoples of the two territories to regain their rights to self-determination and independence.

173. Many other peoples are still struggling to attain independence and self-determination. The Palestinian people heads this list. This people is still displaced, leading a tragic life after its expulsion from its territory. So far, the United Nations has not been able to help it regain its right to self-determination, recover its territory and establish its own independent State, like the other peoples of the world.

174. Equally, the people of Puerto Rico is still struggling for its right to self-determination and decolonization. Its cause was the subject of lengthy debates by the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, in respect of which many resolutions were adopted, all affirming the right of this Territory to self-determination in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

175. Many other Territories all over the world are still colonized. In particular, I wish to address the subject of the Malvinas. Colonialism there should be eliminated and Argentine sovereignty upheld. The Comorian island of Mayotte should be restored to the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros. The military base on Diego Garcia should be dismantled and the Territory should be restored to Mauritius and its population returned to the island.

176. The administering Powers should safeguard the interests of the colonial Territories and their right to self-determination. The United States should also safeguard the interests of the peoples of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands and abide by their wishes. It should ensure the return of the population of Bikini to their island as soon as possible.

177. My delegation sincerely hopes that the efforts of the United Nations will soon be crowned with success. Those efforts are aimed at the speedy elimination of colonialism in all its traditional manifestations, such as the occupation of Territories, the domination of peoples, the usurping of their freedoms and the exploiting of their riches. The Organization could then apply itself to combating neocolonialism as embodied in political hegemony and in the imposition of economic and cultural dependence on weaker States and peoples—a practice that in recent years has widened in scope.

178. We have also recently witnessed neo-colonial aspirations to restore colonialism in and control over a number of small independent and non-aligned countries. Furthermore, there have been acts of military provocation and economic blackmail and threats of force by the big imperialist States against small countries, so as to intimidate them and undermine their development, impose economic hegemony over them and tie them to the wheel of colonialism. Last year one imperialist State occupied a small State, toppled its Government and placed it under its direct control.

179. The United Nations still has a long and arduous road before it in the area of decolonization. It must see to it that all necessary measures are taken in order to compel the colonialists who usurp the territories and the rights of peoples to withdraw from those territories and to respect the will of the peoples and their desire for self-determination and freedom.

180. The international community must remain vigilant with regard to the modus operandi of certain colonial States. The greater the pressure of international public opinion on them, the more they step up their manoeuvres allegedly aimed at a peaceful solution, in a desperate attempt to sidestep the genuine liberation movements and impose doubtful solutions that result in the installation of puppet Governments which safeguard the interests of the imperialist States and remain under their control.

181. The commitment of the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the cause of liberation and decolonization speaks for itself. That commitment stems from the conviction of the Libyan people that its freedom will not be complete as long as some peoples still languish under colonialism and racism and are denied their fundamental rights. My country stands by those colonial peoples in their struggle. We shall continue to give them material and moral support of all kinds until all the peoples gain their freedom, until their rights are restored in full and until the age of colonialism ends once and for all.

182. In conclusion, my delegation wishes to commend the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and its Chairman, Mr. Koroma of Sierra Leone, for the efforts they have made to speed up the decolonization process. We confirm our absolute support of its recommendations.

183. The PRESIDENT: We have heard the last speakers for this morning. I shall now call those representatives who wish to speak in exercise of the right of reply.

184. Mr. FELDMAN (United States of America): I was pleased, though a bit surprised, a few moments ago to hear the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic explain that he was not attacking me at all. It was a bit hard to tell the difference, particularly when he referred to statements I had made as "contemptible", "distorted", "impertinent", "ignorant" and so on. However, I shall let that pass simply with the observation that it is often as fortunate to be known by one's enemies as by one's friends.

185. I was struck, of course, by his repeated attempt to drag Puerto Rico on to our agenda. Of course, it is not on the agenda but, nevertheless, he touched my heart when he expressed such deep concern for what he termed the destruction of Puerto Rican culture and the Puerto Rican people. I am sure the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic is not in the habit of riding the New York City subways—I am quite sure he travels about by limousine—but were he ever to take the subways he would see that all of the public signs there are in Spanish, as well as in English, and that New York City has a very extensive programme of bilingual Spanish-English education. That is in New York, not in Puerto Rico. Of course, Spanish remains the language of Puerto Rico. So much for the destruction of Puerto Rican culture.

186. As far as the Puerto Rican polity is concerned, I think we all know that there are elections there every four years. There were elections there for Governor at the beginning of November, and the Puerto Rican Independence Party, as it does every four years, contested those elections. Normally it receives about 6 per cent of the vote; this time it received a little under 4 per cent.

187. Now, as I have said, Puerto Rico is not on the agenda and I do not think it is proper or—if I may use a sexist term—manly to drag it in by the back door. If the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic wishes to place Puerto Rico on the agenda, I suggest he call for a meeting of the General Committee and we will debate his proposition, but until that happens I have to insist that it is not on the agenda.

188. I cannot forbear, however, to note his remark that force is the principle of the régime for which I spoke. That in itself was rather amusing. Of course, the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic is the representative of a Government which seems to be interested in the freedom of all peoples other than its own and, when it comes to force, I wonder if he would enlighten us about the circumstances which surrounded the destruction by artillery of the Syrian city of Hama, undertaken by the Syrian Arab Government, in which I understand somewhere between 10,000 and 50,000 people perished?

189. Mr. MILES (United Kingdom): I would like to mention three small points, small because, as I think will be clear from my statement, there are not really any big points left for us in this annual debate.

190. The first is about the Turks and Caicos Islands, which were mentioned by a number of speakers as one of those dependent Territories in which sinister and dangerous military operations are being carried out. First, the facts, which I think are well known, since they have been stated several times in the Committee: there was one United States officer stationed in the islands until this year but, on 29 February, he left, not to be replaced. Now we do not take the view that one officer, even an American officer, constitutes a military base, but apparently some delegations do. The representative of Bulgaria said that there had been no reaction from the administering Powers to the call from the General Assembly to close down military facilities in dependent Territories, but we have to tell him that we have closed down a base in the Turks and Caicos Islands. The representatives of the German Democratic Republic, the Soviet Union and Byelorussia still include the Turks and Caicos Islands in their list of dependent Territories in which military operations are going on. Perhaps they know something that we do not.

191. The second point I want to mention is the question of the armed struggle and the complaint by the representative of Bulgaria that none of the administering Powers had accepted appeals for recognition of the legitimacy of the armed struggle against colonial domination. I am glad to say that the United Kingdom does not face any such problem in any of the Territories administered by it. But I am reminded of the saying that one man's freedom fighter is another man's terrorist, and I would like to remind the Assembly that this emerged very clearly from the statement made in the debate on Afghanistan by the representative of the Soviet Union when he said that those States which assisted people who are resisting the occupation of Afghanistan are indulging in a policy of State terrorism. Not much recognition of the legitimacy of the armed struggle there.

192. Finally, I just want to comment on the remarks I made and the reply which was made by the representative of Byelorussia on the question of self-determination. I would like to say in all sincerity that I was in no way meaning to suggest seriously that Byelorussia should declare its independence, or something of that kind. I was making a different point. I fully accept that it is for Byelorussia to decide on its own status and future. I accept the historical explanation given to us by the representative of Byelorussia, and I accept that Byelorussia has made its choice. That is what self-determination means. In the same way it is for people in British dependent Territories to decide about their future. If they wish for independence, that is fine; if they wish for some other solution, that is fine. It is not for me, or for the representative of Byelorussia, or, indeed, for the General Assembly to try to tell them what their choice should be. That is what self-determination means.

Appointment of Members of the Advisory Committee on the United Nations Programme of Assistance in the Teaching, Study, Dissemination and Wider Appreciation of International Law (Concluded)

193. The PRESIDENT: I should like to draw the attention of members of the General Assembly to resolution 38/129 of 19 December 1983, whereby the Assembly decided to appoint 13 Member States as members of the Advisory Committee on the United Nations Programme of Assistance in the Teaching, Study, Dissemination and Wider Appreciation of International Law. I should like to recall that at its 67th meeting, held on 20 November, the Assembly appointed 10 members of the Advisory Committee. In this connection, I have now been informed by the Chairman of the Group of African States that that Group has endorsed the candidacies of Ghana, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Sierra Leone. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to appoint those States as members of the Advisory Committee?

It was so decided (decision 39/308).

The meeting rose at 1.40 p.m.

AGENDA ITEM 106

United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa: report of the Secretary-General

AGENDA ITEM 107

Offers by Member States of study and training facilities for inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories: report of the Secretary-General

1. Mr. INFANTE (Chile), Rapporteur of the Fourth Committee (interpretation from Spanish): I have the honour to present to the General Assembly for its consideration six reports of the Fourth Committee relating, respectively, to agenda items 18, 103, 104, 105 and 12, 106, and 107. As these reports are self-explanatory, I shall simply point out the key elements in some of the recommendations.

2. The report on agenda item 18 is contained in document A/39/696. Paragraphs 24 to 26 of part I of the report contain 10 draft resolutions, 3 draft consensuses and 1 draft decision, and paragraph 15 of part II contains one draft resolution. The recommendations of the Fourth Committee relate to the following Territories: the Cocos (Keeling) Islands, Tokelau, Pitcairn, St. Helena, American Samoa, Guam, Bermuda, the British Virgin Islands, the Cayman Islands, Montserrat, the Turks and Caicos Islands, the United States Virgin Islands, Anguilla, Gibraltar and Western Sahara.

3. Although most of these Territories are small in size and population, are geographically isolated, and have limited resources, the majority of the members of the Fourth Committee reiterated the view that these factors should not impede in any way the exercise by the peoples of these Territories of their inalienable right to self-determination and independence. According to these recommendations, the General Assembly would reaffirm the full applicability of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples [resolution 1514 (XV)] with respect to the right of these peoples to determine their future political status, in accordance with the Declaration. The Assembly would also urge the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to increase their efforts to accelerate social and economic progress in the Territories.

4. In noting with appreciation the continuing co-operation of the respective administering Powers, the Assembly would emphasize once again the importance of dispatching United Nations visiting missions to these small Territories so that the United Nations can be kept fully informed of the conditions obtaining there.

5. In paragraph 24 of part I of its report, the Fourth Committee recommends that the Assembly take note of the fact that during an act of self-determination in 1984 which was observed by the United Nations Visiting Mission (see A/39/494), the people of the Cocos (Keeling) Islands voted by a substantial majority for integration with Australia. In view of the decision of the people of the Cocos (Keeling) Islands, the transmission of information in respect of the Cocos (Keeling) Islands under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations should cease.

6. As regards Western Sahara, the General Assembly would, inter alia, reaffirm that the question of Western Sahara is a question of decolonization which remains to be completed on the basis of the exercise by the people of Western Sahara of their inalienable right to self-determination and independence.

7. With regard to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, dealt with in paragraph 21 of part I of the report, the Fourth Committee decided, without objection, to adopt the Chairman's suggestion not to take any action at the current session on the draft resolution submitted by the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples [A/39/23 (Part VI), chap XIX, para. 13].

8. The report on item 103 is contained in document A/39/676. The Fourth Committee recommends, among other things, that the Assembly reaffirm that, in the absence of a decision by the Assembly itself to the contrary, the administering Power in question should continue to transmit information with respect to the Territory concerned.

9. The report on item 104 is contained in document A/39/663. The Committee recommends to the General Assembly for adoption the draft resolution contained in paragraph 11 of the report and the draft decision contained in paragraph 12. According to the draft resolution, inter alia, the General Assembly, condemning the intensified activities of those foreign economic, financial and other interests which continue to exploit the natural and human resources of colonial Territories, would call once again upon all Governments which have not already done so to take the necessary measures in order to put an end to such enterprises, which run counter to the interests of the inhabitants of those Territories.

10. According to the draft decision the General Assembly would again call upon the colonial Powers concerned to terminate military activities in compliance with its relevant resolutions.

11. The report on items 105 and 12 is contained in document A/39/690 and Corr.1. The Committee recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the draft resolution contained in paragraph 12 of the report by which the Assembly would, inter alia, request the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to render or continue to render, as a matter of urgency, all possible moral and material assistance to the colonial peoples struggling for liberation from colonial rule. The General Assembly would also reiterate its conviction that the specialized agencies and other organizations and bodies of the United Nations system should refrain from taking any action which might imply recognition of, or support for, the legitimacy of the domination of the Territory by the racist régime of South Africa.

12. The report on item 106 is contained in document A/39/677. In paragraph 8 of that report, the Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of a draft resolution. In expressing its appreciation to all those who have supported the Programme by providing contributions, scholarships or places in their educational institutions, the Assembly would once again appeal to all States, institutions, organizations and individuals to offer greater financial and other support to the Programme in order to ensure its continuation and expansion.

13. The report on item 107 is contained in document A/39/678. The Committee recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the draft resolution contained in paragraph 7 of the report. In expressing its appreciation to those Member States that have made scholarships available to the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Assembly would invite all States to make or continue to make generous offers of study and training facilities to the inhabitants of these Territories.

14. As I stated at the beginning of my statement, these introductory remarks have only touched upon some of the basic elements contained in the Committee's recommendations and it should be understood that any omission is in no way a reflection of the importance or significance of the provisions concerned.

15. On behalf of the Fourth Committee, I should like to commend these reports to the serious attention of the General Assembly.

16. Before concluding, I would like to thank the Chairman of the Fourth Committee, Mr. Renagi Lohia of Papua New Guinea, for his outstanding leadership and for the constructive advice and guidance he gave me in connection with my tasks as Rapporteur of the Fourth Committee. I should also like to express my gratitude to the members of the Fourth Committee for the co-operation and assistance extended to me during the session.

17. Finally, I want to express my profound gratitude and appreciation to all the members of the secretariat of the Fourth Committee. Without their important collaboration this report would not have been possible.

Pursuant to rule 66 of the rules of procedure, it was decided not to discuss the reports of the Fourth Committee.

18. The PRESIDENT: Statements will therefore be limited to explanations of vote. The positions of delegations regarding the various recommendations of the Fourth Committee have been made clear in the Committee and are reflected in the relevant official records.

19. May I remind members that in paragraph 7 of its decision 34/401 the General Assembly decided that, when the same draft resolution is considered in a Main Committee and in plenary meeting, a delegation should, as far as possible, explain its vote only once, that is, either in the Committee or in plenary meeting, unless that delegation's vote in plenary meeting is different from its vote in the Committee. May I also remind members that, in accordance with the same decision, explanations of vote should be limited to 10 minutes and should be made by delegations from their seats.

20. We shall now take up the report of the Fourth Committee on agenda item 18 [A/39/696].

21. Mr. BENJELLOUN (Morocco) (interpretation from French): At a time when the General Assembly is ready to take a decision on the so-called question of the Western Sahara, my delegation believes it appropriate to clarify the position of Morocco regarding draft resolution A/C.4/39/L.13.

22. Since the Organization of African Unity (OAU) took note of Morocco's decision to accept a referendum in the Sahara, numerous resolutions and decisions have been adopted by the Implementation Committee set up for that purpose which lay down in the greatest of detail the practical arrangements for such consultations.

23. Moreover, the draft resolution that has been submitted to us today disregards all the efforts made and retains only one condition—the most controversial one—which was not retained by the Implementation Committee, namely, direct negotiations between Morocco and the so-called Liberation Front.

24. That prerequisite to the holding of a referendum for self-determination, which had already brought the OAU to an impasse, in fact aims only at hampering the process begun in June 1981 and frustrates the exercise of the inalienable right to self-determination of the peoples of the Territory.

25. Concerned to create conditions likely to restore peace to the region and to provide the peoples involved with the possibility of freely expressing their choice regarding their future, Morocco submitted draft resolution A/C.4/39/L.14/Rev.1, which proposed, without any prerequisites, that the United Nations take all necessary steps to achieve a cease-fire and to organize and carry out a referendum on self-determination in the territory.

26. Unfortunately, those who do their best to thwart the efforts made to enable those peoples to express their will freely reacted negatively to that initiative by proposing amendments whose objective was to distort that draft resolution.

27. In so doing, they are merely transferring to the United Nations the contradictions inherent in the actions of those who ensured that the OAU was no longer able to carry out its mission. Refusing to back manoeuvres designed to deprive the populations of the Sahara of their right to self-determination and to divert the United Nations from its true mission, Morocco withdrew its draft resolution A/C.4/39/L.14/Rev.1.

28. For the same reasons, Morocco rejects draft resolution A/C.4/39/L.13 and, drawing attention to its negative aspects and to the true motives of its authors, invites all those whose genuine concern is to allow the populations of the territory to express their choice freely and to contribute to a speedy and just settlement of the question of Western Sahara, not to support that draft resolution.

29. Having said that, my country, which accepted the organization of a fair and equitable referendum for self-determination for the Sahara, reiterates its total readiness to engage in the immediate organization, without any prerequisites, of that referendum and renews the commitment by His Majesty King Hassan II to respect the results made to this Assembly during the thirty-eighth session.

30. Mr. BOUZIRI (Tunisia) (interpretation from French): The Tunisian delegation wishes to take the opportunity offered by the General Assembly's consideration of the draft resolution on the question of Western Sahara to explain the vote it intends to cast and to recall the general guidelines and basic principles which form the basis for Tunisia's position on this matter.

31. In that regard, the Tunisian delegation would like to reaffirm the consistency of Tunisia's position on the question of Western Sahara, a question which is of interest to the Maghreb region as a whole.

32. I should like to emphasize that Tunisia's position on this matter remains unchanged in substance, inasmuch as from the very outset it has continued to appeal for a peaceful and just solution within the context of the Maghreb. Indeed, we have always considered that the best approach would be one that would establish appropriate conditions for an honourable solution which would preserve peace and stability in the region and which would be able to open the way to an era of co-operation based on the confidence that is necessary for the building of the Greater Maghreb in the interests of all States of the region and for the benefit of their peoples.

33. It need hardly be recalled here that the Sahara conflict has so far been a stumbling block in the way of all the efforts made to ensure the building of Maghreb, something which Tunisia fervently wishes to see established as an interdependent, complementary and unified entity. In that spirit Tunisia approved the actions undertaken by the OAU, particularly the decisions of the Conference of Heads of State or Government at its eighteenth and nineteenth ordinary sessions, since it is convinced that these could form a favourable framework allowing for progress in the right direction. In the same spirit, it joined in the consensus that emerged at the thirty-eighth session of the General Assembly.

34. Moreover, in the hope of making progress towards a solution of the Sahara conflict, Tunisia has spared no effort to bring the points of view closer together and to create a climate propitious to dialogue and conciliation. In this regard, it had hoped that, as was the case last year, the Fourth Committee would achieve a consensus based on the two texts of a draft resolution first submitted to it, which, if there had been sufficient time and a stronger will for dialogue, could have led to the consensus so deeply desired.

35. With regard to the draft resolution on Western Sahara contained in paragraph 15 of part II of document A/39/696, the delegation of Tunisia would like to emphasize that its intention to vote in favour of this text is primarily due to the general nature of this draft resolution, which, from its point of view, restates in substance those considerations which seem crucial and which are already contained in resolutions AHG/Res. 103 and 104 of the OAU, to which Tunisia remains firmly dedicated.

36. We believe that these considerations have the advantage and merit of contributing to the search for a lasting solution to the question of Western Sahara, while advocating inter alia a cease-fire and the organization of a referendum for self-determination.

37. Tunisia, for its part, continues to hope that reason and wisdom will ultimately prevail and that a negotiated settlement will speedily put an end to this deplorable conflict, the continuation of which is a threat to the peace and stability of the region as well as an obstacle to the establishment of that Maghreb which remains the shared and heartfelt aspiration of all the peoples of the Maghreb.

38. Mr. HERRERA CÁCERES (Honduras) (interpretation from Spanish): The delegation of Honduras wishes to explain its vote on the draft resolution concerning Western Sahara.

39. When a conflict arises anywhere in the world, Honduras tries to support any and all efforts or initiatives to find a peaceful and comprehensive solution of the problem, with full respect for the honour of the parties concerned and with the even-handedness which must prevail in any solution. That is the consistent stand of my delegation, for we believe that it is our responsibility within the United Nations both to find formulas to foster agreement among the peoples of the great United Nations family and to avoid anything which might cause greater discord within that family.

40. It is in that context that we take our decisions about how to vote on the various regional and sub-regional questions which are the subject of draft resolutions in this Organization. It is in this way that we show our interest in regional and sub-regional unity.

41. That is why we had decided to vote in favour of draft resolutions A/C.4/39/L.13 and L.14/Rev.1 on the question of Western Sahara submitted to the Fourth Committee. Those two texts reaffirmed the inalienable right of peoples to self-determination and independence, which, in this case, could be exercised after a cease-fire, permitting a peaceful, fair referendum with appropriate international machinery and guarantees, freely accepted by the parties concerned under the terms of those two draft resolutions.

42. As draft resolution A/C.4/39/L.14/Rev.1 was unexpectedly withdrawn, the Committee had before it only one draft resolution on the question of Western Sahara. My delegation voted in favour of draft resolution A/C.4/39/L.13 in the Committee, convinced that in the circumstances it would be supported by nearly all the countries from that region. However, the results show that more than a dozen African countries abstained or did not participate in the voting; one even voted against the draft resolution.

43. In those circumstances, and in order to do nothing which might affect the possibility of finding a peaceful solution based on the free consent of all the parties directly concerned, a solution which would have the support of all African countries, Honduras will abstain in the vote on draft resolution A/C.4/39/L.13.

44. Mr. OYOUÉ (Gabon) (interpretation from French): The General Assembly is soon to take a decision on the draft resolution relating to Western Sahara, and my delegation wishes once again to express my country's hope that the conflict in Western Sahara will find a peaceful solution, in accordance with the various resolutions adopted on this subject by the OAU and the United Nations.

45. In this connection, there is no need to recall here that this dispute is of grave concern to the entire African continent. My delegation's interest in this conflict is all the greater in that it takes place in a region with all of whose States my country maintains excellent relations of friendship and co-operation. That is why Gabon believes that we must rely, in any settlement process, on principles consistent with the search for ways and means of reaching a compromise which could be supported by this Organization and accepted by all the parties concerned.

46. In any event, for Gabon, the problem of Western Sahara is a question of self-determination which can be resolved only on the basis of the principles embodied in the Charter of the United Nations.

47. At this stage, it is vital that a referendum be organized in order to guarantee the possibility of a peaceful settlement of the dispute. Since the two parties concerned are convinced of the need to organize a referendum on self-determination, Gabon earnestly hopes that the international community will assist them in bringing this about in the near future.

48. Both within and outside the United Nations it is more than ever the moment to seek a compromise solution which would lead to the best possible settlement of the question of Western Sahara, which has lasted far too long.

49. In this context, Gabon, faithful to its policy of dialogue, tolerance and peace, will abstain in the vote on the draft resolution on this subject. That abstention should be understood to reflect Gabon's continuing concern for the promotion by peaceful means of the search for a just and lasting solution to this deplorable conflict.

50. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now proceed to take decisions on the various recommendations of the Fourth Committee. We turn first to the 10 draft resolutions recommended for adoption in paragraph 24 of part I of the report [A/39/696]. Draft resolution I, entitled "Question of the Cocos (Keeling) Islands", was adopted by the Fourth Committee without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly also wishes to adopt it?

Draft resolution I was adopted (resolution 39/30).

51. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution II is entitled "Question of American Samoa". The Fourth Committee adopted this draft resolution without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution II was adopted (resolution 39/31).

52. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution III is entitled "Question of Guam". The Fourth Committee adopted this draft resolution without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution III was adopted (resolution 39/32).

53. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution IV is entitled "Question of Bermuda". The Fourth Committee adopted this draft resolution without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly also wishes to adopt it?

Draft resolution IV was adopted (resolution 39/33).

54. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution V is entitled "Question of the British Virgin Islands". The Fourth Committee adopted this draft resolution without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution V was adopted (resolution 39/34).

55. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will turn next to draft resolution VI, entitled "Question of the Cayman Islands". This draft resolution was adopted by the Fourth Committee without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly also wishes to adopt it?

Draft resolution VI was adopted (resolution 39/35).

56. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution VII, entitled "Question of Montserrat", was adopted by the Fourth Committee without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly also wishes to adopt it?

Draft resolution VII was adopted (resolution 39/36).

57. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution VIII is entitled "Question of the Turks and Caicos Islands". The Fourth Committee adopted this draft resolution without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution VIII was adopted (resolution 39/37).

58. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution IX is entitled "Question of the United States Virgin Islands". The Fourth Committee adopted this draft resolution without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution IX was adopted (resolution 39/38).

59. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution X is entitled "Question of Anguilla". The Fourth Committee adopted this draft resolution without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution X was adopted (resolution 39/39).

60. The PRESIDENT: I now invite representatives to turn to the three draft consensuses recommended for adoption in paragraph 25 of part I of the report [A/39/696]. Draft consensus I is entitled "Question of Tokelau". The Fourth Committee adopted this draft consensus without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft consensus I was adopted (decision 39/408).

61. The PRESIDENT: Draft consensus II is entitled "Question of Pitcairn". The Fourth Committee adopted draft consensus II without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft consensus II was adopted (decision 39/409).

62. The PRESIDENT: Draft consensus III is entitled "Question of Gibraltar." In this connection, an amendment has been circulated in document A/39/L.27. In accordance with rule 90 of the rules of procedure, the Assembly will first take a decision on the amendment. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to adopt this amendment?

The amendment issued in document A/39/L.27 was adopted.

63. The PRESIDENT: The Fourth Committee adopted draft consensus III without objection. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to adopt the draft consensus as it has just been amended?

Draft consensus III, as amended, was adopted (decision 39/410).

64. The PRESIDENT: We now turn to the draft decision entitled "Question of St. Helena" recommended for adoption in paragraph 26 of part I of the report [A/39/696]. I shall now put that draft decision to the vote. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

Abstaining: Bangladesh, Belgium, Brunei Darussalam, Burma, Canada, Chile, China, Denmark, El Salvador, France, Gabon, Germany, Federal Republic of, Honduras, Iceland, Indonesia, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Jordan, Luxembourg, Malaysia, Maldives, Nepal, Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, Paraguay, Philippines, Portugal, Samoa, Saudi Arabia, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Thailand, Turkey, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Zaire.

The draft resolution was adopted by 90 votes to none, with 42 abstentions (resolution 39/40).

66. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Argentina, who wishes to explain his vote.

67. Mr. BEAUGE (Argentina) (interpretation from Spanish): We voted in favour of the draft resolution on the question of Western Sahara because it is in conformity with previous consensuses of the General Assembly and the Organization of African Unity affirming the inalienable right of the Sahraoui people to self-determination and calling for a cease-fire and the holding of a referendum in the Territory. In this regard we note with satisfaction that the Government of Morocco has repeated its intention to consult the people of Western Sahara. At the same time, my delegation sincerely regrets that it was not possible to produce a consensus text, not only because we maintain most cordial relations with all the peoples and countries of the Maghreb, but also because clearly the participation of Morocco is indispensable if we are to bring about a final solution to the problem of Western Sahara.

68. Consequently, we associate ourselves in the appeal to the interested parties to co-operate in the search for a compromise which will take account in a balanced way of the principles and facts pertaining to this unfortunate problem. This is an established doctrine in the field of decolonization. The particular features of each Territory should not be disregarded. Common sense and experience confirm that there can be no better guarantee of protection of the long-term interests of the Territories than the agreement and co-operation of the region in which they will have to continue to live.

69. The PRESIDENT: We shall now turn to the report of the Fourth Committee on agenda item 103. The Assembly will take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories Transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations", which is recommended for adoption in paragraph 8 of the report [A/39/676]. A recorded vote has been requested.

United Nations

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

THIRTY-NINTH SESSION

Official Records

88th PLENARY MEETING

Thursday, 6 December 1984, at 11 a.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

AGENDA ITEM 33

Question of Palestine:

(a) Report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People;

(b) Report of the Secretary-General

1. The PRESIDENT: I should like to propose that the list of speakers in the debate on this item be closed tomorrow, Friday, at 12 noon. May I take it that the General Assembly agrees to that proposal?

It was so decided.

2. The PRESIDENT: I call on Mr. Massamba Sarré, of Senegal, in his capacity as Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People.

3. Mr. SARRÉ (Senegal), Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People (interpretation from French): A year ago, the General Assembly reiterated the appeal of the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva from 29 August to 7 September 1983, for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East. In endorsing the idea of such a conference, the Assembly expressed its will and commitment to the view that peace in the Middle East can be achieved through promoting sincere dialogue among all the parties concerned. This position itself was the result of a dual awareness: awareness of the fact that the path to peace, however long it may be, must give precedence to dialogue over the force of arms; but also awareness particularly of the fact that the time factor is of paramount importance in the search for peace and that, if no action is taken, the international community could be exposed to disastrous consequences in the Middle East region.

4. Guided by these considerations and by the mandate entrusted to it by the General Assembly in resolutions 38/58 A and B, the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People has in the course of the past year focused most of its attention on efforts to promote the convening of the aforementioned conference, thus supplementing the actions taken by the Secretary-General, to whom we wish to pay a tribute for his untiring efforts in the cause of the Palestinian people.

5. It will be recalled that in section III of the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights,[1] which was adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine and endorsed by the General Assembly at its thirty-eighth session and whose implementation was entrusted to the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, the following is specifically stated:

> "The International Conference on the Question of Palestine, convinced of the important role of world-wide public opinion in resolving the question of Palestine, and in the implementation of the Declaration and Programme of Action, urges and encourages:
> ". . .
> "(2) Non-governmental organizations and professional and popular associations to intensify their efforts to support the rights of the Palestinian people in every possible way;
> ". . .
> "(9) Parliamentarians, political parties, trade unions, organizations for solidarity and intellectuals, particularly in Western Europe and North America, to join their counterparts in other parts of the world in giving their support, where it has not been done, to an initiative which would express the desire of the international community to see the Palestinian people at last living in their own independent homeland in peace, freedom and dignity."

It is therefore basically within the context of increasing the awareness of the international community in the promotion of the objectives put forward by the Conference that I wish to place the work of the Committee in presenting its report [A/39/35].

6. In accordance with resolution 38/58 B, the Committee organized a North American non-governmental organization symposium on the question of Palestine from 25 to 27 June 1984 in New York. That symposium, which was the first of its kind, had the participation of more than 60 organizations based in the United States and Canada and, after three days of productive debate, it adopted the North American Declaration, which is annexed to the Committee's report [ibid., annex IV].

7. In that declaration, whose obvious interest makes it worthy of our attention, North American non-governmental organizations not only expressed support for the convening of an international conference on peace in the Middle East but also committed themselves to co-ordinating and stepping up efforts to mobilize public opinion and Governments in favour of the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to build a State within the historic borders of Palestine.

8. The particularly encouraging results of this symposium led the Committee to organize at Geneva two months later, from 20 to 22 August, an international non-governmental organization meeting on the question of Palestine. Some 100 organizations from all over the world participated in that meeting and adopted a resolution which is important for more than one reason. They not only committed themselves to campaigning in their respective countries in favour of an international peace conference on the Middle East, but also decided to establish an interim co-ordinating committee on Palestine. This is particularly encouraging, as the interim committee is composed of organizations from the United States, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and France, and also, and above all, from the occupied territories—specifically the West Bank—and Israel.

9. Another outstanding aspect of the meeting was that the non-governmental organizations decided to launch a campaign to collect signatures from among the peoples of the entire world in favour of convening an international conference on peace in the Middle East. That campaign was launched on 29 November 1984—the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People—and will end in one year, on 29 November 1985.

10. At the request of the participants in the Geneva meeting, we decided to include their important resolution in the Committee's report [ibid., annex V].

11. In addition to these activities involving non-governmental organizations, the Committee organized at Tunis, from 14 to 17 August 1984, the ninth United Nations Seminar on the Question of Palestine. That seminar brought together parliamentarians and scholars from 17 European and African countries and resulted in an appeal to all parliamentarians throughout the world to step up their national action to enable people better to understand the realities of the question of Palestine. It is appropriate to stress here that, at this critical stage in the efforts of the United Nations to improve the chance of a negotiated solution, the support of scholars, parliamentarians and other influential groups is an important element in mobilizing public opinion in favour of the solution sought by the United Nations.

12. This is only an outline of a few of the most noteworthy activities of the Committee during the past year. There were many other activities, by the Department of Public Information and by Committee representatives at various international conferences. I shall not dwell on these, for they are set out clearly in the report.

13. The international community has come to recognize that the question of Palestine is at the core of the Middle East conflict and that enjoyment by the Palestinian people of its inalienable rights is indispensable for the solution of that problem. Those rights have repeatedly been reaffirmed by the General Assembly and include the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination without outside interference, its right to national independence and sovereignty, including the right to establish its own State in Palestine, and the right of Palestinians to return to their homes from which they have been displaced and uprooted and to regain possession of their property or to receive compensation if they do not wish to return. Moreover, acting objectively and on the basis of the realities, the Committee recognized the right to exist of all States of the region.

14. It will be recalled also that, at the request of the General Assembly, the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People drew up a programme for the attainment of these rights, which has been endorsed many times by the General Assembly by an overwhelming majority. However, as everyone knows, the Security Council has been unable to take action on these recommendations owing to the opposition of one of its permanent members. As I have already said, any proposal aimed at solving the Palestinian problem without taking into consideration the essential factors of these recommendations is doomed to failure and would, indeed, perpetuate a situation which imperils international peace and security.

15. We have reached a critical, decisive stage in the process of restoring Palestinian rights. Each day that passes without progress on the path charted by the Committee merely complicates a situation which, unfortunately, is already difficult. The gradual annexation of the illegally occupied territories, the increasingly repressive measures taken against the Palestinian population, and the cycle of violence clearly demonstrate that it is high time to reach a just and lasting settlement of the Palestinian question.

16. In its report, the Committee again reaffirms the validity of its recommendations [ibid., annex I] and requests the Assembly to insist once more that the Security Council adopt positive measures to implement these recommendations, on which action should have been taken long ago. Moreover, the Committee reaffirms the validity of the recommendations of the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983, emphasizing especially that the international community must begin immediately to focus its activities on the necessary preparations for convening the proposed international peace conference on the Middle East, as endorsed by the General Assembly in resolution 38/58 C, with the participation of all the parties concerned.

17. In this connection, I wish to reiterate the Committee's deep appreciation of the contacts initiated by the Secretary-General. While the Committee regrets the negative position of certain countries, it is none the less determined to pursue its efforts to ensure that the conference is convened soon, for it is convinced that the holding of this conference will be an important step towards the settlement of the question of Palestine. We call now on all the parties concerned to rise above emotion and passion and to co-operate in the achievement of a positive result in the interests of peace and justice.

18. With that goal in mind, the Committee is particularly encouraged by the massive support given by the international community to the proposal on the convening of the conference and by the mounting evidence that these recommendations are now better known and understood throughout the world. Other positive factors are the notable increase in interest in the question of Palestine and the militant support of non-governmental organizations for the Palestinian cause.

19. It cannot be repeated too often that the present situation in the Middle East is a constant reminder to the international community of the urgent need to increase efforts to find a solution to the Palestinian problem.

20. There is no better proof of this urgency than the situation which persists in the occupied territories. Today, 17 years after the 1967 occupation, more than a third of the land in the West Bank has been confiscated by the Israeli authorities for the establishment of settlements. At the same time, Israel is tightening its grip on the water resources of the occupied territories, the use of which by the Palestinian population is limited by harsh restrictions.

21. Thus, as time passes, Israel is transforming the West Bank and Gaza into a pool of cheap labour and an outlet for its products through the restrictions imposed by the Israeli authorities on the establishment of new industries.

22. This process of stifling the economy of the occupied territories contributes to emptying them of their most educated inhabitants, increases their dependence on Israel and is a denial of everything that might serve as the beginning of a future Palestinian State.

23. The salvaging of the occupied territories is more than ever inseparable from a political solution of the Palestinian question. Dialogue among all the parties concerned, including, first and foremost, the Palestinian people, is a necessary part of that process.

24. On 29 November I had an opportunity to say something that I will repeat today: "Peace is one and indivisible."

25. We consider that at this critical stage it is imperative that efforts be redoubled in order to find a just solution to the question of Palestine and to put an end to the unnecessary suffering of the Palestinian people and others in the region. We appeal to the international community to shoulder its responsibility within the context of dialogue in order to ensure a felicitous solution to this tragedy that has lasted for nearly 40 years. The Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People urges you to work to assure that such a dialogue will begin.

26. The PRESIDENT: I now call on Mr. Victor Gauci, of Malta, Rapporteur of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, to present the report of the Committee.

27. Mr. GAUCI (Malta), Rapporteur of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People: My presentation of the report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People [A/39/35] in reality symbolizes another year of festering conflict and wrongs unrighted. On the question of Palestine, the time has now come not so much to speak of many things, but rather to concentrate on a few of the main elements of this tragic issue.

28. If we really wish, again, to speak of many things, there are enough details in paragraphs 18 to 89 of the report to demonstrate clearly the present disheartening state of affairs. Those paragraphs, as well as other more specific reports referred to therein or presented before the Assembly's Special Political Committee, contain more than enough evidence to prove conclusively—if any proof were really needed—that all is not well in the State of Palestine.

29. Those same paragraphs also contain enough evidence to convince any objective observer beyond a reasonable doubt that a continuation of the policies currently applied on the spot cannot bring about reconciliation, let alone the peace which the protagonists claim to seek and for which the Committee, by consensus, has striven strenuously for the past eight years. In so doing, the Committee was only shedding light and concentrating attention on the key issue by furthering almost 40 years of effort by the United Nations to bring about a solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict in the Middle East.

30. It must in all candor also be admitted that the evidence contained in those paragraphs provides ample ammunition to fuel a heated debate. Regrettable as this may be, it is not, however, what the Committee seeks. An acrimonious round of bitter recrimination, of accusation and counter-accusation, repeated year in and year out, is neither a formula nor a substitute for peace. What is even worse, it provides convenient ammunition for those who contend that seeking a solution through the proposed international peace conference on the Middle East is not likely to succeed, judging by the outcome of the past debates.

31. The Committee nevertheless has to stress with regret that the contents of the report cannot but reflect the untenable situation on the spot. Truth cannot be suppressed. There is no question that the cycle of violence goes on. In addition, it cannot be denied that many years after the flurry and expectation raised by partial approaches and shuttle diplomacy, the situation remains grim. It can be summed up in a few brief but poignant sentences.

Mr. Wasiuddin (Bangladesh), Vice-President, took the Chair.

32. Small, friendly Lebanon is in turmoil, with much of its territory occupied. Resentment runs riot in the occupied territories, with popular protest being subdued by massive military repression. Violence erupts sporadically. Unperturbed, disdainful of public opinion and legality, and against opposition from within and from without, Israel continues its illegal settlements and annexation policies in the occupied territories, policies which are universally held to be an obstacle to peace.

33. Peaceful initiatives on the spot are conspicuous by their absence. Instead, the policies of fear, hate and force predominate, lavishly fueled by sophisticated weapons, to the detriment of economic development. To say that this is a bleak background is to put it mildly. To repeat the details is merely to deaden their impact.

34. Let us therefore stick to the essentials. Is there no ray of hope to pierce this persistent gloom? The Committee believes that there is. The Committee itself has shown the right path, and it must continue its labours until its recommendations are followed through and the goal achieved. Here, very briefly, are the main reasons for our undiminished hope.

35. First, the recommendations of the Committee, repeatedly endorsed by the General Assembly and subsequently further refined by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983, are the only—I repeat—the only formula adopted by international consensus which advocates a procedure permitting all the protagonists in the conflict to be involved in the search for a comprehensive solution based on justice and international law.

36. Secondly, the real nature of the Palestine question is now widely known in all four quarters of the globe, again thanks to the efforts of the Committee. Time and time again, without exception, in all the regions where seminars and symposiums have been organized in the past few years, our audiences—even the most sceptical among them—have been convinced that the recommendations of the Committee stand the most rigid tests of fairness, legality and peaceful scope, overlooking the vital interests of none of the protagonists and hence likely to last if implemented. The Chairman of the Committee has just provided the highlights of our activities in this field and I need not therefore repeat them.

37. Thirdly, we have gathered support from hundreds of non-governmental organizations, trade union representatives, journalists and members of the academic community in advocating action and redress for the practical attainment of the rights of the Palestinian people. A spontaneous campaign to obtain signatures favouring peace is already under way.

38. Fourthly, and perhaps most important, we are advocating an approach through the Security Council, first bringing about contacts and rapprochement, then promoting a comprehensive solution and subsequently even providing guarantees to ensure its observance if necessary. This laborious procedure is proof enough that the interests of no single party will be overlooked. Those who claim the contrary clearly misunderstand the Committee's approach.

39. This background provides the positive thinking behind the recommendations of the Committee this year, contained in paragraphs 155 to 160 of its report. Those sound and peaceful recommendations stand in marked contrast to the sense of despondency and despair in that volatile and violent region. But in order to succeed, we need the positive contribution of all concerned. As stated in paragraph 160 of the report: "The Committee . . . strongly recommends that international action should henceforth concentrate on the preparations necessary for the convening of this Conference and contribute to its successful and peaceful outcome." We therefore earnestly trust that all nations in this Assembly will no longer delay in responding to this call, and we urge the Secretary-General to pursue the valiant efforts he has already initiated.

40. In essence, what we would be doing in 1984 is start on the unfinished part of the solution envisaged in 1947. In 1947, the partition plan did not enjoy unanimous backing, but one side of the plan was fully implemented. Many events have taken place in the area since then which have caused changes on the map of the region but have not brought about peace or security. The one event that has not taken place is the most fundamental and enlightened of all: it is the free and unfettered act of self-determination by the Palestinian people. In 1984, therefore, the international backing for this overdue act of self-determination by the Palestinian people is almost unanimous; it obviously provides the essential ingredient of a lasting solution.

41. So many opportunities in the past have been missed; history provides the record and the events and on-the-spot evidence. But the window of opportunity is not yet closed. The Assembly this year should ensure that the window remains open and should encourage the Security Council next year to strive energetically to finalize the necessary preparations for the international peace conference on the Middle East. All the spadework has been done; all the ingredients of a solution are before the Council awaiting its final touches and backed by its supreme authority. Further delay would be prejudicial to the prospects. It is time to replace reckless rhetoric by sober statesmanship and a specific sense of purpose. As with all problems, if we just put one foot firmly on the ground before the other, keep our heads cool and co-operate spontaneously, we can succeed.

42. As my delegation stated when it replied to the letter from the Secretary-General, dated 9 March 1984, concerning the convening of the international peace conference on the Middle East:

> "The potential benefits of such an approach cannot be over-emphasized. In particular, the present sense of drift and despair in the Middle East could be transformed into an energetic momentum for a concerted search for peace. That in itself, and by itself, would be a significant development on the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations." [A/39/231.]

43. It is, I submit, no longer proper for individual countries to invoke procedural difficulties against a comprehensive approach, which in any case is now not only the conclusion of the Committee but also the unanimous recommendation of the International Conference on the Question of Palestine. The protagonists themselves need encouragement to overcome inertia. The final solution will need universal backing and effective support—guarantees if need be, not based on the force of arms but on the common benefit of peace. Hard work and long negotiations will be required, but a start and an essential change of direction are necessary now.

44. The mutual concessions that will be required from Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization [PLO] to clinch a peace settlement would be more likely to be achieved in a package deal in a comprehensive solution enjoying unanimous and universal support.

45. Permit me to end by once more acclaiming the leadership and dedicated service of Mr. Sarré, who has guided us through another year of hard work. I also wish to express my appreciation to all members for their own contribution and for the assistance they have extended to me in my eight years of rapporteurship of the Committee.

46. The PRESIDENT: The next speaker is Mr. Farouk Kaddoumi, the Head of the Political Department of the PLO. I call on him in accordance with General Assembly resolution 3237 (XXIX).

47. Mr. KADDOUMI (Palestine Liberation Organization) (interpretation from Arabic): I am pleased to congratulate Mr. Lusaka on his election to the presidency of the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly and, through him, to greet his friendly country, Zambia, and its great President, Kenneth Kaunda, who has always supported the just struggle of our Palestinian people and of the peoples of the African continent and the non-aligned States. I am confident that Mr. Lusaka's wisdom, extensive experience and firm belief in the principles of justice and peace will guarantee the success of the work of this session.

48. I am also pleased to take this opportunity to express thanks and appreciation to his predecessor, Mr. Jorge Illueca, whose valuable efforts in conducting the work of the Assembly's thirty-eighth session greatly contributed to the results achieved.

49. I wish to congratulate most warmly the State of Brunei Darussalam on its accession to independence and its admission to membership of the United Nations.

50. I cannot fail to note with appreciation the great efforts of the Secretary-General in the interest of world peace and in affirming the role of the United Nations, notwithstanding the attempt to destroy its efforts. I should also like to emphasize our full confidence in him and our continued readiness to co-operate with the United Nations in achieving security and a just peace in the Middle East.

51. We meet today as we approach the fortieth anniversary of the establishment of the United Nations, which came into existence in the wake of the most atrocious experience in the history of mankind—the Second World War. The United Nations came into being to establish a system to govern relations among States and nations based on respect for the right of peoples to freedom and independence, as well as on co-operation and equality instead of exploitation, oppression, domination and aggression.

52. The world community continues to be faced with numerous dangers to world security and peace; many peoples, including the Palestinian people, continue to be denied their basic rights as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations.

53. As I said in an earlier statement before the Assembly, I can find hardly any other issue which, like the question of Palestine, the United Nations has had to face since its establishment and which has remained a constant item on its agenda since 1947.

54. From 1947 to the present time, the General Assembly and the Security Council, as well as numerous United Nations committees and specialized agencies, have adopted many resolutions, all of which affirm that the Palestinian people, like the other peoples of the world, have a natural right to freedom, independence and sovereignty in their own land.

55. In spite of all these resolutions, the results and realities have been quite different: Palestine was usurped in its entirety, the majority of its people were displaced and became refugees, their property was expropriated and they were subjected to a series of systematic pogroms and massacres, from Deir Yassin in 1948 to the massacres of Sabra and Shatila in 1982.

56. In nearly 40 years, Israel has deliberately and flagrantly violated every decision, every resolution of the United Nations. Is it not truly regrettable that Israel continues to occupy a seat in the Assembly? That is a sad anomaly and an affront to all the ideals and values for which the world Organization was established.

57. What is the significance of the constant presence of the question of Palestine in the agenda of the General Assembly ever since the establishment of the United Nations? We have no doubt that this fact indicates deep understanding and full recognition by the international community of the gross injustice that befell the Palestinian people, as well as the necessity to find a just and lasting solution to this problem in spite of all the difficulties and challenges. It further very clearly indicates that the international community rejects Israel's continued policy of force, oppression and occupation against our Arab Palestinian people.

58. In spite of the inability of the United Nations to find practical means to bring about respect for, and actual implementation of its resolutions, because of the United States policy of hegemony and obstruction and its absolute bias in favour of Israel, the political and moral power represented by the will and resolutions of the United Nations is the expression of the adherence by the international community to the principles of the Charter, principles which we all seek to respect in the face of the policy of force and aggression.

59. In this sense, we consider that the struggle of the Palestinian people for freedom and independence is the cause of all of you as much as it is our cause; it is the cause of the United Nations itself. It is a cause that concerns humanity as a whole, for it is a cause of right and justice which represents the aspirations of the international community to establish a better world in which peoples enjoy their freedom and sovereignty, a world not governed by the law of the jungle, a world free of the policy of force, a world in the image of the Charter which Members of the Organization signed 40 years ago.

60. During the general debate and the debate on the situation in the Middle East, we listened carefully to the statements of Presidents and of representatives of Member States. I do not think I exaggerate when I say that the overwhelming majority of the speakers seemed to share a common point of view regarding the question of Palestine. They stressed that Israel, which occupies Palestinian and Arab territories, should withdraw from all of them, including Jerusalem. The overwhelming majority of the international community condemned the policy of occupation, expansion and settlement pursued by Israel in the occupied territories and called for the cessation of those practices, as the continuation of that situation in the Middle East constitutes a tinder-box which threatens the security of the entire world.

61. We have noticed almost total agreement that any just and lasting solution to the situation in this region should include, first and foremost, a solution to the question of Palestine, the core of the conflict in the Middle East region. Such a solution should be based on enabling the Palestinian people to recover their legitimate inalienable rights, including the right to self-determination, to the creation of an independent state on its national soil and to return to that land. An acceptable framework for the search for such a solution is the United Nations and its resolutions pertaining to the question of Palestine. Such a solution should be reached through convening an international peace conference on the Middle East with the participation, on an equal footing, of all the parties, including the PLO, the two super-Powers and all the other States concerned. It is clear from these debates that the overwhelming majority of the States of the world consider the PLO to be the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and that, therefore, it is impossible to ignore its role and its right to participate in all international efforts aimed at finding an acceptable solution to the Middle East crisis and the question of Palestine.

62. This is the will of the Organization, which is reflected in the overwhelming majority of the statements of Member States and in the numerous resolutions adopted by the Assembly over the past years.

63. On the other hand, we heard some statements which represented a total departure from the general opinion of the international community and an absolute disregard of United Nations resolutions.

Those statements were delivered by the representatives of the United States and Israel.

64. The United States President, Mr. Reagan, declared before this Assembly at this session [4th meeting] his adherence to his Middle East initiative, which he announced on 1 September 1982.[2] It had been expected that the United States President would adopt a new position that would take into account the will of the international community, the realities of the situation in the region and the new developments which proved the failure of United States policy there, particularly on the Lebanese scene, because that policy, as we had always said, ignored the crux of the conflict in the Middle East region—namely, the question of Palestine—and denied the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination.

65. Following President Reagan's proposal, Israel stepped up its oppression of the peoples of Palestine and Lebanon and increased the pace of land expropriation and the establishment of settlements. In addition, the strategic alliance between the United States and Israel was strengthened, and the latter has received more arms and more financial aid. This has encouraged Israel to continue its policy of aggression and occupation, posing a serious threat to the security of the Arab States and to peace in the region and in the world. It is well known that all this aid is given at the expense of the American taxpayer and the United States budget deficit and, above all, of course, at the expense of the peoples of Palestine and Lebanon, whose suffering is increased.

66. In addition, the United States, not satisfied with absolving itself of its international responsibilities, has worked to hinder and obstruct all the peaceful international efforts by exercising its veto power in the Security Council in an arbitrary manner against the interests of the Palestinian and Lebanese peoples; this has brought us to the current stalemate and tension. With regard to the question of Palestine in particular, the United States Administration has persisted in denying the rights of the Palestinian people and disregarding the resolutions and Charter of the United Nations by continuing to reject the establishment of an independent Palestinian State.

67. The membership of the United Nations is now made up of 159 States—some big, with millions of people; others small, with populations not even reaching tens of thousands or hundreds of thousands. Why does the United States deny the Palestinian people its right to establish a State of its own, to be the 160th Member State, for example, in accordance with all international principles, charters and conventions?

68. The Palestinian people do exist; they are vigorous, active, creative, militant and able. They are proud of their national identity, land and homeland. They are a people with a long history, one of the oldest peoples of the earth. Palestine existed before Israel, as the Bible itself states. All the revealed religions were nurtured in the land of Palestine; it is holy to us all. Why should the people who bear its name be deprived of their most basic human rights? The Palestinian people today number about 5 million, of which a high percentage are highly trained. They include specialists in all fields. They participate alongside their fellow Arabs in the brother Arab States in developing the region, and they play a distinct, positive role that is respected and appreciated by all.

69. I want to ask the Assembly in all honesty and sincerity: Why does the United States take a hostile attitude towards the Palestinian people and their inalienable right to self-determination? Moreover, by what right does the United States draw up two separate categories of people: those that can have an independent State, and those that cannot or should not have an independent State? If the United States does not wish to recognize the PLO—a position which is condemned—that is its business; but to refuse to recognize the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination constitutes a question of law, morality and principle and is equivalent to refusing to recognize the Charter and principles of the United Nations itself.

70. The PLO has proved that it represents a positive and effective element in the international community, despite all the attempts and conspiracies of Israel, over a period of 20 years, to destroy it and to break the massive support it enjoys. To this end, Israel has used all methods of terror and armed aggression. But, in spite of the difficulties we have confronted from time to time, all these Israeli attempts have failed; they have led, instead, to the greater rallying of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories and in the diaspora around the PLO and its legitimate role of leadership.

71. Perhaps the greatest proof of this cohesion was the convening of the Palestine National Council only a few days ago in the Jordanian capital, Amman, in the midst of a great popular Palestinian demonstration of welcome and support. The convening of the seventeenth session of the Palestine National Council was a new plebiscite, held before the eyes of the entire world. It affirmed the desire of the Palestinian people to keep the PLO, its legitimate institutions and its democratic processes. Our people have renewed, through this council, their full confidence in its elected, legitimate leadership, under the chairmanship of Brother Yasser Arafat.

72. The session of the Palestine National Council, convened at Amman, was an important occasion, emphasizing the distinctive relations that bind together the Palestinian and Jordanian peoples, who share a common goal and destiny. The Council renewed its adherence to the resolution adopted at the previous session, in Algeria in 1983, which provided for the establishment of future relations between Palestine and Jordan on a confederal basis, after the withdrawal of Israel and the establishment of an independent Palestinian State. Our people have thus reaffirmed, through the Palestine National Council, their absolute rejection of Zionist and imperialist schemes aimed at creating an alternative homeland for the Palestinian people in Jordan. These schemes are in fact designed to perpetuate Israeli occupation of the Palestinian territories, displace their population and ultimately annex them. The Palestinian people will not accept an alternative to its original homeland.

73. In addition, the Palestine National Council underscored the need to co-operate with the fraternal people of Jordan to ensure joint Arab action to liberate the land and enable the Palestinian people to exercise its inalienable rights.

74. In line with the consistent position of the PLO in the search for an acceptable peace in the Middle East based on recognition of the right of the Palestinian people to return, to self-determination, and to the creation of an independent Palestinian State with Jerusalem as its capital, our National Council has endorsed the call to convene an international peace conference on the Middle East with the participation on an equal footing of all the parties concerned, including the PLO, the two super-Powers and other interested States, within the framework of the United Nations and on the basis of its resolutions. Our National Council welcomed the Soviet initiative of 29 July 1984 [see A/39/368] and reaffirmed its rejection of all schemes that deny the right of our people to self-determination, such as the self-rule scheme and President Reagan's initiative. It called on the United Nations, and, in particular, the Security Council, to shoulder its responsibilities and implement its resolutions.

75. Finally, the convening of the latest session of the Palestine National Council at Amman and the resolutions it adopted provided a new opportunity to stress the national identity of an independent Palestine and the desire to maintain the independence of our national decision-making body. It also demonstrated the cohesiveness of the people and their leadership, represented by the PLO, and the determination and will of the Palestinian people, despite all the difficulties and obstacles, to continue their struggle by all available means to achieve the goals for which they have long struggled, at the cost of great sacrifices.

76. Since the last session of the General Assembly, many things have happened which should be examined, in view of the consequences they have had on the situation in the region. All peace efforts have come to a halt or have been aborted. We lost a year of international effort in this direction because of United States and Israeli intransigence, in spite of the existence of numerous international projects and initiatives which the PLO had welcomed, such as the Arab peace plan, adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference,[3] the Soviet initiative of 15 September 1982,[4] and the French-Egyptian plan submitted to the Security Council on 28 July 1982.[5]

77. Furthermore, the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva from 29 August to 7 September 1983, was attended by the representatives of 138 States and 104 non-governmental organizations, as well as many international personalities. As the Assembly knows, the Geneva Declaration on Palestine and the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights adopted by the Conference[1] reaffirmed the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people and underlined the fact that Israel must withdraw from all the occupied territories, including Jerusalem. The Conference also called for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East. In spite of that appeal, in spite of the adoption by the General Assembly of resolutions on that question and in spite of the efforts and consultations of the Secretary-General concerning the convening of the conference, the United States and Israel took a negative stand and rejected the proposal.

78. The United States continues to obstruct efforts towards peace in the region carried out within the framework of the United Nations and in keeping with its resolutions. It is trying to impose partial and separate solutions that the Palestinian people and the Arab nation have already rejected. Such United States attempts will not contribute to peace in the Middle East; rather, they have caused conflicts and massacres, from whose destructive effects and consequences both the Palestinian people and the brother Lebanese people continue to suffer.

Mr. Lusaka (Zambia) resumed the Chair.

79. The period in question was characterized by the efforts of the Israeli authorities to prepare as far as possible the material conditions for the annexation of the occupied territories. The former Israeli Minister of Defence, Moshe Arens, expressed that policy by stating: "We quickly reach the point where irreversible facts become the basis of our control over Judea and Samaria"—that is, the West Bank. For that purpose, the Israeli authorities have intensified their terrorist practices against the Palestinian people in that region so as to force them to leave their lands. Even more serious during this period was a series of bomb explosions aimed at Palestinian population centres, as well as Christian and Muslim places of worship, in numerous occupied Palestinian towns and villages.

80. Examples of those incidents include the cowardly attack on the University of Hebron and on a Palestinian civilian bus in Jerusalem. Before that, there were expulsions, deportations, arrests, the imposition of exorbitant fines, house arrests, curfews, and the demolition of houses in Nablus, Hebron, Jerusalem and Ramallah. Also, Al-Najah University and schools and colleges in the city of Nablus were closed down for a long period. These measures were accompanied by attacks on holy and cultural landmarks in the occupied territories, prominent among which were the attempts to blow up the Al-Aqsa Mosque and the Omar Mosque, the attempt to set fire to the Saaddin Mosque in Nablus and the attack on the Ibrahimi Mosque in Hebron.

81. To complement this aggressive policy, a plan was officially announced in Israel aimed at removing the Palestinian refugee camps in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and resettling the refugees. That is what is happening, for example, in the Dheisheh camp, which is run by UNRWA.

82. In the field of education, the cultural war launched by the Israeli occupation authorities has acquired serious dimensions which should not go unnoticed. Educational institutions were among the main targets of Israel's aggressive policy aimed at paralysing them and obstructing them in their job of educating the young generation and preparing it to play its role in the service of its country and society. That is why the Israeli military authorities have placed these institutions under their direct control, have prohibited the circulation and publication of thousands of scientific, cultural and literary works, and have subjected students, teachers and university professors to oppression and terror, such as individual and collective arrests, limitation of residence areas and arbitrary expulsions.

83. Because of these internal crises and the deteriorating internal economic situation, both of which are tightening their grip on Israel, the economic and social conditions of the Palestinians under occupation have worsened and their daily lives have become unbearable. As a result of the Israeli policy of aggression against both the Palestinian and the Lebanese peoples, of the numerous wars launched by Israel against the Arab States, of the allocation of the larger part of its budget to military affairs and to expenditures on occupation and the establishment of settlements, the Israeli economy is in a state of collapse. The inflation rate, which grows daily, has reached approximately 800 per cent. This situation has produced harmful effects and Fascist phenomena that are extremely dangerous for our people.

84. The greatest expression of this entrenched crisis in the Israeli military society is perhaps the success of a terrorist, the so-called Kahane, in the recent elections to the Israeli Knesset. This has aroused the fears of the democratic, honest and peace-loving forces in the world and even within Israel itself. We see nothing new in the emergence of the racist Kahane phenomenon. It is, in our opinion, the naked expression of all the official Israeli policies against the Palestinian people over so many years. It would be a mistake to believe that it is an isolated, accidental or temporary phenomenon. There are numerous similar Israeli organizations which enjoy official protection, such as the diverse groups rallied around the "integrated land of Israel" movement, the Tehiya and Gush Emunim, and the like of Kahane in the Mifdal and Herut parties. In view of what we have stated, the daily lives of our people under Israeli occupation have become difficult and bitter. The Palestinians are besieged, pursued and oppressed. They are subjected daily to attacks by armed Zionist gangs. This has made their lives and living conditions very complicated. We declare that the Government of Israel bears full responsibility for what is happening in the occupied territories, for it continues to violate the rules of international law and the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949,[6] and refuses to provide protection and security for the Palestinian population. This makes it necessary for the international community and the United Nations to find ways and means to guarantee adequate protection for the population of the occupied territories.

85. This policy, as we have indicated, has harmed not only the Palestinian people but the Jews themselves. Israeli society has become, as a result of the policy of war and aggression, a disrupted society, suffering from ideological and economic bankruptcy, from social, class and racial contradictions; from international isolation and lack of internal peace. In such an atmosphere, as history teaches us, more extreme Fascist and racist currents find fertile ground. Militaristic elements emerge which attempt to export the internal crisis and contain it through launching new wars. Here we cannot but recall the proverb to the effect that a people which oppresses another people cannot itself be free.

86. I have reviewed the current situation with regard to the question of Palestine and the situation in the Middle East, as well as the new developments which have occurred since the previous session. We do not see any hope concerning the possibility of attaining a comprehensive and just peace as long as the United States and Israel persist in their positions and policies.

87. In spite of the official change in the Government of Israel, on which some have placed their bets, we have not perceived any change in Israeli policy. From the outset we did not pin any hopes on the coming to power of the Labour Party in Israel, for our experience with that party is long and bloody. Its programmes are well known, differing from those of the Likud only in cosmetic details. Both parties want land and reject peace; both refuse to recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people. Both parties insist on building new settlements, expropriating land and persecuting our people. The Labour Party wants a "pure" Jewish State with a clear Jewish majority, even if it has to give up some lands densely populated with Arab inhabitants, while keeping military control, the settlements and Jerusalem. The Likud coalition and its more extreme and racist offshoots want land and the expulsion of the Palestinian people, even if it means resorting to terrorism, massacres and armed violence.

88. Thus, the true option they are putting forward is not "land for peace"; they want only the land, for the peace they are talking about is a peace imposed by force of arms, which is in fact mere capitulation. The recent Israeli elections proved that the entrenched Israeli crisis is more dangerous than many thought it to be and that the true policy of the Israeli leaders is to continue their occupation, war and aggression and their imposition of faits accomplis by force of arms.

89. As we have already stated, it is unfortunate that Israel gets from the United States all the material, military and political support it needs. This provides it with billions of dollars and hundreds of aeroplanes, encouraging it to persist in its expansionist policies and to defy the international community and the resolutions of the United Nations. It is unfortunate also that some Western European States have retreated from their support of a peace process in the region based on recognition of the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination. We call on all those States to play a more positive role in promoting the peace process on that basis.

90. A few days ago, on 29 November, we participated in the commemoration of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People. I should like again to thank all the States which participated in that commemoration, which is rich in meaning for us and for our steadfast people under occupation and in the diaspora. The commemoration reflected the extent of the concern and interest within the international community in putting an end to the injustice and aggression to which our people continues to be subjected. It also reflected the international community's interest in the situation in the Middle East region, a conflict with the question of Palestine at its core. This dangerous situation threatens the peace and security of the entire world.

91. The collective efforts and persistence of the States Members of the United Nations deserve our appreciation and respect. In this regard, we cannot fail to convey our deep thanks to the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and to its Chairman, Mr. Sarré, for their work and their great efforts in performing the tasks entrusted to them by the General Assembly. We hope that the Secretary-General will continue his valuable efforts to convene an international peace conference on the Middle East in accordance with United Nations resolutions, resolutions which we trust will be reaffirmed at this session of the General Assembly.

92. The Palestinian people look towards the United Nations with full confidence and hope that the General Assembly and the Security Council will adopt deterrent measures against the aggressors, not merely resolutions of condemnation and denunciation.

93. I am pleased, on behalf of the Palestinian people, to express our thanks and appreciation to all the friendly States of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, to the socialist countries, and to those States of Africa, Asia, Latin America and Europe that have supported our struggle for freedom, sovereignty and independence.

94. We have followed the activities of the non-governmental organizations and have taken note of their positions as expressed in the statements and programmes of action they have adopted after the meetings organized for them by the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. There is no doubt that the role played by these organizations in awakening world public opinion will have an effective impact, especially as they have launched a global campaign to collect hundreds of thousands of signatures from lovers of peace, justice and humanity in solidarity with the struggle of the Palestinian people and in favour of convening a peace conference on the basis of United Nations resolutions—the conference for which this Assembly has called.

95. I should like also to express our absolute solidarity with the struggle of the people of Namibia, under the leadership of its legitimate representative, the South West Africa People's Organization, as well as with the struggle of the people of South Africa against the racist régime in that country, and with all those throughout the world who are struggling for freedom and independence.

96. In view of all these facts and events, the Palestinian people are determined to continue their struggle for their national rights by all means. We count on the assistance and support of the States Members of the United Nations for our just cause. The situation in the Middle East region will continue to be tense and explosive as long as the Palestinian people continue to live in refugee camps and to be dispersed and deprived of their inalienable rights.

97. Everyone, in the United Nations and everywhere else, must continue the struggle to save peace by restoring the rights of the Palestinian people to return to its land, to exercise self-determination and to establish an independent State on its own national soil.

98. Mr. ABULHASSAN (Kuwait) (interpretation from Arabic): In his message to the meeting held on 29 November 1984 in commemoration of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, Sheikh Jaber Al-Ahmed Al-Sabah, Emir of the State of Kuwait, said the following:

> "One might well wonder why it is that, 36 years after the catastrophe struck that people, no one has remedied the injustice done to them or taken any resolute action for the implementation of United Nations resolutions, at the very least. If that demonstrates anything it is the lack of seriousness of the big Powers and the indifference of the international community in general, while the aggressor persists in its arbitrary measures and violations, treating international law and the Charter of the United Nations with contempt. Could this aggressor have dared so to transgress had it not been for the unrestricted material support it receives from those in certain quarters that do not understand that by giving such support they are undermining the foundations upon which international legitimacy is itself based?"

99. In the light of the foregoing, it is clear to us that from the outset the Palestinian problem and its ramifications have been dominated by three major elements: first, the unilateral imposition by the Zionist entity of one fait accompli after another, employing absolutely despotic force; secondly, the inability of the United Nations to stop this stream of inhumane attacks and practices and to restore the rights of its victims; and, thirdly, the unrestrained support and buttressing, from certain quarters, of Israel's policies and practices.

100. With regard to the first of these elements, United Nations documents from 1948 up to our own day reflect precisely what Israel has done in uprooting and dispersing a peaceful people from its homeland, pursuing it wherever it may be in order to annihilate it, thus violating its most elementary human rights as set forth in the relevant Geneva conventions. Israel has also deliberately attempted to change the social, cultural, demographic and environmental character of the Arab lands in order to eradicate the racial, historical, economic and cultural identity of the Palestinian people.

101. The Palestinian answer to this has been constantly to increase the quality and scope of its resistance and its steadfastness in the occupied territories, despite the most violent acts of repression and torture committed by Israel to suppress those uprisings. While it salutes and absolutely supports the honourable struggle and the steadfastness of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories in preserving their natural rights, Kuwait reiterates that people who fight in order to regain their freedom, their right to self-determination and their independence cannot remain alone. History has made that clear to us. Such fighters will always prove stronger than those who try to dominate them.

102. With regard to the second element that dominates the Palestinian problem—namely, the inability of the United Nations to stem this stream of inhumane attacks and practices—we do not mean to imply that the Organization has been observing the situation with indifference. We are fully aware of the important role played by the Organization in support of the inalienable, legitimate rights of the Palestinian people. But it is clear that the Security Council and the General Assembly are approaching the Palestinian question in two different ways.

103. The Security Council, which is subject to the use of the veto by some of the big Powers that have a special relationship with Israel, takes an unrealistic view of the question of Palestine. It treats it as a refugee problem, as demonstrated by its resolution 242 (1967), and its resolutions are subordinate to the acts of those big Powers which so far have made it impossible for the United Nations to restrain Israel and put an end to its continuing defiance of and contempt for international law and the resolutions of the Security Council itself.

104. We believe that the General Assembly has taken the correct view of the Palestinian problem. In 1969 and 1970, the General Assembly recognized for the first time the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including its right to self-determination, and also recognized that respect for those rights was an indispensable element for the establishment of a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East. When the Arab Summit Conference held at Rabat in 1974 recognized the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, the General Assembly, in that same year, established a new principle when it decided to invite the PLO to participate in its deliberations as an observer [resolution 3237 (XXIX)].

105. This new concept of the dimensions of the Palestinian problem on the part of the General Assembly made it necessary for us to seek effective means to enable the Palestinian people to exercise its inalienable rights. This led to the proposal to establish a special committee to undertake comprehensive studies on this problem and recommend the best way of solving it. Thus, the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People was established, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 3376 (XXX), and began its work during the thirty-first session.

106. The Committee has made enormous efforts to clarify the various aspects, dimensions and ambiguities of the Palestinian problem, crowning these efforts with the holding at Geneva, from 29 August to 7 September 1983, of the International Conference on the Question of Palestine. The Conference adopted the Geneva Declaration on Palestine,[1] which clarified the broad outlines of the Palestinian problem on the basis of the relevant United Nations resolutions, and the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights.[1]

107. In addition, the Committee has continued to follow the Israeli policy of establishing Jewish settlements in the occupied Palestinian territories. Particularly noteworthy in this respect was the valuable report on the danger of the continuing establishment of Israeli settlements in the Palestinian and Arab territories occupied since 1967, submitted on 25 November 1980 by the Commission established under Security Council resolution 446 (1979).[7] In spite of that and the insistence of the Committee, the Security Council has not yet examined this matter. However, both the General Assembly and the Security Council have declared these Israeli practices to be illegal.

108. The most important recommendation in the Geneva Declaration on Palestine is that which appears in paragraph 5, regarding the holding of an international peace conference on the Middle East on the basis of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the relevant resolutions of the Organization, with the aim of achieving a comprehensive, just and lasting solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, an essential element of which would be the establishment of an independent Palestinian State in Palestine. The General Assembly endorsed this proposal in its resolution 38/58C, and the Secretary-General sent messages to the countries concerned requesting their opinion on the convening of the conference. As usual, he came up against the refusal of Israel and, unfortunately, of the United States, despite the fact that all other countries concerned welcomed the convening of the conference.

109. My delegation, which considers the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People as the true conscience with regard to the problem of Palestine, would like to thank its Chairman, Mr. Sarré, and the members of the Committee for the valuable efforts they are making. The Committee has expressed, in its report to the current session [A/39/35], its regret at the negative position of Israel and the United States on this matter, and we join in that expression. We also support the Committee's resolution on the continuation of efforts to convene the proposed conference as soon as possible, particularly since, in its view, it represents a long-awaited important step. The situation is becoming increasingly dangerous day by day as a result of Israel's feeling of complete immunity, which makes it act as if it had the last word on every matter concerning the Middle East. For the same reason, Kuwait has supported the Soviet initiative of 15 September 1982[4] to convene an international conference to be attended, on an equal footing, by all parties to the conflict, including the PLO.

110. As regards the third, and last element, which continues to affect the Palestinian problem and its ramifications—namely, the unreasonable support and encouragement that Israel receives from certain quarters—we ask the question: Could the aggressor have dared undertake its transgressions had it not been for the unlimited protection and support it receives from Powers that are entrusted with a special responsibility in the maintenance of international peace and security? The unmatched United States support, for example, has led to Israel's persistence in perpetrating its crimes against the Palestinian people. Those crimes are sufficient in themselves to make Israel an entity hostile to peace and humanity; they also create in the United Nations a feeling of failure and complete impotence in the face of actions by an entity that is based on the principle of aggression and usurpation. This in turn reflects on the reputation, authority and effectiveness of the United Nations.

111. We have seen how many years ago the General Assembly parted company with the Security Council to the extent that the two bodies seem unrelated to the same Organization and appear not to believe in the same Charter or to work for the same objective—peace and stability in the world.

112. The strange reluctance of the Security Council to take action against measures it considers illegal—action that is recommended in the report of the Committee—is highlighted by the fact that the General Assembly has already set out the just and reasonable path towards the solution of this problem based on a series of resolutions recognizing the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to self-determination, to return to their homeland and to establish a State on their national soil.

113. This parting of company is, in the opinion of my delegation, the basic reason for the continuation of the problem. It has been frequently confirmed by General Assembly resolutions that world peace and security depend on its solution. As long as some major Powers having special responsibilities reject any movement towards a solution under the pretext that it is not acceptable to Israel, the road ahead of us will remain dark, not because this humanitarian problem will have remained beyond solution or the Palestinian people continued to be dispersed and deprived of their rights in this age when most peoples that were oppressed have gained their independence and sovereignty, but because some of the major Powers, the repositories of world peace and security, will have confirmed by their actions that they want only one kind of peace—a peace that serves their own purposes.

114. In its tireless quest to participate in solving the Palestinian problem through a just solution guaranteeing the natural and legal rights of the Palestinian people, the PLO has accepted the Arab peace plan, adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference,[3] as the basis for a just solution of that problem. It has agreed to the idea of an international peace conference on the Middle East advocated by the United Nations. It has also accepted the Soviet initiative on the convening of an international conference to be attended by all parties to the conflict, including the PLO. However, Israel has rejected every peace proposal, whether international or regional. It has rejected the United Nations framework, with its international legitimacy, for discussing the problem with all parties concerned and has presented no alternative but more aggression, repression and genocide. The Israeli leadership has fully understood that the most dangerous prospect facing it is peace, because the essence of its doctrine is aggression and its philosophy is expansion.

115. This explosive problem which has lasted so long constitutes a challenge to the international community in general and to the major Powers in particular, as well as to international legitimacy represented by the United Nations. The time has come to solve it, to put an end to injustice and to begin to restore what is right. The solution of this problem can bring about stability and peace in the Middle East and strengthen world peace and stability.

116. Mr. ALIAS (Malaysia): In our many years of discussion on this item, for the overwhelming majority of us here in the Assembly there is no doubt in our minds that unless the question of Palestine is satisfactorily resolved there can be little hope for peace in the Middle East. By definition, a comprehensive solution must include the restoration of all Arab lands which Israel has acquired through its wars of aggression since 1967 and, equally paramount, the restoration of the inalienable rights of the Palestinians to self-determination and to their own homeland. Indeed, there can be no doubt that the question of Palestine constitutes the core of the problem in the Middle East. As long as the problem is allowed to languish, there can be no end to the climate of conflict which has hovered over the region for so long and which on several occasions has led the world to the brink of disaster.

117. None can accuse the United Nations of lack of trying, for over the last four decades a large number of resolutions have been adopted in our search for an end to the conflict. Many of the resolutions contain elements which could pave the way for peace. However, Israel has chosen to ignore all pronouncements of the international community and has refused to abandon the path of aggression and force. Israel is encouraged in its intransigence and open defiance through the protection and active sympathy of a single major Power, justified by consideration of Israel's survival and absolute strategic necessity. At all costs, right or wrong, Israel must be protected, even if it chooses to bite the hand that feeds it. The situation is comparable to a carte blanche which is continually extended to a chronic embezzler even if it proves the ruination of us all.

118. Hence, it is no mystery that the United Nations has thus far been unable to convince Israel that the best course for it and, indeed, for the security of the world is through a comprehensive settlement, fair to all, including the Palestinian people. For how can Israel justify its right to exist while denying the same to others? How can Israel continue to deny the reality of the Palestinian people? Notwithstanding the partition of Palestine and the dispossession of a whole people; in spite of their dispersal and the indignities of having to live as refugees; despite the awesome ferocity of Israel's military might unleashed on them; despite all that, the people of Palestine have steadfastly refused to disavow their common heritage as Palestinians. Surely, the Palestinians have proved beyond question that they are a people entitled to their own nation. Truly, the Palestinians embody the spirit of man, which under the yoke of tyranny grows in resoluteness rather than crumbles.

119. The report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People [ibid.] once again reveals Israel's complete disrespect for the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people. The Tel Aviv régime continues unabated in its policy of annexation of Arab lands through eviction and a variety of coercive measures, implanting Jewish settlers among the indigenous population. While new Jewish settlements are being established, existing settlements are being enlarged. Israel also plans to extend its legislation to the occupied territory. The report states:

> "Longer-term trends are ominous . . . indications are that the Israeli Government will continue to establish settlements in the occupied territories aiming at a projected minimum of 100,000 Israelis in such settlements by 1987 and 190,000 by the year 2010. The numbers exclude Israelis in East Jerusalem and other Palestinian localities incorporated into the city immediately after the 1967 war." [Ibid., para. 28.]

120. The Jewish settlers, who are issued firearms by the Israeli authorities, frequently intimidate and harass the local population. The most recent example of atrocities committed by Jewish terrorists is the attack on a bus carrying Arabs, resulting in one death and many injuries. Subsequently, two Arab student demonstrators were killed and many more injured by the Israeli military. Places of religious worship have been desecrated by Jewish terrorist groups.

121. The list of Israeli practices against the inalienable rights of Palestinians goes on. In the interest of brevity, I shall not attempt to state them all; the report is there for all to read. Suffice it to say that the thrust of Israel's policy is further to disperse the Palestinian people and render their situation so disagreeable that they will choose to leave, thus furthering Israel's objective of annexing the occupied territories.

122. I submit that, despite the seeming inability of the international community to dissuade Israel from continuing the present course, and despite Israel's complete disrespect for the many United Nations resolutions, it remains the sacred duty of the Assembly to continue in its efforts to seek justice for the Palestinian people. It is particularly incumbent upon us to persevere in our efforts for a comprehensive settlement, given that an indefinite continuation of the conflict situation in the Middle East may pass the point of restraint, as it has threatened to do on several occasions, with dire consequences for us all.

123. My Government's commitment to a comprehensive and just settlement, which should include the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to their own independent homeland, was illustrated in Malaysia's willingness to host the Asian Regional Preparatory Meeting, held at Kuala Lumpur in May 1983, which was one of the steps which led to the convening of the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva from 29 August to 7 September 1983. My Government fully supports the Geneva Declaration on Palestine and the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights, adopted by that conference,[1] as well as the proposal for the convening of an international conference on peace in the Middle East, which was endorsed by the General Assembly in resolution 38/58 C. It is the fervent belief of my delegation that such a conference with the participation of the United States, the Soviet Union and all parties directly involved with the conflict, including the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, would lead to a just solution. My delegation notes with deep concern in the reports of the Secretary-General [A/39/130 and Add.1] that his efforts for the convening of such a conference has not come to fruition. We appeal to the United States to reconsider its decision not to participate, recognizing that the United States has a central role to play, without which no meaningful result can be achieved.

124. We believe that within the confines of such a conference rests the possibility of a just, comprehensive and lasting settlement, fair to all parties. To reject such an opportunity outright is to encourage further the intransigence of Israel; to refuse to recognize the legitimacy of the PLO is to deny the aspirations and the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and their own homeland.

125. We congratulate the Secretary-General on his efforts and urge him to continue his consultations despite the obstacles in his way.

126. Before concluding, my delegation would be remiss if it did not compliment the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, Mr. Sarré, who has worked tirelessly and with such distinction. His commitment to a just solution to the Palestinian question is known to us all, and his dedication is an inspiration to all in the Committee. My delegation reiterates our continued support for Mr. Sarré and the Committee.

127. Mr. PASHKEVICH (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) (interpretation from Russian): On behalf of the delegation of the Byelorussian SSR, I warmly welcome the delegation of the PLO that is attending this session of the General Assembly. It represents here the heroic Palestinian people, which is waging a courageous and selfless struggle for the exercise of its inalienable national rights.

128. The question of ensuring the exercise by the Arab people of Palestine of their inalienable national rights is the core of a Middle East settlement. The Palestine problem has been constantly on the agenda of the General Assembly and of other international forums. Numerous United Nations resolutions, including those adopted at previous Assembly sessions, reaffirm the need for the exercise by the Palestinian people of its legitimate, inalienable rights, including the right of return, the right to self-determination and the right to establish its own State. In those resolutions, also, the right of the PLO to participate on an equal footing in the solution of all questions relating to the Middle East is recognized. But, despite all those decisions, including General Assembly resolution 181 (II), the Palestine problem remains unsolved. The Palestinian people is still deprived of a homeland and of its State and is forced to wander in exile or to languish under the oppressive yoke of Israeli military occupation. It is denied the exercise of its inalienable right to self-determination and to the creation of its own State.

129. The reasons for this situation are well known. They lie first and foremost in the aggressive, expansionist policy of Israel, a policy directed against Arab countries and peoples; in its illegal occupation of Arab lands, including Palestinian lands which it seized in 1967; and in its stubborn refusal to restore the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people.

130. As is attested to by the reports of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People [A/39/35] and the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practice Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories [A/39/591], as well as by other documents submitted for consideration at the present session of the General Assembly, Israel—in violation of many Security Council and General Assembly resolutions—continues to follow a policy of annexation of the Arab territories it has occupied, including the Palestinian territories, and has been expanding the network of militarized settlements, thereby stifling the economic activity of the Arab population, depriving it of its political, social, civil and educational rights and destroying its cultural heritage.

131. As is noted in the letter dated 26 November 1984 from the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People addressed to the Secretary-General: "Israel is increasingly resorting to drastic repressive measures in order to stifle any expression of opposition to its illegal occupation of the Palestinian territories" see A/39/692]. Racism reigns in the occupied Arab territories.

132. The outrageous acts perpetrated by Israeli terrorists against Palestinians have now acquired such dimensions that Tel Aviv is forced, in order to mislead public opinion, to officially take some measures to try to save face. But what kind of measures are they? I shall quote from a statement by Felicia Langer, the Vice-President of the Israeli League for Human and Civil Rights, in connection with the trial of members of the recently discovered anti-Arab terrorist group:

> "The sentences are simply ridiculous. One of the terrorists was given one and one half years—and he had transported 40 mines to be set to explode in a crowded mosque. Their hands are already bloodstained. They have killed Arab students and Palestinian mayors—and they get one and one half years. And, on the West Bank, a new law decrees that small Arab boys who throw stones at the occupiers be given sentences of 10 to 20 years."

133. Who are these terrorists? Why does the police treat them like heroes? Why are they given privileged conditions even in prison? The answer is simple—both simple and frightening: they belong to the Gush Emunim movement, zealous advocates of the colonization of the occupied lands. That means that they are the Likud's flesh and blood.

134. It is perfectly obvious that the aggressive policy of Israel, especially as it affects the Arab people of Palestine, would be impossible without the comprehensive support of its strategic ally, the United States. This is in fact the major obstacle to a solution to the entire problem of the Middle East and of its core, the question of Palestine.

135. For example, the Secretary-General of the League of Arab States, speaking last July at Tunis, stated:

> "The Israeli leadership perpetrates all of its crimes thanks to the full support of Washington. Taking advantage of the favourable attitude of the United States, Israel violates international principles, continues its occupation of Arab lands and escalates active aggression carried out against neighbouring countries. It expels the Arab population from their own lands and by force and terrorism imposes the policy of expansion of Israeli settlements; and carries out 'Judaization' of Arab cities and historic sites."

136. In June of this year, The Washington Post wrote:

> "Can one imagine another country, an ally of the United States, which, having decided to embark on a policy of irresponsible adventurism, would not have been subject to severe retaliation from Washington? But after all of its actions, Israel began to receive ever-increased aid from the United States. For that country we have a 'double standard'."

137. The reason for such generosity and for such a policy is simple. Tel Aviv assists Washington in achieving the establishment of its domination in the Middle East.

138. The policy and practical actions of the United States and Israel in the Middle East once again clearly demonstrate the aggressive nature of the so-called strategic alliance of the forces of imperialism and Zionism, which aspire not only to block the implementation of the inalienable rights of the Arab people of Palestine, but also to remove the question of Palestine, once and for all, from the agenda by isolating the Arabs and forcing them thus to capitulate to the aggressor.

139. In this connection, what is of the greatest significance is the strengthening of co-operation between the Palestinian resistance movement and the national patriotic forces with Arab countries and, first and foremost, with those that are in the front lines of resistance to the aggressive intentions of the United States and Israel in the Middle East.

140. The most recent events in the Middle East emphasize yet once again the fruitlessness of the so-called separatist approach to a decision on the problem of the Middle East. This is a policy followed by Washington which consists in forcing each Arab country to come to an agreement separately and, moreover, in so doing ignoring the vital interests of the Palestinians. Historic experience convinces us that by following such a policy, it is impossible to defuse the situation in the Middle East and to provide its peoples with lasting peace.

141. The delegation of the Byelorussian SSR, in accordance with the programme for peace for the 1980s, adopted by the XXVI Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, consistently and firmly stands by the victims of imperialist aggression and favours the elimination of conflict situations and a settlement of thorny problems and crises, inter alia, in the Middle East.

142. The proposals of the Soviet Union for a Middle East settlement of 29 July 1984 [A/39/368] give both an overview and a summary of those initiatives which have been taken by our country at various stages of the development of the Arab-Israeli conflict. It states the principles and means for achieving a settlement in the Middle East.

143. The Soviet proposal for the convening of an international conference on the Middle East, with the participation of all parties involved, has won broad approval and support throughout the world. And only two States, the United States and Israel, actively oppose the holding of such a conference.

144. It is perfectly obvious that the sooner Washington and Tel Aviv show an attitude of responsibility and common sense which can prevail over the considerations of the moment, the better, for the gloomy experience of decades has demonstrated that neither a policy of military conflicts nor a policy of separate deals can possibly bring peace to the Middle East or ensure the inalienable rights of the Arab people of Palestine. That can be done only as the result of peaceful negotiations on a collective basis, with the participation of all the parties involved. It is precisely such an approach to a solution of the problem of the Middle East which is actively favoured by the Soviet Union, the socialist States and many other countries.

The meeting rose at 1.15 p.m.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

THIRTY-NINTH SESSION

89th PLENARY MEETING

Thursday, 6 December 1984, at 3.20 p.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

AGENDA ITEM 33

Question of Palestine (continued):

(a) Report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People;

(b) Report of the Secretary-General

1. The PRESIDENT: I should like to remind representatives that, in accordance with the decision taken this morning [88th meeting], the list of speakers in the debate on agenda item 33 will be closed tomorrow, 7 December, at 12 noon.

2. Mr. FERM (Sweden): A few days ago the Assembly was discussing the situation in the Middle East. During the debate many delegations expressed their firm conviction that the question of Palestine remains the core of the conflict in that part of the world. That is also the view held by the Swedish Government.

3. Countless efforts have been made within the United Nations during the past several decades in the pursuit of a peaceful solution to the problem, and rightly, because this question touches upon fundamental aspects of peace and security, of international law and of humanitarian principles.

4. To put it simply, we are discussing the claims of two peoples to the same geographical area. We know the arguments; they have been put forward by the two sides during this session of the General Assembly, as they have so many times in the past. All sides in the conflict say that they want peace, and we do not doubt that. The question is: What price are the parties prepared to pay for that peace? Is Israel prepared to give up its territorial claims and withdraw from the occupied territories? Is the Arab side willing to accept the Israeli State and acknowledge its right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries?

5. We hope that the voice of reason and compromise will eventually prevail in the region and that the answers to these questions will be in the affirmative.

6. The corner-stone of a fair and peaceful solution is already laid. The main elements are present in a few essential resolutions adopted by the Security Council and the General Assembly. General Assembly resolution 181 (II) of 29 November 1947 recognized the national rights of the two peoples concerned and provided the legal foundation for two sovereign States in mandated Palestine. The 37 years that have elapsed since then have seen many changes and dramatic developments, including five major wars in the region. It would not be realistic, therefore, to attempt to revive and implement the letter of that resolution. Nevertheless, the basic concept of resolution 181 (II) remains valid. Indeed, the United Nations has a special responsibility to pursue a solution that gives the Palestinians themselves a real opportunity to fulfil their national aspirations. It is not for us to tell the Palestinians how they should exercise their right to self-determination, nor is it for Israel or any other country to dictate these matters.

7. In important respects, Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) provide an adequate basis for negotiations towards a comprehensive settlement. My Government's understanding of the essential thrust of those two resolutions is that as a result of negotiations Israel would withdraw from the territories occupied in 1967. Israel's neighbours would give full recognition to Israel's right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries.

8. It is clear that a comprehensive settlement cannot be arrived at without the direct participation of the principal parties, including Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization [PLO], as well as those Arab States that are directly affected. The strategic realities make it essential that the major Powers should be party to such negotiations. A possible forum for the negotiations was indicated in the call by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva from 29 August to 7 September 1983, for an international peace conference, a call confirmed by the General Assembly. The United Nations provides appropriate machinery in the search for a solution to the conflict.

9. My Government views with serious concern some of the ongoing developments in the Middle East. The prospects for the eventual fulfilment of Palestinian national aspirations have suffered severe set-backs during the last few years. The continued Israeli policy of illegal settlements and various repressive measures directed against the Palestinian population in the West Bank and Gaza must be condemned.

10. Israel and some Arab countries have made obvious attempts to influence political processes among the Palestinians. The primary aim of such actions has apparently been either to eliminate the PLO as the leading Palestinian political force or to manipulate that organization's policies and leadership. My Government regards such attempts as harmful to the prospects for a lasting peace in the region.

11. A cause of concern continues to be the situation of Palestinian refugees in Lebanon. The responsibility for the safety of the Palestinians living in southern Lebanon rests for the moment with Israel as the occupying Power. Likewise, Syria must assume responsibility for the welfare of those refugees who live in areas under Syrian control.

12. My Government hopes that the talks in Naqoura will eventually lead to the long-overdue Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon. The responsibility for the protection of civilians will then be assumed by the Government of Lebanon. Should the Government of Lebanon seek assistance in order to fulfil its obligations in this regard, the international community should consider it its duty to render such assistance as may be possible.

13. The list of victims of this long conflict grows each day. Soldiers, innocent civilians and seekers of peace alike have shed their blood. It is 36 years now since my own countryman, Folke Bernadotte, gave his life for the dream of peace. That is too long and there has been too much blood. The negotiating table has been empty for too long.

14. Mr. AL-ANSI (Oman) (interpretation from Arabic): Once again the question of Palestine is before the General Assembly, where it has been considered in regular and special sessions since the founding of the United Nations.

15. It has taken on the characteristics of the problems for the solution of which the international community has looked to the United Nations as a forum that would establish peace and security in the world and achieve economic and social development for the benefit of all mankind.

16. Hence, discussion of the question of Palestine in the United Nations makes possible a better awareness of the Organization and of the way in which it deals with problems and obstacles that prevent it from implementing its resolutions. The will of the United Nations is but the collective expression of all its Member States. Had the international will been exercised with respect to this problem which has been with us for such a long time without any practical solution, it would no longer be so difficult to find a just and lasting solution.

17. Although the problem has many ramifications and various elements, it is obvious that a people has been driven out of its land by force but that it remains determined to regain its homeland. It has expressed this determination by all legitimate means recognized in the norms of international law. No people in the world has shown such determination without the international community having acted favourably on its behalf and supported its right to self-determination as a first step towards independence and sovereignty. The people of Palestine is no exception to this rule. It is the repository of a desire which is upheld by all peoples of the world that cherish peace and freedom.

18. International law recognizes the right of the Palestinian people to return to their families, their homes and their land. Furthermore, the United Nations made a pledge to the Palestinian people in 1947 and has reaffirmed year after year its right to return, to self-determination and to the establishment of its own independent State on its ancestral land.

19. The position of my Government on the legitimate and inalienable rights of the Arab people of Palestine has not changed. That position was confirmed by our Minister of State for Foreign Affairs in his statement to the General Assembly on 5 October 1984 when he said:

> "Given that situation, it is necessary to intensify our efforts to observe more strictly the international legal norms and the principles and Charter of the United Nations, and to respect and implement the Organization's resolutions. The United Nations is the only organization capable of ridding mankind of the spectre of chaos, war and hunger.
> "The Assembly's agenda is composed of numerous, complicated items requiring concerted action by all countries of the world. Perhaps one of the most important and complex matters that have faced the Organization since its establishment is the question of the Palestinian people. It is now high time for Israel to understand that the only road to peace is through dialogue and negotiation, leading to a just solution that will restore the dignity of the Palestinian people and ensure their legitimate right to self-determination, including the right to establish their own independent State. Israel must also understand that resort to the use of force cannot guarantee its peace or security. It will not be able to achieve stability or ensure its interests if it persists in ignoring the interests of the Palestinians and continues to violate the sovereignty and security of neighbouring States.
> "Israel's rejection of the various peace initiatives and its frustration of all attempts to solve the Palestinian question make it responsible for the state of war and tension prevailing in the Middle East.
> "The Sultanate of Oman, which has supported all the efforts of those who seek peace in the region and work to achieve it, endorses the Geneva Declaration on Palestine calling for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East, in which all the interested parties would participate. The endorsement by the General Assembly, at its last session, of the guidelines of the Geneva Declaration calling for the attainment by the Palestinian people of their inalienable, legitimate rights is an important step in the context of international efforts to achieve a political settlement of this conflict. We understand full well, however, that no conference will succeed without the participation of all the parties concerned.
> "We consider the Palestinian-Jordanian rapprochement, as evidenced by the continued and intensified bilateral talks, to be a positive and encouraging factor for mobilizing the Arab efforts and setting the stage for decisive action aimed at achieving a political solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict." [23rd meeting, paras. 125-129.]

20. The international community is duty-bound to support the legitimacy of the Palestinian people as represented by the PLO and the national institutions of the Palestinian people. The PLO is the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinians who are continuing their struggle.

21. We are very pleased at the success of the Palestine National Council, which recently met at Amman and which reaffirmed the strength and wisdom of the enlightened national leadership of the Palestinian people.

22. We wish to pay a tribute to the Secretary-General for his role and for his sustained efforts, as borne out in his reports to the General Assembly and the Security Council [A/39/130 and Add.1].

23. We appreciate the specific efforts made by the many international committees under United Nations auspices, especially those of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, and the efforts made in commemorating the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, which is observed each year on 29 November. Similarly, we pay a tribute to the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories and to other United Nations and international bodies.

24. We hope that the international community will continue to search for a just solution of the Palestinian problem, and we believe that that would also resolve the question of other Arab territories under Israeli occupation, so that a just and lasting peace may prevail in the Middle East and all the inhabitants of that important region of the world may live in peace and harmony. We must also seek to put an end to the chronic international problems in the world today which result in destruction everywhere.

25. Our concerted action to bring about a solution to the problem of Palestine will benefit the entire international community without exception.

26. Mr. KRISHNAN (India): We are once again considering the question of Palestine, an item which has remained intractably on the agenda of the General Assembly for several decades now. Recent years have witnessed great vicissitudes in the plight of the Palestinian people and their brave struggle for national independence. A valiant people continue to remain deprived of their homes. Their lands, even beyond those defined by the United Nations at the time of the partition of Palestine, have been forcibly occupied. Numerous resolutions on the subject adopted by the United Nations remain unimplemented. Israel continues forcibly to occupy Arab lands and to thwart the will of the international community. Israel is also vigorously continuing with the policy of establishing settlements in the West Bank. As a result, the entire region of western Asia is in the grip of constant turmoil and tension with a possibility of their escalation into a wider, all-encompassing conflict.

27. Recent developments in the Middle East have introduced even more complex and dangerous elements into an already complicated situation. Israel's continued occupation of Lebanon in defiance of Security Council resolutions 508 (1982) and 509 (1982), its harassment and intimidation of the Palestinian and Lebanese people, the dispersal of Palestinians against their will into neighbouring States and Israel's policy of establishing new settlements are part of its policy seeking to consolidate its stranglehold over the occupied Arab territories and to annex them.

28. India's own sympathy for the people of Palestine and support for the establishment of a Palestinian State are rooted in our awareness of the historical, territorial and national identity of the Palestinians. Even during the days of our struggle for national independence, our leaders identified themselves with the Palestinian cause and raised their voices in support of the establishment of an independent Palestinian homeland. The continuing struggle of the brave Palestinians evokes sympathy and understanding among the people of India to this day. The decision to partition Palestine was taken in the same year as India became independent. India secured its independence, but the people of Palestine were banished from their own lands. Many countries since then have also become free and are now masters of their own destinies. However, the Palestinians not only remain homeless, but even more of their lands have since been occupied. As the late Prime Minister of India, Mrs. Indira Gandhi, recalled in her closing address to the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi in March 1983:

> "millions are still denied their birthright—for instance, the Palestinians, Namibians and the people of South Africa. His Excellency Chairman Yasser Arafat and His Excellency Chairman Sam Nujoma have honoured us with their presence. Yet they are barred from their own homes."[1]

29. India has consistently advocated that a just and comprehensive solution to the problems of western Asia should comprise the exercise by the Palestinian people of their inalienable national and human rights, including the right to establish an independent State in their homeland, the total and unconditional withdrawal by Israel from all Arab territories occupied since 1967, including the Holy City of Jerusalem, and a guarantee for all States in the region, including Palestine, to live within secure and recognized borders. In our view, the Palestinians have a right to return to their homes and property in Palestine, from which they have been mercilessly displaced and uprooted. Their right to self-determination should be exercised without any external interference and, like other States in the region, the State of Palestine should be enabled to live in peace and security and follow its own domestic and foreign policies. An essential prerequisite for the attainment of a peaceful solution is the full and equal participation of the PLO, the only genuine representative of the Palestinian people, in any discussions relating to their future and, indeed, the future of the entire region.

30. The efforts by the international community to find a comprehensive solution of the problem of the Middle East, the core of which is the question of Palestine, received a fresh impetus at the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983. General Assembly resolution 38/58 C, adopted by an overwhelming majority last year, endorsed the Geneva Declaration on Palestine[2] and its call for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East. The Geneva Declaration had envisaged that the proposed peace conference, to be convened under the auspices of the United Nations with the participation of all the parties to the Arab-Israeli conflict, including the PLO, as well as the United States, the Soviet Union and other concerned States, on an equal footing, would take as its basis the internationally recognized guidelines endorsed at the International Conference on the Question of Palestine.

31. It will be recalled that resolution 38/58 C requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Security Council, urgently to undertake preparatory measures to convene the conference and to report on his efforts no later than 15 March 1984. We are indeed grateful to the Secretary-General for initiating a process of consultations, in pursuance of resolution 38/58 C, with the members of the Security Council and with other concerned States for the convening of the proposed peace conference. In our own response [see A/39/227] to the Secretary-General's letter of 9 March 1984, the Government of India conveyed its broad agreement with the plan of action proposed by the Secretary-General. However, we suggested that some flexibility be retained in the selection of participants for the conference. In the time-frame for the convening of the conference, it was our view that the situation in western Asia did not brook any delay and that urgent preparatory measures should be undertaken so that the conference could be convened at the earliest possible time.

32. While most of the States consulted have indicated their agreement to the proposed peace conference, we deeply regret that some others have not found it possible to do so. In his report on the situation in the Middle East, the Secretary-General stated that:

> "The history of the Arab-Israeli conflict in the Middle East and of the Palestine question has thus been a long record of missed opportunities punctuated by wars and violence that have only served to complicate the situation further and to create new misery and new obstacles to peace." [See A/39/600, para. 42.]

Indeed the time has come to pursue with determination our search for ways and means to remedy the injustice done to the Palestinian people and to find an early solution to the tragic conflict. The negative attitude of a handful of States to the proposed peace conference has led the Secretary-General to conclude in his report that "the conditions required for convening the proposed conference with any chance of success are not met at the present time" [ibid., para. 40].

33. Time is of the essence, and delay does not facilitate a solution of the problem in the Middle East. We therefore view with interest, as an interim measure, the proposal of the Secretary-General, contained in his report, "of using the machinery of the Security Council in a new way to work with the parties concerned on various aspects of the Middle East problem and to distil from the various proposals and plans that have been put forward in recent years the common elements that could help work out the basis of a negotiating structure" [ibid., para. 45]. It is important that a process of negotiations be initiated, the Secretary-General said, "to clear the ground and to prepare for a full-fledged effort to negotiate the problem" [ibid.].

34. The Movement of Non-Aligned Countries has, since its inception, consistently advocated a comprehensive solution to the question of Palestine, the core of the Middle East problem and the root cause of the Arab-Israeli conflict. It is at the initiative of the non-aligned countries that the majority of United Nations resolutions on the subject have been adopted. In the past year, the non-aligned countries have been particularly active in mobilizing international support against Israeli action in occupied territories and its invasion of Lebanon. The non-aligned countries have also reaffirmed their firm opposition to the Israeli practices and policies in occupied Arab and Palestinian territories and called for the withdrawal of Israel from the occupied Syrian Golan Heights. At the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi in March 1983, this question was exhaustively examined. Fundamental principles for the solution of the problem were again reaffirmed. The heads of State or Government affirmed

> "that a just and durable peace in the Middle East cannot be established without the total and unconditional withdrawal of Israel from all Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by it since 1967, including Jerusalem, and without the achievement of a just solution of the problem of Palestine on the basis of the attainment and exercise in Palestine of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including the right . . . to establish the Palestinian independent State in its homeland, Palestine."[3]

35. The Non-Aligned Committee of Eight on Palestine, set up by the New Delhi Conference to "work with the various forces influential in the Middle East conflict for the achievement of a just, durable and comprehensive peace in the Middle East,"[4] has endeavoured during the year to fulfil the mandate entrusted to it by the Conference. The Committee of Eight has maintained its contacts with representatives of various States and with the Secretary-General to pursue the goal of the early convening of the peace conference. The search for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East and active support for and solidarity with our Palestinian brothers has been a fundamental feature of our Movement. The Committee of Eight met in October 1984 at ministerial level and decided to continue its active role in this direction and to spare no effort in support of the inalienable rights of the Arab Palestinian people, in accordance with international law and the will of the non-aligned countries and their peoples.

36. As a member of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, India has fully supported the Committee in its efforts to secure the rights of the Palestinian people and to promote their cause. The report of the Committee [A/39/35] bears testimony to its untiring efforts under the dedicated leadership of Mr. Sarré, of Senegal. Though the basic recommendations of the Committee have remained unimplemented so far, its activities during the year have served to increase the support of the international community for the cause of Palestine.

37. It is well known that the primary reason for the lack of progress in finding a comprehensive solution is the arrogance and intransigence of Israel, which has deliberately defied the will of the international community, as well as the lack of political will on the part of some important Member States. We appeal to all members of the international community to display statesmanship and join in the effort to find a speedy and just solution to the problem based on the principles enunciated by the United Nations and the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries. We urge them, as a first urgent step, to strive for the discontinuance of the Israeli settlements policy and to call for an immediate freeze on new settlements and the dismantling of those already established. At the same time, continued Israeli occupation of Lebanon is totally unacceptable. We all want to see a sovereign, independent and united Lebanon. This calls for the withdrawal of all foreign forces. Side by side, increased and sustained efforts and an initiation of a new process towards a just, durable and comprehensive settlement of the question of Palestine through peaceful means has become a matter of highest priority.

38. We listened with great attention to the important statement made this morning by Mr. Kaddoumi, Head of the Political Department of the Palestine Liberation Organization [88th meeting]. We welcome the recent meeting of the Palestine National Council, held at Amman, and have noted the decisions taken at that meeting. This has demonstrated the staunch will of the Palestinians to continue their just struggle for the attainment of their legitimate rights, and we wish them every success.

39. In conclusion, may I recall the words of the late Prime Minister Indira Gandhi in her keynote address to the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi in March 1983:

> "We are of one mind in our support for the brave, homeless and much harassed Palestinian people. Israel feels free to commit any outrage, unabashed in its aggression, unrepentant about its transgressions of international law and behaviour. But can it for ever obstruct the legitimate rights of Palestinians?"[5]

40. Mr. DJOUDI (Algeria) (interpretation from French): Ten years ago the General Assembly took a historic decision solemnly recognizing the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people, declaring the PLO to be its sole legitimate representative and identifying the Palestinian problem as the core of the conflict in the Middle East.

41. The General Assembly, by committing itself to the restoration of the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people and abandoning the erroneous path it had followed until then, which reduced the Middle East crisis to a question of the consequences of the Zionist régime's policy of aggression against the peoples of that region, undertook to redress a historic injustice for which it was itself responsible and to take up again its original task as an organization representing an act of faith for all oppressed peoples, and, in the final analysis, it became reconciled with itself.

42. This was the result of a long march lasting a quarter of a century and of a heroic struggle during which the Palestinian people, because of an international conspiracy which had deprived it of its land, its goods and its rights, paid a heavy price for its freedom, its dignity and its right to a national and independent existence on its own land. Thus the thick veil which had for long concealed the condition of the Palestinian people was lifted and the Palestinian national reality forced itself on the universal conscience as an undeniable reality and a necessary element in any just and comprehensive settlement of the Middle East problem. At the same time, the world discovered that what some people had shamelessly tried to present as a citadel of besieged freedom was in reality no more than a war machine based on a racist, expansionist philosophy which boasted of perpetuating the denial of the right to exist of an entire people.

43. Ten years have passed since this historic rehabilitation and the Palestinian people continues, as in the past, to endure the calvary of exile or that of occupation in its own homeland. Its land remains occupied, its freedom denied, its right to exist challenged.

44. In their camps where the collective memory of a nation that refuses to give in grows stronger, clinging to what remains of its ancestral land in occupied Palestine, the Palestinian people continues undaunted its march through history and its struggle for its existence and its identity, strengthened by the justness of its cause and by its unshakeable conviction that right will triumph in the end.

45. Since the twenty-ninth session of the General Assembly, many victories have been won, however, and the elements of a just and comprehensive settlement have little by little become accepted and were endorsed by the General Assembly, which, at its seventh emergency special session, forcefully proclaimed: first, the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination, to independence and to national sovereignty, as well as the right to establish its own independent sovereign State in Palestine; secondly, the inalienable right of the displaced and uprooted Palestinians to return to their homes and recover their property in Palestine; thirdly, the right of the PLO, as the representative of the Palestinian people, to participate on an equal footing in the search for a just solution to the Palestine problem; and, fourthly, the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force.

46. The General Assembly having shouldered its responsibilities, it was then for the Security Council to act in harmony with the Assembly and take the decisions that could guarantee the effective exercise by the Palestinian people of its national rights. But the abuse of the veto by a super-Power, by keeping the Council dangerously immobile, totally blocked all the efforts and reduced all the chances for peace to nought.

47. Indeed, it has been the many kinds of assistance furnished to the Zionist régime by that very super-Power that have enabled that régime, which has been given the role of a staging point of imperialism in a particularly sensitive region of the world, to pursue its policy of aggression against the peoples of the Middle East, to build up its deadly war machine and to continue to show arrogant contempt for United Nations decisions and the international community's injunctions.

48. The recent rejection by the Zionist leaders of the idea of convening an international peace conference on the Middle East, when all the Arab States concerned had stated their readiness to participate in such a conference; the increase in repression and the Israeli presence in the occupied territories, in particular by the establishment of new settlements; the continued occupation of southern Lebanon; the refusal to comply with United Nations resolutions: all these are manifestations of Zionist expansionism. They would not have been possible without the support which the Zionist régime gets and the impunity it enjoys.

49. Thus, in the occupied Arab territories, the policy of zionization continues methodically and implacably. The repression of the Arab populations is growing and intensifying. Strengthened and bolstered by fanatic bands enjoying the unconditional support of some religious and political circles, the occupation forces have imposed a reign of terror in occupied Palestine.

50. The many forms and consequences of all this extortion and institutionalized terror are described in detail in the report of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories [A/39/591]. That is how the Zionist régime continues its sinister undertaking of de-Arabizing Palestinian territory once and for all, by uprooting the Arabs from their homes and establishing more and more settlements—showing utter contempt for international condemnation—and transferring enormous numbers of Israeli settlers to the occupied territories, with a view to their final annexation.

51. In Lebanon, despite imperative resolutions adopted unanimously by the Security Council, the Israeli occupation is becoming more unbearable every day. A sovereign country that is a Member of the United Nations continues to witness a part of its territory occupied, its people oppressed, its unity broken, its economy thrown out of joint by a war that was imposed on it.

52. The Syrian Golan Heights, "annexed" by an unprecedented act of legislative piracy, continues to suffer inadmissible attacks on its identity and its Arab nature.

53. The Arab States of the region, constantly exposed to brutal aggression and the insatiable appetite of the Zionist régime for territory, remain the victims of unending threats and blackmail.

54. It is an undeniable fact that certain peace efforts have so far been fruitless because, instead of attacking what is still the crux of the matter—that is, the Palestinian national reality—they have turned a blind eye to this reality, preferring to deal with certain phenomena which, however serious they may be, are only the consequences of the Zionist régime's policy of aggression and expansionism and whose solution therefore cannot constitute a final settlement of the Middle East problem.

55. The only path that could lead to a just and comprehensive settlement of this bloody conflict is one that would enable the Palestinian people to exercise all its inalienable national rights and would guarantee respect for the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force.

56. In this respect, again, the responsibility must be shouldered by the Security Council, the body entrusted with the formidable task of maintaining international peace and security. By acting in harmony with the General Assembly and resolutely undertaking to work to give concrete form to the international consensus on the Middle East, the Security Council will regain its credibility, its effectiveness and its authority.

57. For its part, Algeria will continue to lend its full support to the heroic struggle of the Palestinian people and to work for the unity, cohesion and independence of the decision-making of its resistance, until all the legitimate national rights of the Palestinian people are finally restored to them. Fortified by the experience of its own liberation struggle, Algeria remains convinced that, with regained unity and the mobilization of the entire Palestinian resistance around a common, mutually accepted platform, the PLO, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, will be able to strengthen its capacities and means of action and fulfil all the deep aspirations of the Palestinian people.

58. Mr. BOUZIRI (Tunisia) (interpretation from French): For more than four decades, the question of Palestine has been, and unfortunately continues to be, of deep concern to the international community.

59. In this matter, the United Nations plays a primary role, inherited from the League of Nations and also bequeathed to it by the British Government which held the Mandate over Palestine and which, on 18 February 1947, stated that it was "faced with a conflict of irreconcilable principles" and that "the only thing remaining for it to do was to submit the problem to the judgement of the United Nations".

60. Since then, the international community has been constantly involved in the Palestine question—initially, because it endorsed, by General Assembly resolution 181 (II) of 29 November 1947, the Plan of Partition that formalized the injustice committed against the Palestinian people; and, subsequently, because it had been unable over the years, despite all the resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly, to bring about the solution that was sought.

61. The reasons for that, of course, are many and varied, but the responsibility of the United Nations, stemming from its Charter, remains entire.

62. In the report he addressed, two days before his assassination, to the Secretary-General, Count Folke Bernadotte wrote:

> "It would be a dangerous illusion to believe that it would be possible to establish a State of Israel overnight without taking into account the underlying political considerations involved as they are understood in the modern interplay of politics among nations."

63. We all know the scenario that had been prepared, the pressure exerted and the steps taken from the end of the nineteenth century after the first meeting of the Zionist congress. There were various stages which were to lead to the achievement of the objectives laid down at that congress.

64. First of all there was the Balfour Declaration, which Sir Edward Montagu, the only Jewish member of the British Government at the time, himself denounced. That was followed by the implementation of the policy and practices of the Zionist organization on the basis of the slogan: "A land without people for a people without land."

65. The terror campaign of Haganah and the Stern and Irgun gangs were to do the rest. That campaign was denounced in the British Parliament by Sir Winston Churchill in the following terms:

> "If our dreams for zionism are to disappear in the smoke from assassins' pistols, and if our efforts to build a future for zionism are to bring forth a new generation of gangsters worthy of Nazi Germany, many of us, including myself, will have to go back on the positions we have taken."

Those are the words of Sir Winston Churchill.

66. Referring to the pressures and campaigns of which he himself was the target, former President Harry Truman of the United States wrote in his memoirs:

> "In fact, not only was the United Nations subjected to unprecedented pressure, but the White House also was itself the target of a veritable barrage. I believe I have never been the target of such a virulent campaign."

Those are the words of Harry Truman, former President of the United States.

67. Thus, in spite of all these facts, Israel was established; but no restraint was placed upon its aggrandizement and no safeguards or guarantees were established for the rights of the Palestinian people, the victims of one of the worst injustices of the twentieth century.

68. The expulsion of the Palestinians from their homes and their land has been a long-standing Israeli policy. It became a systematic policy of Israel from the time of its creation. Ben Gurion described the ultimate objective as that of "a purely Jewish and much larger State, thanks to Haganah".

69. From 1948 onwards, Israel has striven to impede the implementation of the territorial provisions of General Assembly resolution 181 (II) of 29 November 1947, to strengthen its hold on the territories it controlled and to thwart resolution 194 (III) of 11 December 1948.

70. Since 1948, the Palestinian people have been condemned to dispersion and wandering. This situation deteriorated dangerously in 1967, after the military occupation of what remained of Palestinian territory and the implementation of the Israeli strategic plans with regard to the West Bank of the Jordan, the Gaza Strip and the eastern part of Al-Quds al-Sharif.

71. Studies and analyses carried out by the relevant United Nations organs on Israel's policies and practices in the occupied Palestinian territories concur with regard to the racist, colonialist and expansionist nature of Israel.

72. Ever since its creation, Israel has pursued simply a policy of fait accompli, violation of the rights of the Palestinian people and defiance of the international community and the United Nations, the organization to which it owes its very existence.

73. Invoking the theory of the chosen people, Israel intends to leave no room in a land it considers to be unpopulated except for Jews; and this aim is justified by every possible means, including the expulsion and deportation of Palestinians, whether they be Christians or Muslims; denial of their right to return to their homes and the land of their ancestors; arrests and ill-treatment of the civilian population; expropriations under the pretext of public utility or military security; demolition of houses and shelters; restraints on religious freedoms and practices; violation of respect for family rights and customs; the policy of Judaization, which does not even spare the holy places; the geographic and demographic transformation of towns and villages; and rules and laws imposed by Israel. These are all examples of the practices and the excesses of the Israelis in the occupied Palestinian territories.

74. As for Israel's colonialist and expansionist character, this is confirmed by the occupation and annexation of territories and the establishment of settlements in those territories and in towns such as Al-Quds and Al-Khalil.

75. The practice of Israel in the occupied Arab territories now consists of tightening the noose around the Arab habitation centres, swelling the settlements already established and creating others, so that, by 1987, 175 settlements will have been created, accommodating about 250,000 Jews.

76. In carrying out this policy of rampant expansionism, the Israeli leaders place stress on the fundamental strategic role of the settlements. They have stated more than once that these settlements strengthen Israel's security and provide a solid basis for its case for maintaining peace with defensible borders.

77. In defiance of international law and of United Nations resolutions, Israel persists in pursuing its policy of occupation, aggression, expansion and the establishment of illegal settlements not only throughout the Palestinian territories but also in Al-Quds, the status of which it is bent on changing.

78. In violation of Security Council resolution 478 (1980), which was adopted after the promulgation of the "Basic Law" by Israel, certain countries decided to transfer their embassies from Tel Aviv to Al-Quds. Such an illegal, scandalous measure could only encourage Israeli annexation and gravely compromise the general recognition of the special status of Al-Quds by the international community and the undertakings of the United Nations itself on this subject.

79. The Israeli practices in the establishment of settlements and violation of rules of law and international conventions, as well as fundamental human rights, have constantly been a source of profound concern to the international community. They are likely to become even worse as a result of the carrying out of the Ben Porat project relating to the reinstallation of Palestinian refugees, which would constitute, if put into effect, a further link in the chain of criminal actions against the Palestinians, designed to marginalize their struggle.

80. This whole policy, it is claimed, is carried out in the name of Israel's security, a concept largely belied by the various military adventures undertaken by Israel in the course of the past four decades.

81. In view of its offensive military potential and the commitments of its allies, Israel, far from being threatened, in actual fact is posing a constant threat to the Palestinians and their neighbours.

82. Rather than accepting the compromise offered to it many times, to settle the problem peacefully on the basis of international law, United Nations resolutions and recognition of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people—the right of return, and the right to self-determination and the right to create its own independent State—Israel has systematically pursued a policy of rejection, obstruction and defiance, giving rise to constant tension in the Middle East and throughout the world.

83. The British historian Arnold Toynbee has written that: "The Palestinian tragedy is not just a local tragedy. It is a tragedy for the whole world, because it is an injustice which threatens the peace of the world."

84. In deciding in 1947 on the partition of Palestine, the United Nations recognized the right of the Palestinian people to sovereignty and to establish its own independent State.

85. Reduced to the level of a refugee people, it was forced to have recourse, under the guidance of its sole legitimate representative, the PLO, to armed struggle to assert its rights.

86. The United Nations did justice to the Palestinian people by recognizing fully and formally its inalienable right to self-determination without outside interference, to independence and to national sovereignty, as well as the right to return.

87. In 1974 the United Nations recognized the justice of the struggle of the Palestinian people, the central place of the Palestinian question in the Middle East conflict and the representative nature of the PLO.

88. But, true to the image it had always held and preferring the pursuit of its predetermined plans to the search for a just and lasting solution to the Palestinian problem, Israel not only closed the door on a peaceful solution based on international law but engaged with even greater determination in an attempt to eliminate the Palestinian people and its representative, the PLO, in the hope of imposing its own partial and separate solutions and carrying out its hegemonist plans in Palestine and in the countries of the region.

89. In so doing, Israel reduced the chances of establishing peace in a region which had been ravaged by five wars. It pretends not to realize that no force, however sophisticated, can overcome the nationalism of a people determined to pursue its struggle to fulfil its aspirations to dignity, justice and freedom.

90. If the practices of the Nazis, the deportation camps and the cremation ovens stimulated and heightened Jewish nationalism, how could it be otherwise in the case of Palestinian nationalism? By a curious paradox, yesterday's victims have today become the butchers and the countries which yesterday defended the Jewish people are today, through their aid and assistance, encouraging Israel in its persecution of the Palestinian people.

91. In his message of 29 November 1984, on the occasion of the commemoration of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, President Habib Bourguiba expressed Tunisia's profound concern at the obstinacy and intransigence of Israel and reiterated our position on the Palestinian question. He said:

> "Reaffirming our commitment to the Arab peace plan adopted at the Fez summit, we believe that all international efforts to achieve a just and lasting peace in the Middle East deserve the support of all the members of the international community."

92. At its thirty-eighth session, in resolution 38/58 C, the General Assembly welcomed and endorsed the call for convening an international peace conference on the Middle East. We pay a sincere and well-deserved tribute to the Secretary-General for his tireless efforts to bring about this conference, but we must note that obstacles to convening it are continuously being created. While we are used to the Israeli attitude of rejection, obstinacy and intransigence, it is regrettable that certain countries which bear special responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security continue to show reluctance about the convening of this conference.

93. The numerous peace initiatives of the past two years constitute a noteworthy contribution to the search for a comprehensive, just and lasting solution to the Palestinian problem and to the problem of the Middle East. They testify to the imperative need, as we approach the end of the twentieth century, to put an end to a situation which not only is anachronistic but seriously threatens international peace and security.

94. Tunisia reaffirms its commitment to and support for any initiative which could lead to the realization of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people and a solution to the Middle East problem, and remains convinced that the convening of an international peace conference would be a step towards the beginning of a peace process in the region. The conference would have the advantage of the full backing of international law, would provide for the participation of all parties to the conflict, without any exception, and would constitute an appropriate framework for determining all the conditions for a comprehensive peace in the light of the relevant United Nations resolutions and the most recent proposals for comprehensive settlement.

95. In this way, the United Nations will have done its duty and fully shouldered its responsibilities regarding the solution of a conflict that has lasted for four decades. It seems to us that the time is ripe for such action.

96. In its determination to block the achievement of peace and the restoration to the Palestinian people of its inalienable rights, Israel is making a serious mistake in believing that it can perpetuate its supremacy in the region. It should understand that ultimately the balance of power will no longer be in its favour. In 10, 20 or 30 years, the Arab countries will have achieved a technological, military and human potential which could bring about fundamental changes in the situation.

97. On my country's behalf, I urge that all possible efforts be made to seize this new opportunity to solve the Middle East problem once and for all and to enable that region at last to enjoy the peace and security in which it can devote itself to development and to the progress of its peoples.

98. Next year the international community will celebrate the fortieth anniversary of the founding of the United Nations. For all of us, that commemoration will provide an opportunity to reaffirm the noble ideals on which the United Nations was based and its Charter written. It will also inspire us to redouble our efforts to ensure the triumph of those ideals. That commemoration will be a sign of renewal for all those that have pinned their hopes on the United Nations and expect it to restore their rights. Let us hope that the international community will fully discharge its obligations to them and see to it that their aspirations are fulfilled in justice and peace.

99. If 1986 is to be declared a year of peace, it must not be so in words alone.

100. Mr. LING Qing (China) (interpretation from Chinese): The Chinese delegation has listened attentively to the statements by the representatives of the PLO and some Arab countries. I wish to take this opportunity to voice our firm support and pay high tribute, in the name of the Chinese delegation, to the heroic Palestinian people who are fighting for the restoration of their national rights and the realization of a lasting peace in the Middle East.

101. The question of Palestine is the crux of the Middle East issue, having a direct bearing on the peace and stability of the Middle East. It is, in essence, a question of the Palestinian and other Arab peoples resisting Israeli aggression and expansion and fighting for the restoration of their national rights. In defiance of the norms of international law and relevant United Nations resolutions, the Israeli authorities have long trampled upon the legitimate national rights of the Palestinian people and have forcibly occupied large tracts of territories of neighbouring Arab countries on the pretext of Israel's right to security. They have always obdurately refused to recognize the Palestinian people's right to self-determination and to enter into a dialogue with the PLO. Their extreme arrogance and utter defiance of world opinion are inseparable from the connivance and backing of a super-Power. We hope that this super-Power will change its position of siding with Israel and make efforts towards achieving a fair and reasonable settlement of the Palestinian question.

Mr. Gumucio Granier (Bolivia), Vice-President, took the Chair.

102. The heroic Palestinian people, under the leadership of the PLO, their sole legitimate representative, have waged long years of extremely arduous struggle against the Israeli aggressors, thus winning world-wide sympathy and support. The PLO, too, has gained recognition and support from an increasing number of countries.

103. It is 37 years since the United Nations started its consideration of the question of Palestine in 1947. In the past decade, the United Nations has adopted a series of resolutions upholding justice. In particular, General Assembly resolution 3236 (XXIX) reaffirmed the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people, and resolution 3375 (XXX) invited the PLO to participate in all efforts for the realization of peace in the Middle East. The Geneva Declaration on Palestine,[2] adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva last year, called for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East under the auspices of the United Nations in conformity with the principles of the Charter and relevant resolutions of the United Nations. Other international organizations and countries have also put forward suggestions and proposals for a comprehensive and just solution to the Middle East problem. Of those proposals, the plan embodied in the Final Declaration adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference[6] merits particular mention, for it contains reasonable and realistic propositions and can form the basis for the settlement of the question.

104. China supports such reasonable suggestions and proposals and appraises highly the efforts made by the Arab countries and all the other justice-upholding countries for a settlement of the question of Palestine. I wish to reiterate that all efforts made on a similar basis that are conducive to the recovery by Arab countries of their lost territories, the restoration of the national rights of the Palestinian people and the achievement of a just and lasting settlement of the Middle East question will receive endorsement and support from the Chinese Government. China has held all along that the key to a settlement lies in the restoration to the Palestinian people of their inalienable national rights, including the right to self-determination, the right to return to their homeland and the right to establish their own State in Palestine; and in Israeli withdrawal from all the Arab territories occupied since 1967, including Arab Jerusalem. The PLO, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, has the right to participate on an equal footing with other parties. This is the only way to a comprehensive settlement and a fair solution of the Palestinian question, to the enjoyment of peace and of the right of all countries in the Middle East to existence and to the gradual realization of peace and stability in the region. We call on all peace-loving countries and peoples to make concerted efforts for an early and just settlement of the question of Palestine.

105. Mr. ENDREFFY (Hungary): My delegation had the opportunity a little while ago to take part in the deliberations on the situation in the Middle East. In our statement [75th meeting], we tried to focus attention on the larger context of the problem, the effects the unresolved issues in the Middle East have on the international situation. We were obliged to state with much regret that at the present time we are not a bit closer to a solution than we were a year ago. This implies that we did not make any progress either on the key issue of the Middle East crisis, that is, the Palestinian problem, which is the topic of our present statement.

106. The most fundamental human, political and national rights of the suffering Arab people of Palestine continue to be trampled underfoot. Israel continues to occupy Arab territories and with its aggressive, expansionist policy further complicates an already tense situation.

107. Throughout the year we have been confronted with reports on the continuation of the Israeli policy of establishing illegal Jewish settlements or enlarging those already existing in the occupied territories. This policy more often than not involves conflict and violence. The evacuation, deportation and expulsion of Arab inhabitants, the destruction and demolition of their homes and the confiscation of Arab property cannot be achieved otherwise. Often, Arab protests are followed by shooting and even killing or at best by mass arrests and the detention of the demonstrating Arabs.

108. Without going into further detail, let me just mention here that at its fortieth session, earlier this year, the Commission on Human Rights adopted no less than five resolutions dealing with the situation in the occupied Arab territories and condemning the Israeli policies and practices I have described.

109. And it is not only human rights that are denied the Palestinians. The Israeli policies designed to promote, protect and develop the illegal settlements have a direct economic effect on the Palestinian population as well, resulting in structural changes in the economy of the occupied territories.

110. We have repeatedly stated that the Israeli measures are clearly aimed at deliberately changing the geographical character, the demographic nature and even the legal status of the occupied territories, flagrantly violating the established norms of international law and specific United Nations resolutions.

111. This policy must not be allowed to go on. It has to be stopped, not only because it is lawless and inhuman, but also because it is dangerous; it perpetuates tension in the region with all its well-known adverse effects on international peace and security.

112. Israel cannot hope to achieve the much-desired peace through illegally occupying other people's territories. Its security cannot be exclusive. There can only be common security achieved through negotiations with all the parties involved in the conflict.

113. The overwhelming majority in the United Nations has consistently advocated a peaceful, political solution to the question of Palestine—and rightly, since there is no rational alternative.

114. The basic step in this direction should be recognition of the inalienable rights of the Arab people of Palestine: the right to self-determination, including the establishment of an independent sovereign State of their own; the right to return; the right to compensation; and so on.

115. The just settlement of the Palestinian problem, based on recognition of the rights to which I have referred, would constitute the most significant contribution to a comprehensive settlement of the whole Middle East question. It could be achieved by meeting the other well-known conditions of a settlement, namely: the withdrawal of Israeli forces from all the occupied Arab territories, including Jerusalem, and respect for and acknowledgement of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every State in the region, including Israel.

116. It goes without saying that all the parties concerned should take part in the process of settlement on an equal footing, including the PLO, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian Arab people. It is also generally recognized that the support of the major Powers, especially the Soviet Union and the United States, is essential if a lasting settlement is to be achieved.

117. It is obvious that renewed international efforts are needed to create the necessary conditions to set this process of settlement in motion and to convene an international peace conference on the Middle East.

118. We are well aware of the fact that there is a long and difficult road ahead of us.

119. It is necessary to improve the international climate so that it becomes more conducive to negotiations. It is also necessary to strengthen the unity of the Arab countries, as well as of the Palestinian movement, so that lack of unity cannot be used further to delay talks and negotiations. And it is also necessary for the parties concerned to be realistic. We agree with the Secretary-General when he states in his report:

> "It seems clear to me that none of the parties to this historic and tragic conflict can hope to attain its maximum demands if there is to be a state of real peace in the region. In the changes of fortune, the shifting balance of power and the inexorable development of underlying trends in the Middle East, no party can view the future with equanimity, nor will the world escape the repercussions of continuing violence in this unique area." [A/39/600, para. 43.]

120. Let us not allow this to happen. Rather, let us work together, both here in the United Nations and in our bilateral diplomacy, for a peaceful, negotiated settlement of the question of Palestine, for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

121. Mr. OVINNIKOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (interpretation from Russian): Exactly 10 years have passed since the General Assembly, at its twenty-ninth session, adopted the fundamental resolution 3236 (XXIX). That resolution clearly set forth the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to self-determination without outside intervention and to national independence and sovereignty.

122. At subsequent sessions of the General Assembly, including the seventh emergency special session, the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people were reaffirmed. Together with the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, these resolutions constitute the generally recognized basis for a just solution to the problem of Palestine, within the framework of a comprehensive Middle East settlement, taking account of the legitimate interests both of the Arab people of Palestine and of the State of Israel.

123. However, the legitimate demands of the Palestinian people have not yet been implemented. The Arab people of Palestine continues to be deprived of a homeland. That people has been forced to live hand-to-mouth or to endure the daily yoke of military occupation in the Israeli-occupied Palestinian lands. The reason for this is crystal clear: Israel continues to pursue an implacable, chauvinist policy of total disregard and non-recognition not only of the national rights of the Palestinian Arabs but also of the very existence of the Arab people of Palestine.

124. As a result of arbitrary expropriations and requisitions of Arab land on the West Bank of the Jordan and in the Gaza Strip, the Israeli occupiers have been able to set up about 200 settlements. Tel Aviv continues to hatch its plans of sharp increases in the number of Israeli settlements in coming years. With respect to the indigenous Arab population, the occupation authorities are pursuing a policy of naked terror and violence. Behind all this is a desire to drive out the Palestinians from their ancestral lands and to carry out the total annexation of Palestinian territories.

125. The expansionist policy of the Israeli leaders has frequently been strongly condemned by the General Assembly and the Security Council. The practical steps taken by Israel within the context of its policy of fait accompli—the annexation of east Jerusalem and the Golan Heights, the activities of settlers in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip—have repeatedly and unambiguously been described by the international community as illegal and null and void.

126. Israel, however, does not wish to recognize a single United Nations resolution on the Palestinian question. It stubbornly refuses to comply with such resolutions both with respect to withdrawal from the occupied Arab lands and with respect to the exercise of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people. Tel Aviv completely denies the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination, as well as its right to establish its own independent State.

127. Does Israel have any grounds for such a policy? There can be no such grounds, and there are none. As everyone knows, General Assembly resolution 181 (II) of 29 November 1947 provided for the creation in the former Mandated Territory of Palestine not only of a Jewish but also of an Arab State. Is it really possible to dismember, to cut up that decision and to recognize one part of it while denying another? By not recognizing the rights of the Palestinian people to set up its own State, the Israeli leadership is rejecting resolution 181 (II), and it is precisely that resolution which constitutes the legal basis for the existence of Israel itself.

128. It is a matter of public record that the Israeli leadership makes clever and constant use of the concept of security for its own State. It would seem that such an obsessive concern for its own security should prompt the Israeli authorities to seek a common language with their neighbours and prompt them to try to coexist and normalize relations with them, as well as to seek mutually acceptable peaceful solutions on a reasonable basis. But exactly the opposite is true: in the course of all these years, Israel has been promoting not a programme of peace, but a programme of expansion and annexation, and has been committing more and more acts of aggression against the Arabs.

129. It is very clear that Israel would never have dared to conduct itself so presumptuously and cynically had it not been for outside support and assistance. Therefore, responsibility for the many years of conscious obstructionism in finding a solution to the problem of Palestine, as well as the entire range of problems involved in a Middle East settlement, must be borne not only by Israel; it is also the responsibility of the United States. It is precisely the systematic political, economic and military support for Israel provided by Washington that has made it possible for Tel Aviv for many years to trample underfoot and usurp the rights of the Palestinian and other Arab peoples and to disregard the relevant resolutions of the United Nations on the Middle East.

130. American policy in the Middle East has a lopsided pro-Israel tilt, and on the Palestinian question it is aimed at preventing the Palestinian people from exercising its national rights. That is the essence of all the notorious American plans, beginning with Camp David and continuing with the "Reagan plan" of 1 September 1982,[7] which, it would seem, it now wants to take down from its dusty shelf and present in new wrappings.

131. However, the many years of experience and the development of events in the Middle East indisputably show that the Middle East conflict and its core, the Palestinian problem, cannot be solved by separate deals and behind-the-scenes manoeuvring and machinations. There are more and more champions of the just cause of the Arab people of Palestine in the world. Their political support, including support within the United Nations, serves as a guarantee for success in the struggle for a just solution of the Palestinian problem within the context of a comprehensive Middle East settlement.

132. Of course, it goes without saying that of decisive significance is the struggle of the Palestinian people itself, the political vanguard of which is the PLO. It is extremely important to strengthen the cohesiveness of the Palestinian ranks on an anti-imperialistic patriotic basis. It is extremely important to maintain close co-operation between the PLO and the Arab peoples and countries, taking a very firm principled position in countering the expansionist plans of the United States and Israel, and that would make it possible for the Palestine resistance movement to overcome the difficulties it has been experiencing and to thwart the designs of imperialism and zionism in the Middle East and of all those who are working against the realization of the national aspirations of the Palestinian people.

133. The Soviet Union consistently backs the struggle of the Palestinians for their inalienable rights. This is borne out in the proposals made by the Soviet Union on 29 July 1984 [see A/39/368], taking account of the incontrovertible fact that the Palestinian problem is the key element in the entire range of problems in a Middle East settlement.

134. Based on the desire to promote the establishment of peace in the Middle East, the Soviet Union—and we feel it is necessary to recall this—has stated that the following principles are necessary for a Middle East settlement.

135. First, there should be strict compliance with the principle of the inadmissibility of acquisition of foreign territory by aggression. Consequently, all territories occupied by Israel since 1967 should be returned to the Arabs. This means the Golan Heights, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, as well as Lebanese lands. The settlements established by Israel in the Arab territories after 1967 should be eliminated. The borders between Israel and its Arab neighbours should be declared inviolable.

136. Secondly, there must be effective guarantees of the exercise of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, whose sole and legitimate representative is the PLO, as well as of its right to self-determination and to the establishment of its own independent State on Palestinian territory, liberated from Israeli occupation. This means the West Bank of the Jordan and the Gaza Strip. As provided for in the decision adopted on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference, held at Fez,[6] and with the consent of the Palestinians themselves, these regions could be transferred by Israel, for a short, transitional period not exceeding several months, to United Nations control.

137. After the establishment of an independent Palestinian State, that State would of course, by virtue of the sovereign right belonging to every State, determine the nature of its relations with neighbouring countries, including the possibility of forming confederations.

138. Palestinian refugees should be given, in accordance with United Nations decisions, the opportunity of returning to their homes or receiving appropriate compensation for the property they left behind.

139. Thirdly, East Jerusalem, which was occupied by Israel in 1967 and which includes one of the major Muslim holy places, should be returned to the Arabs and should become an integral part of the Palestinian State. In all of Jerusalem there should be free access to the holy places for believers of the three religions.

140. Fourthly, there should be real guarantees of the right of all States in the region to a secure and independent existence and to development. It goes without saying that there should be full reciprocity; genuine security cannot be provided for some when the security of others is neglected.

141. Fifthly, the state of war must be ended and peace must be established between the Arab States and Israel. This means that all parties to the conflict, including Israel and the Palestinian State, should undertake to respect each other's sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity. They must settle peacefully, by negotiations, any disputes that may arise between them.

142. Sixthly, international guarantees for the settlement must be worked out and adopted. The role of guarantor might be played by, for example, permanent members of the Security Council or by the Security Council as a whole. The Soviet Union, for its part, would be prepared to participate in that process of guaranteeing the settlement.

143. I turn now to the ways of reaching a settlement on the basis of the principles I have just set forth. Experience shows very, very clearly that the only correct and effective course in this regard is that of collective efforts, with the participation of all sides concerned. This means negotiations within the context of an international conference on the Middle East, specially convened for this purpose.

144. All Arab States having common borders with Israel, as well as Israel itself, should have the right to participate in the work of such a conference. The PLO, too, should be a full-fledged participant in the conference. The Soviet Union and the United States should also participate in the conference as States which, because of circumstances, play an important role in Middle East matters and which were the co-chairmen of the 1973 conference on the Middle East.

145. The course of the discussions on the entire set of Middle East problems shows that this point of view is shared by an overwhelming majority of delegations. There is every reason to state that there is broad international agreement on the need to hold an international conference on the Middle East. This is also confirmed by the Geneva Declaration on Palestine, adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held in 1983.[2] It is particularly significant that the General Assembly itself, in resolution 38/58 C, very clearly pronounced itself in favour of such a conference.

146. The Soviet Union is in favour of a truly just and comprehensive settlement in the Middle East. If such a settlement were worked out, there would be no need for even Israel to worry about its security. Merely by returning what does not belong to it, by returning what it has usurped, it could gain security and peace.

147. A just solution of the Palestine question, within the context of a comprehensive Middle East settlement, would be a significant contribution to the cause of stability and solid peace in the region. Furthermore, it would lead to an improvement in the international climate as a whole.

148. Mr. McDONAGH (Ireland): I have the honour to speak on behalf of the ten member States of the European Community.

149. The Ten remain deeply conscious of the importance which the Palestinian problem has for the future peace and security of the Middle East. Each year that passes without a solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict makes its achievement more difficult, since attitudes of hostility become more entrenched and further problems are added to the existing ones. The Ten consider that Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) set out fundamental principles for a settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Such a settlement must, further, take account of both the right to existence and security of all States in the Middle East, including Israel, and the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination with all that this implies. These views of the Ten have been elaborated in the declaration published at Venice on 13 June 1980[8] and their subsequent statement on this issue. In their declaration on the Middle East adopted at Brussels on 27 March 1984 [see A/39/161, annex] the Ten called on all parties to draw the necessary consequences from these principles and to start the negotiations necessary for their implementation.

150. The Ten's commitment to the right of Israel to live in security and peace is fundamental and unwavering. In parallel, they further confirm that there can be no real peace or stability in the region unless the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people are recognized. In particular, self-determination for the Palestinian people, with all that this implies, remains a key issue which must be taken into account in the context of a comprehensive, just and durable settlement of the conflict. Thus, the essence of such a settlement must be a full, just and lasting accommodation between the State of Israel and the Palestinian people, so that they can live together in peace and security. A climate of confidence and understanding is an important element in the search for a comprehensive peace settlement. The Ten believe that such a climate can only be achieved by the parties concerned taking positive steps towards this goal, by ending acts of violence and by showing willingness to compromise. In the Ten's view, furthermore, a process of negotiation must involve mutual recognition of the existence and the rights of the parties in the conflict.

151. The Ten have repeatedly stressed their conviction that Israel will only obtain the security and recognition to which it has a right by seeking a negotiated settlement and in particular by satisfying the legitimate aspirations of the Palestinian people. The Ten wish to see the Palestinian people in a position to pursue their demands by political means, and they consider that the achievement of these should take account of the need to recognize and respect the existence and security of all. The Ten continue to believe that it is neither wise nor just for one party to seek to deny the other the rights that it claims for itself.

152. Resolution of the problems between Israel and its neighbours should be based on the principles, widely accepted in the international community, of non-recourse to the use of force and of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force. In accordance with Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), Israel must put an end to the territorial occupation it has maintained since the conflict of 1967.

153. The Ten are convinced that negotiations are the key to the problem and that it is for the parties concerned to negotiate a lasting settlement. A negotiated settlement will require the continuing and independent expression of the will of the Palestinian people.

154. The Ten have noted the recent meeting of the Palestine National Council at Amman. They continue to believe that the PLO must be associated with peace negotiations.

155. The Ten express their concern that the hopes engendered in September 1982 by certain converging and promising peace initiatives have been largely dissipated. The European Council, at its meeting held at Dublin on 3 and 4 December 1984, emphasized that it is vitally important that renewed efforts be made towards negotiations for a settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict. The Ten note with satisfaction expressions of interest by both sides in a process of movement towards negotiations, and they hope that this declared interest will be further built on. In order to find a lasting solution, no amount of effort by third parties can be a substitute for direct negotiations among the parties themselves—the Arab States, Israel and the Palestinian people—which must recognize mutually one another's existence and rights. They call on all parties fully to implement the provisions of Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973). They renew their call for an end to the illegal policy of settlements in the occupied territories.

156. In the past, the Ten have consistently offered to assist in any way open to them in attempts to identify common ground between the parties. The Ten, both collectively and individually, have maintained contact with all parties. In continuation of this policy, the Ten, as stated by the European Council on 4 December 1984, consider that such contacts should be developed with a view to seeking ways of promoting movement towards negotiation and improvement of the situation in the region.

157. The Ten have repeatedly indicated the principles on which they base their position concerning the Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967, in particular the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war. The Ten reaffirm that the provisions of the Hague Convention of 1907[9] and the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949,[10] are applicable to all these territories until such time as an end is put, within the framework of a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement, to the territorial occupation which Israel has maintained since 1967. The Ten are deeply concerned that Israeli policies in the area have led to mounting tension and continued unrest. In particular, the Ten remain profoundly concerned by the Israeli policies on settlements. They again confirm their position that these settlements in the Arab territories occupied since 1967, as well as any change in the status and demographic structure of these territories, are illegal under international law and constitute a serious obstacle to peace efforts. Continuation of these policies can only undermine the necessary basis of dialogue and trust, which is an essential prerequisite for any constructive negotiation aimed at achieving a comprehensive peace settlement. Moreover, the Ten reiterate that the Israeli policy concerning East Jerusalem and the Golan Heights is contrary to international law and, therefore, invalid in their eyes. The Ten reaffirm their serious concern at the distress of the Palestinian civilian population and hope that the relevant international organizations will be allowed to assist this population without hindrance.

158. The Ten take note of the report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People [A/39/35]. The views of the Ten and such reservations as are maintained by them in regard to the Committee are well known. At the same time, the Ten have noted with appreciation the reference to their efforts which appears in the Committee's report.

159. In conclusion, I should like to reaffirm the Ten's support for the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people. Recognition of these rights remains one of the fundamental principles which, in the Ten's view, must guide the search for a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement in the Middle East.

160. Mr. VONGSAY (Lao People's Democratic Republic) (interpretation from French): The optimism, albeit cautious, that marked our discussion last year on the question of Palestine, which has been on the agenda of the United Nations since its founding, seems now to have disappeared as the General Assembly deals with this serious and distressing problem again. It was with a certain amount of relief that the international community noted the adoption by the General Assembly last year of resolution 38/58 C, relating to the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East, at which the Palestinian problem, which is at the very heart of all the Middle East conflicts, would find an equitable and lasting solution. The principles that should guide that conference are contained, as we know, in the Geneva Declaration on Palestine and the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights, adopted by consensus at the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983.[2] Among those cardinal principles is, of course, recognition and the effective exercise of the legitimate, inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to return to their homes and to recover their property; the right to self-determination and to create their own independent, sovereign State in their fatherland, Palestine; and the right of the PLO, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, to take part on an equal footing with the other parties in all the efforts, deliberations and conferences on the Middle East; as well as the withdrawal of Israel from all Arab territories occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem, and recognition of the right of all States in the region to live in security within secure and internationally recognized borders.

161. It is clear that General Assembly resolution 38/58 C is the mainspring of a machinery which sets out realistic ways and means for building just, comprehensive and lasting peace in the Middle East, in which all the parties directly concerned, including the PLO, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, are justly served. It is encouraging to note that since the thirty-eighth session of the General Assembly, world public opinion has become more acutely aware of the specific features and the gravity of the question of Palestine and of the urgent need for the world community to arrive at a just and lasting solution. This is demonstrated by the fact that this very year, under the auspices of the United Nations, specifically of its Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, of which my country has had the honour to be a member, a number of seminars and round tables were organized in various parts of the world. Eminent jurists, parliamentarians and representatives of non-governmental organizations participated in these meetings. The participants were unanimous in their recognition that the question of Palestine is a fundamental element for any settlement of the Middle East conflict, and they concluded that it is necessary to convene, as soon as possible, an international peace conference on the Middle East in accordance with the spirit and the letter of resolution 38/58 C. Those are the legitimate hopes of all segments of the international community which cherish peace, justice, freedom and progress.

162. The Government of the Lao People's Democratic Republic is following with special attention the consultations being carried out by the Secretary-General, under the mandate entrusted to him by the relevant resolution, with members of the Security Council and the representatives of Governments of countries directly concerned in the Arab-Israeli conflict, aimed at learning their views and suggestions regarding the organization and convening of such a conference.

163. Reading the Secretary-General's report [A/39/130 and Add.1], we were genuinely disappointed to learn that the United States Government, unlike the Soviet Government—whose peace plan is, in essence, very close to the guiding principles adopted at the International Conference on the Question of Palestine—is persisting in its arrogant and negative attitude towards this fundamental problem. It should also be stressed that the Final Communiqué adopted at the Meeting of Ministers and Heads of Delegation of the Non-Aligned Countries, held in New York from 1 to 5 October 1984 [see A/39/560], also condemned the negative stand taken by Israel and the United States. We should not be excessively surprised at this obstructionist move by the United States Administration, for it is in keeping with its global strategy of expansion and domination over that region and over the entire world. Everyone knows that it is because of the unconditional and varied support—political, military and economic—provided by United States imperialism and by a number of its other allies that the illegal racist Pretoria régime has been able with impunity to pursue its criminal policy of apartheid against the black majority population of South Africa and its illegal occupation of Namibia, in flagrant violation of the relevant United Nations resolutions.

164. With regard to the Middle East—a region where, as we know, the conflicts have their deep-seated origins in the shocking injustices committed for decades by the Zionist forces and their United States sponsors against the Palestinian people—my delegation considers that the Arab world must form a united front to fight the common enemy. It is in the aggressive and expansionist nature of zionism and imperialism never to countenance the enjoyment by the Middle East, or any other part of the world, of lasting peace and security. In order to carry out their sinister designs, these dominating, oppressive forces are working actively to sow division and hatred among the nations and peoples of the Middle East, nations and peoples which, however, share a rich common historic, cultural and religious heritage. It is no secret that United States imperialism will do everything in its power to help Israeli zionism, its "strategic ally", achieve its demonic dream of building a Greater Israel, which, obviously, would embrace not only the Palestinian and Arab territories already occupied since 1967, but also those of other States of the region.

165. How many resolutions have been adopted on the burning and painful question of Palestine and the Middle East since the founding of the United Nations? We only know that they are beyond counting and that the Zionist State, with the blessing of its imperialist protectors, has chosen to defy them and has done so with total impunity. The Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People informs us in its detailed periodic reports about the brutality and inhumanity of the aggressive and repressive measures which the Zionist forces of occupation have taken and continue to take every day against the defenceless Palestinian and Arab inhabitants of the occupied territories. We are also informed about the extremely heroic way in which the Palestinian people, under the vigorous leadership of the PLO, its sole legitimate representative, has mounted armed resistance against the occupation forces in a struggle which has always enjoyed the sympathy and solidarity of the entire international community. Moreover, there is every reason to believe that the Zionist forces are still frenetically pursuing their diabolical plan to establish and develop settlements in the occupied Palestinian and Arab territories, including Jerusalem, in defiance of fundamental principles of international law declaring all acquisition of territory by force to be null and void. The invasion of Lebanon by the Zionist forces in June 1982, followed in September of that year by their massacre of Palestinian civilians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps, showed the world how barbarous and formidable zionism is.

166. Are we to conclude from all this that the international community, and the United Nations, whose primary responsibility with regard to the question of Palestine has been recognized, remain powerless to find a just and lasting solution to this distressing problem? We do not think so, for an adequate framework or machinery for a settlement has already been found, as is shown by the provisions of General Assembly resolution 38/58 C. An international consensus has already emerged on this question. As we all know, the stumbling-block is the negative attitude of the United States and its "strategic ally", Israel. The international community and the United Nations must redouble their efforts to overcome that stumbling-block by all the means available to them, so that the international peace conference on the Middle East may be organized and convened under United Nations auspices as soon as possible. At stake is peace, stability and harmonious co-operation in the region, which, of course, cannot be separated from world peace and security. At stake, above all, is the triumph of the sacred cause of the heroic people of Palestine, a cause to which the Lao Government and people have always lent their unswerving support.

167. Mr. WIJEWARDANE (Sri Lanka): Sri Lanka follows a number of speakers in this debate on the question of Palestine and many more speakers have put down their names to participate in the debate. I shall therefore be brief. Each year this debate takes place, and the question of Palestine is no nearer settlement than it was when the General Assembly discussed it the previous year. The region of the Middle East continues to be a region of "festering conflict and wrongs unrighted", as the Rapporteur of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, Mr. Gauci, described it this morning [88th meeting]. This should not instil in us a sense of cynicism or apathy. The continuing lack of a settlement should sharpen rather than discourage our will to seek a solution.

168. In reviewing developments in the past year, we see that the fate of the Palestinian people has undergone tragic vicissitudes. Last week, the General Assembly discussed the related item of the situation in the Middle East, and developments in the region as a whole were reviewed. Virtually every speaker concurred in the view that the situation remains dangerously explosive and complicated, not only acting as a deterrent to the peaceful development and security of the States in the Middle East region, but also, in a broader sense, threatening international peace and security. While we recognize that, as in any other region, there are certain unresolved issues in the Middle East, these are extraneous to the central issue of Palestine with which we are now dealing.

169. Whatever the disputes that affect the region, the basic features of the situation in Palestine have remained unchanged. In other words, the root causes of the tension, insecurity, suffering and death in the region, as well as the key to a possible way out of the impasse, can be clearly identified and addressed.

170. We repeat ourselves when we say that the question of Palestine is the crux of the unrest in the Middle East. This is a repetition that is necessary and one which is, in fact, pivotal to our discussion. There are other sources of tension in the Middle East, but the central issue, without the solution of which no peace is possible, is the question of Palestine. At the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi in March 1983, the heads of State reaffirmed that the Israeli occupation of Palestine and the usurpation and denial of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people are the core of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

171. The solution of the Palestine question hinges on two basic conditions: the withdrawal of Israel from all occupied Arab and Palestinian territories, in accordance with the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force; and the restoration of the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people. These rights include the right to return to their homeland, the right to self-determination without external interference, and the right to a sovereign national State in Palestine.

172. While continued strife in the Middle East exacts a terrible toll of all Arab peoples, it is the Palestinians who have suffered most. As a people, as a nation, they have been tragically dispersed virtually throughout the world, with many of them in refugee camps. Attempts have been made to dismiss the Palestinians as some sort of permanent refugee population and to deny their specific identity as a people and a nation.

173. The experiences of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories are known to members of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories. The report of the Special Committee [A/39/591] speaks for itself. The Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People has given an exhaustive account of the plight of the Palestinian people. We thank Mr. Sarré, of Senegal, and members of the Committee for their devotion and for the comprehensive report [A/39/35].

174. The establishment of Israeli settlements in the occupied territories is illegal and a serious obstacle to a just and comprehensive solution of the question of Palestine. All steps taken in these territories to effect changes in their political, cultural, religious, demographic, physical and geographic character are null and void and illegal. The Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949[11]—in particular, the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War—and Additional Protocols 1 and 2,[12] adopted in 1977, should be applied to the occupied territories.

175. Despite their untold suffering, the Palestinian people have continued their struggle. The PLO has succeeded against massive odds in uniting and channelling this struggle. The PLO is the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and, without doubt, the organization which should represent the Palestinian people in any negotiations affecting their future. The PLO should participate as a full and equal party in any conference or settlement process. Sri Lanka has accorded full diplomatic recognition to the PLO, whose mission in Colombo enjoys full embassy status.

176. What is most ironic is that, although the essential elements necessary for a settlement of the Palestine question have now been recognized and are part of a near-universal consensus, positive steps to give effect to them have not been taken. The Arab States themselves, including the Palestinians, at the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference, held at Fez, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, the Organization of African Unity [OAU], the Commonwealth, the Inter-Parliamentary Union and other organizations, have reaffirmed those features, which are the sine qua non of any just and lasting settlement. It is for the international community now to redouble its efforts, through the United Nations, particularly the Security Council, to bring about negotiations for a settlement and to usher in conditions of peace and tranquillity to a region which has for far too long known neither.

177. Mr. OULD BOYE (Mauritania) (interpretation from Arabic): The Palestinian people continues to struggle for its very existence as a nation, for its right to self-determination and for the right to set up its own independent State on its national soil. This struggle is an integral part of the struggle of the peoples of the world against colonialism, foreign domination and aggression.

178. The Palestinian people is the victim of the greatest imperialist and Zionist conspiracy which the twentieth century has witnessed.

179. At a time when colonialism in its earlier forms has begun to disappear under the continuous assault of the peoples, when the socialist revolution has become stronger in various parts of the world and when democratic public opinion in Europe and America has made itself felt and is exerting pressure against colonialism and in favour of the right of peoples to self-determination, the neo-colonialists are seeking to preserve their selfish interests.

180. In the Middle East, in particular, neo-colonialism has come to an agreement with world zionism, which sought a country to colonize and where Zionist capital could be freely managed.

181. Great Britain, which needed Zionist assistance, was convinced of the importance of this project. After visiting various third-world regions, it chose Palestine for the implementation of the Zionist plot. The reason Palestine was chosen was explained by the President of the World Jewish Congress, Mr. Nahum Goldmann, in 1947, at Montreal:

> "The Jews could have chosen Uganda, Madagascar or other countries to establish their national homeland, but they wanted Palestine, not because the Dead Sea, if it was drained, could supply minerals and salt of an estimated value of $5 billion, not because the subsoil of Palestine, it was said, contained oil reserves greater than those of the entire American continent, but because Palestine is a crossroads of routes linking Europe, Asia and America, the real centre of force and of world political power, that is, the strategic and military centre for domination of the world."

182. Zionism undertook a vast campaign to convince Jews throughout the world of the usefulness of this plan and, to justify its designs, it invented historical myths, conjuring up a kingdom stretching from the Nile to the Euphrates; and it called Palestine the promised land. Zionism aroused the feelings of some Jews and mobilized them on false premises.

183. That is how the plot was carried out. Despite national, cultural and linguistic differences, Jews were uprooted from their countries of origin and used as a weapon is used to commit a crime. Thus the Haganah was called upon to spill the blood of the Palestinian people at Deir Yassin and elsewhere, an unprecedented event in the history of mankind.

184. Zionism continued its manoeuvres and pressure to make world public opinion accept the fait accompli of the creation of Israel. These events took place in 1947, and everyone knows about them.

185. Since its creation, Israel has used violence against the Palestinians and aggression against the neighbouring countries. All the reports submitted to this session of the General Assembly prove this.

186. Israel applies collective sanctions by imprisoning whole families, demolishing houses, ejecting people and depriving them of the right to work, imposing excessive taxes and refusing to grant the most basic social rights. Israel practises corporal punishment and physical and moral torture against detainees and deprives the sick of medical care by closing down hospitals and health-care centres. This arbitrary policy has resulted in increasing the mortality rate and the number of mentally sick.

187. Israel has seized Palestinian land and has driven out the inhabitants in order to establish Zionist settlements. In addition, it prevents the Arab population from having access to drinking water and water for irrigation. That is why Israel has laid its hands on the waters of the Jordan and of the Golan Heights and the West Bank and is trying to change the course of the Litani River in Lebanon.

188. However, this is not enough. It is trying to quench the spirit of an entire people by dispossessing it of its archaeological and cultural heritage in the occupied territories, changing education programmes, banning national newspapers, imposing restrictions on artists and writers and preventing the entry into the occupied areas of any worthwhile work of art.

189. This has but one purpose: to cause the economic, cultural and social collapse of the Palestinian community and to drive the Palestinians into exile so that Israel can implement its plans.

190. This racist policy is quite in keeping with what Herzl wrote in 1902: "We must campaign against foreigners. We must have only Jews in this place of Jewish settlement."

191. In 1967, Golda Meir reaffirmed this when she said: "The Jews have occupied the West Bank to settle there for good. There must be as few Arabs as possible in the area."

192. Any State or entity that carries out acts of aggression and resorts to illegal and inhuman practices such as these, must not benefit from any right within the framework of the international community. On the contrary, the international community, individually and collectively, must punish such a State or entity. In 1967, General de Gaulle adopted a courageous position because he had become convinced of the aggressive intentions of Israel: he prohibited the export of weapons to Israel. That position should serve as an example to all countries that cherish peace and stability in the world.

193. The question of Palestine is not, as Israel claims, a question which concerns the Arabs and the Jews alone. It is the cause of a people struggling against colonialism, against which the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America have struggled and are still struggling to regain their dignity and exercise sovereignty in their own lands.

194. As the late President Nasser said in July 1964 at the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity, held at Cairo:

> "What is happening to the people of Palestine is similar to what the African peoples have undergone. Foreign settlers have come into their country, invoking racist supremacy. They have stolen the land, and driven out its owners, and they have been helped by the colonialists, whose agents of various kinds they have become."

195. It is the duty of all free men throughout the world to stand at the side of the Palestinian people, the Namibian people and the people of South Africa in their struggle against Zionist and racist colonialism.

196. The General Assembly and many other United Nations organs have adopted resolutions on the question of Palestine. The Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the OAU have done the same. But Israel has rejected or defied all those resolutions.

197. The intransigence of Israel, its insults addressed to representatives of the United Nations, and sometimes its assassinations—as in the case of the international Mediator, Count Bernadotte—have had adverse effects on the credibility and the influence of the United Nations and the effectiveness of its resolutions.

198. Mauritania, like all States that cherish peace and justice, places great hopes in the United Nations as an instrument for the application of the principles of the Charter, which are based on respect for human rights, justice, equality and the law. Mauritania believes that in order to recover its effectiveness the Organization must apply strict sanctions against Israel to compel it to respect human rights; otherwise, Israel will just continue to practise terrorism, aggression and expansionism.

199. My country once again associates itself with those that condemn Israeli aggression and believe that it must withdraw unconditionally from all of Palestine, including Jerusalem, and all the Arab territories. Similarly, my country condemns the Israeli settlement policy, which it considers to be contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and to all international rules and standards. We condemn the acts of oppression and brutality perpetrated by Israel against the people of the occupied territories. We strongly condemn Israel for carrying out the massacres in Sabra and Shatila.

200. Mauritania believes that the question of Palestine is the core of the conflict in the Middle East and that the PLO is the principal party in the struggle against Israeli aggression. Therefore, negotiations aimed at finding a peaceful solution to the problems of the region must not take place without the participation and the agreement of the PLO.

201. Today, the course of history is moving in the direction of the triumph of the Palestinians and against the usurpers, because it is for a just cause that the Palestinian people have resorted to revolution. However long the night may last, day must finally dawn, and every time Israeli terrorism is stepped up the struggle becomes greater and the day of liberation in Palestine comes closer. The Mauritanian poet Ahmed Weld Abd El-Khader was right when he said, after the outbreak of Palestinian armed revolution: "Miracles are accomplished by the masses, and injustice gives birth to freedom. From arbitrary acts and oppression in Palestine is born the revolution that is worth any sacrifice."

202. The most violent aggression of our time has been committed against the Palestinian people, the people made up of a whole generation of fedayeen, who have no fear of death and who rely on their indomitable will and the strength of all peoples that cherish peace and justice and the entire international community, which has recognized their inalienable, historical rights, including the right of return, to self-determination and to establish their own independent State on their national soil, under the leadership of the PLO, their sole legitimate representative.

203. Mr. OYOUÉ (Gabon) (interpretation from French): The General Assembly is once again discussing the question of Palestine. Thus, despite the passage of time and the great changes in our world since the Second World War, some very important questions have not, regrettably, developed so satisfactorily.

204. One of those questions, the Palestine problem—another unfortunate legacy of the League of Nations—remains one of the tragedies of our century; it cannot be discussed without indignation.

205. This indignation that we feel when we take up the present agenda item demonstrates the extent of our solidarity with the Palestinian people, which for almost half a century has been deprived of its legitimate rights. Never in the history of modern societies has a people been confronted with such a serious situation, whose scope increases day by day.

206. Next year the United Nations will commemorate its fortieth anniversary. My delegation believes that the international community must use that occasion to reflect on the sad fate that history has meted out to the Palestinian people, who continue to endure the monstrous effects of the Balfour Declaration.

207. It is now more than 10 years since, in 1973, the Government of Gabon, concerned at the tragic fate of the fraternal Palestinian people, solemnly demonstrated its devotion to the ideals of justice and peace by breaking off diplomatic relations with Israel.

208. Today, 6 December 1984, when the United Nations is discussing this question, as it has done for very many years now, my delegation wishes to express once again the solidarity of the people of Gabon with the Palestinian people, which is waging a struggle the justness of which need not be proved.

209. In my delegation's opinion, the present debate should be, for all of us, a time of deep reflection and of awareness of what has come to be called the "Palestinian tragedy". This should be so despite the diversity of our origins and the differences in our political preferences and views.

210. None of us can be insensitive or indifferent to the genesis of the Palestinian people. The importance of the events certainly warrants a brief glance at the past in order better to understand that since 1947, faced with the Hebrew State's intransigence and stubborn refusal to accept the United Nations partition plan, the Palestinian people has been wandering throughout the world, seeking a land and a country.

211. The establishment of the Palestinian resistance in 1956, leading in 1964 to the birth of the PLO, unfortunately did not result in any concrete solution to the problem. On the contrary, it was followed by the settlement of Arab territories by Israel, after the so-called six-day war in June 1967.

212. Israel committed one misdeed after another; its malevolent and cynical behaviour reached its highest point in 1982 with the massacres at Sabra and Shatila, during which thousands of Palestinians met atrocious deaths. Another event, no less criminal, was the mass poisoning of Palestinian students in the occupied territories.

213. We cannot but be convinced that this squalid attitude on the part of the Hebrew State is a reflection of its notorious refusal to recognize the right of the Palestinian people to be different, its right to independence and self-determination. Israel takes this attitude despite the many resolutions, recommendations and decisions of the United Nations and the Organization of the Islamic Conference in favour of a negotiated solution to this problem.

214. Gabon, which supports the positions taken by the United Nations and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, believes that this refusal by Israel to recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people is a serious obstacle to détente in the region.

215. In our country's opinion, there cannot be any doubt that the climate of tension in the Middle East is the result of Israel's intransigence in pursuing an aggressive and annexationist policy against the Palestinian people, which has been deprived of its inalienable right to exist on its national territory. Israel's constant use of force makes more difficult the establishment of a real process of peaceful settlement of the Palestinian problem, which so seriously affects international peace and security.

216. Hence, it is not surprising that all the peace initiatives that have been undertaken recently have encountered difficulties. It also is not surprising that the relevant resolutions adopted by the Security Council and the General Assembly have not been implemented.

217. From that standpoint, we can only, most unfortunately, accept the fact that the Palestine problem has a very wide scope and also, and above all, that the situation in that part of the world is unstable. In this connection, I recall the words spoken on 10 October from this rostrum by Mr. Martin Bongo, Minister of State and Minister for Foreign Affairs and Co-operation of the Gabonese Republic, in reference to the situation prevailing in the Middle East:

> "In the Middle East . . . the Gabonese Government is convinced that a settlement that would not take into account the deeply felt aspirations of the Palestinian people cannot be a lasting one. In this connection, we reaffirm the right of the Palestinian people to a peaceful existence and to remain permanently within secure and recognized boundaries, like all other peoples in the region. Once again, we call upon the Government of Israel to put an end to its settlements policy in the occupied territories, a policy that is endangering the chances of an overall settlement of the conflict." [29th meeting, para. 132.]

218. Thus, for my delegation, Palestine is at the heart of the thorny problem of the insecurity in the Middle East and, at the same time, it is the nub of the Israeli-Arab conflict.

219. Therefore, just and lasting peace, and, what is more, an equitable solution to this conflict, will not be possible in Palestine and the Middle East unless Israel renounces recourse to force, which, unfortunately, it has always used as a means of deterrence or to settle its disputes with the Arab world.

220. As far as Gabon is concerned, the international community must be further convinced of the need for a clearer reaffirmation of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, led by the PLO, its only legitimate representative.

221. On the basis of its support for the United Nations resolutions, my country joins the international community in stating that the time has come for us to realize that peace in the region can be based only upon the complete withdrawal of Israel from all the Arab territories occupied since 1967, and the restoration of the legitimate right of the Palestinian people to establish a State of its own.

222. My delegation believes that such a process is the only one that could lead to peace. Hence, Israel must end its policy of establishing settlements, the consequences of which are serious even for the neighbouring countries of the region, which are faced with the situation of not being able to live in peace within secure and internationally recognized boundaries.

223. I cannot end this statement without paying a warm tribute to the Secretary-General, who has made unceasing efforts in support of the just cause of the Palestinian people. Here I should like to emphasize that some of his initiatives in this context are capable of bringing about a peaceful settlement of this dispute. Lastly, I wish to commend the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian people for the quality of its report [A/39/35].

224. My delegation has faith in the future and maintains the hope that all the steps taken within the United Nations and in various other international bodies will soon bring the international community to the point at which it can compel Israel to recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, which, like all other peoples in our civilized world, aspires to dignity, self-determination and independence.

The meeting rose at 6.15 p.m.

United Nations
GENERAL ASSEMBLY
THIRTY-NINTH SESSION

90th PLENARY MEETING

Friday, 7 December 1984, at 10.50 a.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

AGENDA ITEM 33

Question of Palestine (continued):

(a) Report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People;

(b) Report of the Secretary-General

1. Mr. MOUNKEILA (Niger) (interpretation from French): Hardly had the General Assembly finished its consideration of the contemptible system of apartheid, which is desperately striving to perpetuate its illegal domination of Namibia and its theory of separate development in South Africa, than it turned to another challenge: that of zionism in all its arrogance and in all its unjust, unacceptable and intolerable manifestations.

2. Like Pretoria, Tel Aviv has been defying the international community for nearly 40 years. More than 200 resolutions have been devoted to this question, resolutions which are the product of many years of reflection, effort, dedicated and painstaking work and perseverance, but which have led to frustration and shattered hopes. That is the impression we got from the Secretary-General's statement before the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva from 29 August to 7 September 1983, in which he said that the question of Palestine was among the problems which had been before the United Nations virtually since the creation of the world Organization and that we had not yet been able to resolve it.

3. This impression of powerlessness is given also by the report of the Secretary-General [A/39/130 and Add. 1], in which he informs the General Assembly about his efforts within the framework of resolution 38/58 C regarding the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East, aimed at achieving a comprehensive, just and lasting solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict, one essential element of which would be the creation in Palestine of an independent Palestinian State.

4. I would reassure those who have that impression: the powerlessness of the United Nations to settle the question of Palestine—and those of apartheid and Namibia—is felt by the Government and the people of Niger to be an insult to the Palestinian people, an affront to the Arab people and a challenge to the peoples of the entire world.

5. There is no need to lose hope. The road may be a long one, but it inevitably leads to the final goal: the creation in Palestine of an independent and sovereign Palestinian State. Just as Namibia's victory over South Africa is inevitable, it is true too, as stated by the Head of State of Niger, President Seyni Kountché, that: "The march of history is such that situations which are characterized only by a lack of progress always yield ultimately to the might of justice, the force of the rule of law, or the sword of freedom."

6. Let us hope and persevere. In a Sahelian country like Niger, those two words are full of meaning. Confronted every day with the hostile environment of the Sahel, where we manage to wrest our meagre daily bread, we have learned from history and nature to hope and to persevere, carefully to watch the horizon and beyond in the hope of glimpsing a small cloud bearing the rain of salvation. But although our eyes are riveted on the horizon, we do not ignore—quite the contrary—the scant ground water and underground sources we find at our feet.

7. Similarly, with regard to the question before us today, we shall persevere and continue to focus our gaze and our hopes on the international community, principally on certain States Members which have the power—but, even more, the international responsibility, as defined in the Charter of the United Nations—to put pressure on Israel to comply with the law and with international morality so that the Palestinian people may find justice. But just as with the waters and rains of the Great Sahel, our trust and hope in the international community must in no wise prevent us from looking around us and seeing that the Palestine Liberation Organization [PLO] exists as the sole representative of the heroic, struggling Palestinian people and that it should enjoy our full support. In this connection, my country's unequivocal position was stated before the General Assembly on 3 October 1984 by Mr. Idé Oumaru, Minister for Foreign Affairs and Co-operation:

> "At this stage, I would assure the martyred Palestinian people and battered Lebanon, as well as all the brother Arab countries of the battlefield, of the unswerving and active support of the Government and people of Niger. Niger, as is well known, spares no effort to ensure the triumph of justice and right in that part of the world." [19th meeting, para. 206.]

8. It is the responsibility primarily of the United Nations to resolve the present situation in that part of the world, as has been true since 1947 when it took on the mantle of the League of Nations in this regard. Member States have the duty in law to assist in this task by supporting the adoption and implementation of relevant resolutions on the question on the basis of the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force. Israel should unconditionally withdraw from Palestine and the Arab territories occupied since 1967, in conformity with Security Council resolutions 508 (1982) and 509 (1982).

9. In the meantime, as the de facto administering Power in those territories, Israel should comply with international law, particularly by refraining from modifying the ethnic and demographic character of the local population or its culture and civilization. Above all, Israel should comply with the various Geneva conventions on humanitarian law, particularly the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949.[1] The multi-ethnic and multi-religious status of the Holy City of Jerusalem must be preserved, in conformity with General Assembly resolution 35/169 E.

10. In the sphere of humanitarian issues and human rights, we cannot understand how the Israeli Government, which claims to represent one of history's most long-suffering peoples, can behave in a manner as intolerable as that of those who, about 40 years ago, were vowing that people's extermination. The disastrous living conditions of the populations of Palestine and the other occupied territories bear eloquent witness to this. Thus it was that the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories pertinently concluded its 1984 report by saying that:

> "the situation in the occupied territories suffers from continuing deterioration in the level of respect for the human rights of the civilian population . . . and affects all sectors . . . from the civil and political, to the economic, social and cultural sectors. On the other hand, the hundreds of thousands who are outside the occupied territories are still denied the right to return while their property is being taken over for the establishment of Israeli settlements." [See A/39/591, para. 338.]

11. A new element that is a source of major concern for my country is the appearance in Israel of a form of violence carefully structured into a kind of movement. The French weekly, Le Nouvel Observateur, of 16 November 1984, under the title "I fear for Israel" and with the subtitle, "How, by exalting anti-Arab terrorism, a madman exposes his country to the worst kind of threat", reports the comments of the Israeli writer Amos Kenan, author of The Road to Ein Harod, on the racist methods of the Kach movement, which means "thus", whose emblem is a closed fist against a yellow background, which signifies "this is what must be done with the Arabs". This rational structure of repression, directed by a certain member of the Knesset, has nothing to learn from certain notorious organizations of the past.

12. This is an abomination, an insult to the international conscience which demands action before it is too late.

13. Aware of this shameful, scandalous situation in the settlements, we call upon the Western countries and friends of Israel, which are often our friends and partners, to realize the danger and to take the necessary steps. We know that they have the means to do so; that with their respect for the human person and dedication to democracy they have the moral duty to do so; and that some of them, as permanent members of the Security Council, have a legal responsibility for international peace and security. Action should be all the easier today in that, according to certain information provided by the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories,

> "within Israel itself, movements have arisen and gained ground against this situation. The Special Committee has noted in particular information reflecting the increase of such protests by organizations such as that known as 'Peace Now'." [Ibid.]

14. We therefore feel that it is high time for a comprehensive, just and lasting political settlement of the question of Palestine. All our efforts must be aimed in that direction. This settlement should of course be based on the implementation of the relevant resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly, which recognize, among other things: the inadmissibility of the occupation of territories by force and thus the need for unconditional withdrawal by Israel from all the occupied Arab territories, including Jerusalem; recognition of the right of the Palestinian people to return, to self-determination and to the establishment of an independent, sovereign State in its homeland, Palestine, under the leadership of the PLO; and the full participation of the PLO in any peace process. As President Seyni Kountché stated:

> "We emphasize that any approach that would prevent the Palestine Liberation Organization from playing its part would run the risk of being neither just nor rational and would thus constitute only a provisional solution, that is to say, of being in no way final."

15. We call upon all States parties to this question to show a spirit of understanding and the political will necessary for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East, as recommended in General Assembly resolution 38/58 C and in the Geneva Declaration on Palestine adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983.[2] The two principal great Powers, in view of their interests in the region and above all in view of their responsibility as permanent members of the Security Council, the main and only organ charged with the maintenance of international peace and security, have an important role to play in the preparation, conduct and success of that conference. They must shoulder their historic responsibility in fact and in law as the principal architects of the famous resolution 273 (III) of 11 May 1949, which decided "that Israel is a peace-loving State which accepts the obligations contained in the Charter and is able and willing to carry out those obligations."

16. Thus, we appeal to the international community to deal with the consequences of this ingratitude and this challenge so that justice may be done to the Palestinian people. All the States Members of the United Nations should help in this noble task of the eradication of the greatest act of injustice of this century.

17. It would be ungrateful of us not to commend all the governmental and non-governmental organizations that have worked in one way or another to contribute to the search for peace and justice.

18. We thank especially the Secretary-General for his tireless efforts to achieve a consensus on the convening of an international conference on peace in the Middle East.

19. Our gratitude and congratulations go also to the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and especially to its Chairman, our friend and brother Massamba Sarré, whose dedication to the Palestinian cause is measured by his faith in justice and peace.

20. Niger, for its part, is ready today, as it has always been since its accession to sovereignty, to make its own honourable though modest contribution to the solution of this problem. As an African Muslim country, its traditions and its faith require it always to respond whenever and wherever justice, dignity and the flowering of the human spirit are at stake.

21. Mr. AL-SABBAGH (Bahrain) (interpretation from Arabic): On 29 November 1984 we commemorated, as is our custom, the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, in accordance with the objectives determined by the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. The Palestinian people are struggling to regain their legitimate rights and to establish their independent State on their national territory.

22. In the General Assembly, the international parliament which represents the overwhelming majority of the world community, we have been discussing this humanitarian question for more than three decades. Many resolutions have been adopted in order to try to end the explosive situation in the Middle East region and win recognition of the right of the Palestinian People to self-determination and realization of its legitimate interests. On a number of occasions the General Assembly has emphasized the need for a comprehensive settlement of the question of Palestine. The General Assembly and the Security Council, in many resolutions—in particular Security Council resolution 242 (1967)—have clearly stated the need for Israel to withdraw from the Arab territories occupied since 1967. We should be mindful of the historic responsibility which is legally incumbent upon the United Nations for a solution to be found to this extremely complicated question. On 29 November 1947, the General Assembly adopted resolution 181 (II), concerning the partition of Palestine and the creation of two States in Palestine: a Jewish State and a Palestinian State. Today, despite the complexity of the situation and the fact that it is deteriorating, and despite the deadlock in which we now find ourselves, the annexation by Israel of Palestinian territory for its political, strategic and military reasons, under the pretext of maintaining Israel's security, remains inadmissible.

23. Israel's occupation of Lebanon under the pretext of maintaining the security of its northern borders revealed that this pretext was false and empty. The situation in Lebanon has become more complicated. Israel was obliged to withdraw from Lebanese towns and to regroup in the south after having suffered very severe blows from the heroic Lebanese resistance. Thus the theory of Israeli security has fallen flat. We hope that the occupation of southern Lebanon will not last for long and that the Lebanese will themselves reach agreement on how to effect their national reconciliation and resolve their problems.

24. Israel is today carrying out a policy of establishing settlements. The Arab peoples, including the Palestinians, who have struggled for many decades for their national liberation from all dependency and from any form of colonialism, will never bow to this new aggressive policy of expansionism. They will confront it with determination, as they confronted colonialism in its most heinous form in the past.

25. Israel has adopted a policy of arbitrary oppression in an attempt to deprive the Palestinian people of its identity. It carries out a policy of repression and mass extermination and has not hesitated, when deemed necessary, to have recourse to shedding blood and introducing terrorism and violence in the Middle East.

26. The Palestinian people, which has suffered for a long time, will always have a powerful and strong will, for it is a people that believes in the justice of its cause and is prepared to make any sacrifice to recover its freedom and its national independence. We believe that Israel will never succeed in undermining the identity and the personality of the Palestinians, just as it will not crush their hopes, which are embodied in the PLO, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. Zionist plots and propaganda will all come to naught.

27. A just settlement of the question of Palestine is at the very basis of any solution of the Middle East problem. The cause of the conflict in that important region of the world—which is under constant tension—resides in the failure to recognize the rights of the Palestinian people, whose aspiration is to return to their usurped country and to enjoy their full rights.

28. The entire world has recognized the rights of the Palestinian people, a heroic and courageous people, a people which has won international solidarity. But these aspirations have to be transformed into specific actions which will help the Palestinians to exercise their right to self-determination and the creation of their own independent State, and to recover their inalienable rights. It is extremely regrettable that numerous resolutions, decisions and recommendations of the United Nations on this question have so far failed to allow them to recover their homeland or to exercise their inalienable rights. It is not enough to make recommendations and adopt resolutions without international implementation and commitment.

29. World public opinion has supported the implementation of the rights and aspirations of the Palestinian people, but it appears that it no longer wishes simply to listen to eloquent and lengthy statements made in international forums.

30. There is now a growing international awareness of the claims put forward by the Palestinian people and of the necessity of achieving a comprehensive and just solution taking into account the aspirations of the Palestinian people. The question of Palestine has now been considered in the United Nations for more than three decades and the international community must now succeed in creating the State promised to the Palestinians. It is not enough that we stand behind the Palestinians and understand their problems. We must find a political solution to this question, because it is an issue which concerns an entire people and a nation and is not simply a matter of refugees. It is therefore up to the major Powers concerned to listen to the Palestinians and recognize their rights to self-determination and the creation of a Palestinian State, and to save this region, which is experiencing constant tension, from the scourge of war. Otherwise, the security and safety of the region will be further endangered, and the entire situation could explode.

31. It is hardly necessary here to repeat what Israel's policies are—to annex occupied Arab territories and to continue their policy of colonization after the exodus of the population and after confiscating their lands, as in 1981 when the Golan Heights and East Jerusalem were annexed. The important thing is to ascertain how we can put an end to Israeli occupation and to this escalation of a policy of aggression against the unarmed Palestinian people.

32. This session of the General Assembly, like previous sessions, will undoubtedly adopt resolutions in favour of the Palestinian people. And Israel, as it has done in the past, will reject all these resolutions and all the appeals made by the international community asking it to withdraw from occupied Arab territories. International law prohibits the acquisition of territory by force, but, through force and faits accomplis, Israel has spurned all international decisions. For that reason, it is up to all States that support Israel economically and militarily to put an end to that support and to exert pressure on Israel to abide by international resolutions, those of the General Assembly and the Security Council. Only then would the Middle East become a region enjoying both peace and security.

33. The readiness of the Arabs and the Palestinians to accept a peace based on right and legitimacy has clearly been shown in the Final Declaration adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference.[3] It expressed the desire of the Arabs, including the Palestinians, to reach a peaceful and just solution in the Middle East. All hopes are now placed in the possibility of an international peace conference being held, with the participation of all parties concerned, in order to find a solution to the Palestinian problem in accordance with the principles underlying the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983. It is up to the United Nations to assume its historic responsibilities and organize that conference, on which will hinge the future of peace in our region.

34. In conclusion, the Palestine National Council, which met recently at Amman, has reaffirmed that the PLO is the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

35. Mr. SHIHABI (Saudi Arabia) (interpretation from Arabic): The question of Palestine, the question of questions of the century, is the problem of a people, the problem of a homeland, a problem of regional peace, a problem of international peace, a question of human rights and of homelands, a problem of frontiers and neighbours, a question of the deceit of an ally and the treachery of a friend, a problem of usurping the wealth of a people and of destroying the future of a nation, a problem of attacks on sacred places and of violation of places of worship. It is the quintessence of all the problems of the century. They brought it to the altar of the United Nations in order to slay it, but it was stronger than the knife they wanted to slay it with. But truth will overcome every falsehood.

36. I should like to express our appreciation and gratitude for the efforts of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. Its objectives and activities represent an enlightened dimension of the work of the Organization in its efforts to promote the implementation of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations at a time when it is discovering the extent to which some countries that signed the Charter have violated its text and spirit. There is no choice for the United Nations and for the world but to secure the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people. It is the only way to avoid further deterioration of the situation in the region and the world.

37. While we are today discussing the question of Palestine for the thirty-eighth year in succession, some might ask, if they are unaware of the facts: What is new about the problem of Palestine that it is continually discussed at the United Nations? The question in itself has the implicit and adequate answer for the inquirer.

38. The story begins in the General Assembly in 1947, when Great Britain, the State that after the First World War was entrusted by the League of Nations to administer Palestine and guarantee the rights of the Palestinian people, referred the problem to the United Nations. Great Britain had by then, within a period of 30 years, allowed 600,000 Zionist immigrants into the country from various parts of the world. The United Nations, under tremendous political pressure well known to those who were then present, had allocated unjustly, and amazingly, a part of the country under its administration to those immigrants who had entered during the 30-year period under the protection of the foreign occupation Power, and who owned only 6 per cent of the registered land of Palestine. Imagine such an unjust verdict emanating from a body that was asked to restore the rights of the victims of injustice and aggression, but instead committed the crime of attempting to eliminate the legitimate party. What an oppressive judge, and what a bad verdict!

39. That was the beginning of the problem in the United Nations 38 years ago, when the Organization was deceived and all sorts of political pressures were used to secure a majority of votes to recommend the partition of the Arab country of Palestine and the establishment of a Zionist State on part of it. They succeeded in passing that dubious resolution in the General Assembly.

40. The partition resolution [resolution 181 (II)], which was founded on corrupt premises, will remain subject to controversy and will be a threat to those living in Palestine or its vicinity if the situation is not rectified and a solution found that preserves the legitimate rights of the people of the country. Here we are again after 38 years, witnessing the continuing importance of the question concerning which the United Nations was misused for the purpose of committing the ugliest of injustices against a people in its own land, and witnessing the oppression increasing in complexity, while the criminal is at large, wreaking havoc in the region.

41. One glance at this farce, through which an attempt was made to determine the destiny of a whole people, coupled with an understanding of the composition of the United Nations today in comparison to that period, demonstrates how inadequate was the capacity of the General Assembly then to represent all the peoples of the world in a real sense and to express the opinions of all those peoples.

42. Article 1 of the Charter of the United Nations was clear when it stated that one of the objectives of the United Nations is: "To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples". That is what the Charter states. What was the destiny of the Palestinian people? And what were the real positions of the peoples of the world then, at the time of the adoption of the partition resolution, when most of them were under the domination of foreign Powers against their own will?

43. The fact that, in 1947, the United Nations represented the peoples of the world by a ratio of only one to three is one of the main reasons for the tragedy of today. The 102 States that have become Members of the Organization since 1947 and that are now sitting among us expressing the free will of their people, have transformed the General Assembly from an exclusive club of 51 States to a truly international Organization which sees the light and is guided by it. If voting on the resolution on the partition of Palestine were to take place today, when the United Nations far better represents peoples enjoying full independence, the resolution would be defeated by a majority of at least 100 votes. In 1947, it was passed unjustly by a majority of 33 votes in the name of present States Members of the Organization that could not then vote on it. Thus, after 38 years, the question of Palestine remains before the United Nations, while the ferocity of Israeli aggression against the heart of Palestinian Arab society and against the demography of the various parts of the country continues to increase, spreading its evil to the neighbouring Arab countries after having engulfed the West Bank and Gaza. The danger of the Israeli adventures for regional and international security are also greater than ever before. This dangerous situation worsens every day, with each successive day revealing more clearly the malevolent intentions and dangerous schemes threatening the security of individuals and peoples and the peace of the region and the world.

44. After a great deal of suffering the Arabs rightly put forward a peace proposal, which was adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference,[3] with a view to stabilizing the situation which would make it possible to avoid the danger of the continuance of this perilous conflict. That plan was rejected by all the parties and institutions of the Zionist entity. Here I must ask whether the Zionists really want security, really want peace. If they did, they would have hastened to accept the Arab proposal. They do not want peace and are against security and safety. Their deeds testify to this and their pronouncements confirm it. They say that they want secure borders, but they refuse to define those borders. Where are those borders that they speak of? It is the duty and the right of the General Assembly to challenge the Israeli entity to give us details of the borders that it wants to protect. Or is it that Israel does not want any borders at all, so that the Arab East may remain a quagmire, with open frontiers and sky, where aggressive zionism can run in any direction it wants? The Zionists will have to recognize—probably after it is too late—that their course of action is the swiftest formula for destruction and ruin.

45. The Zionist claim was founded on deception and falsehood, first in Jewish circles and then in international circles, and this has not changed. They deceived the Jews of the world, leading them into believing that the road to Palestine was paved and the distance short. They deceived the world when they said that Palestine was a land without people for a people without a land. Some of the Zionist documents of that period even referred casually to "the presence of some population in the land of Palestine from tribes that lack the characteristics necessary for political existence in the country and represent distant waves of immigration from the Arab world to Palestine, which makes them ineligible for any rights". Today, the Assembly sees the truth of the matter and the extent of the deception the Israelis have practised and continue to practise in order to reach their goals.

46. That is how the Zionist thinking was established in the minds of the adherents of zionism, who were scattered throughout the world before they succeeded, thanks to foreign imperialism, in securing a foothold in Arab land. It was established on the basis of propaganda and political theories based on deception, conspiracy and trickery. Once they had secured a foothold in the country, the Zionists began to practise terrorism of all kinds everywhere and at all levels in order to establish an unjust colonialist entity in the heart of the Arab land.

47. This is a scenario carried out by the Zionists while they usurp a place in the heart of the greater Arab nation and in the centre of the Islamic world, attacking the rights and the sacred shrines of the Arab people from a position of strength imported from outside and supported by Powers that are in all ways foreign, a place that is temporary in nature, no matter how long it may last. It is inevitable that the Arab and Islamic world, through the preponderance of its population, its great numerical superiority, its vast strategic capacity and its accelerated scientific and technological progress, will gain the upper hand one not-too-distant day. Two million Zionists coveting Palestine, or a million Zionists convinced that they can impose a fait accompli, are not enough. The last word is with those who really have the right. Violent aggression against their country, their people, their rights and their holy places, the holy places of Muslims and Christians, will only increase the attachment of Arabs and Muslims to their legitimate rights.

48. The Zionists now occupy the whole of Palestine and are controlling Al-Quds and parts of the neighbouring Arab countries. They are also threatening all the Arab and Muslim countries that are not their neighbours. Here we must reflect on the city of Al-Quds, where there is the Al-Aqsa Mosque, whose sanctity they are attempting to defile. They are attempting to change the physical nature of the city and its demographic composition. The Zionists do not care about these traditions. The world outside the Muslim world is not aware how dangerous this attempt is for the security of the region. We take this opportunity to tell the world clearly how serious the Zionists' action in Al-Quds is. They are challenging the sentiments of 1,000 million Muslims concerning this city, and their devotion to it, for it is dear to the heart of every Muslim and every Christian. They should know that the depth of the Islamic world's devotion to Al-Quds will not be influenced by attempts to create Zionist faits accomplis, no matter how hard the Zionists try. Moreover, the whole world will see that these attempts will, God willing, work against the achievement of their objectives. I should like to draw the attention of those that support Zionist aggression from afar to the dangerous consequences of the crime against the whole Islamic world in which they are participating. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and all the Islamic States have alerted the world to the grave repercussions the Zionist schemes in Al-Quds would have.

49. The Arab people of Palestine began their struggle 65 years ago to preserve the identity of their land, their security and the sanctity of their holy places, and to build an independent State in their historical homeland, Palestine.

50. Those that have the right, the Arab people of Palestine, under the leadership of the PLO, their sole legitimate representative, have risen up today to demand once again that the international community fulfil its commitments while they, supported by the entire Arab and Islamic world and all the peoples which uphold justice, are struggling to preserve their rights, because justice is a force in itself and a power that cannot be defeated. Experience has shown that rights that have not been abandoned can never be lost. The Palestinian people will never cease their struggle until they enjoy their legitimate rights in their own land. They are supported and aided in this struggle to the fullest extent by the whole Arab world and the whole Islamic world, as well as by those that uphold justice and right everywhere in the world. We give this advice to those that are bargaining with the Palestinians over those rights and those that are giving unlimited support to the Zionist entity: they must realize how serious is the accumulation of injustices suffered by the Palestinians over the years; yet the Palestinian people and the Arab and Islamic peoples have only become more devoted than ever to the legitimate rights of Arabs and Muslims in Palestine. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and the other Arab and Islamic countries, as well as all the peoples of the world which support justice, have no hesitation in fulfilling their responsibility to support Arab and Islamic rights in Palestine until those rights are restored to their true owners.

51. It is more necessary than ever before for the General Assembly to forge a peace based on a clear and exemplary framework and restore to the Palestinians the rights which it participated in violating when its will was alienated. The great Powers, in particular, must realize that the present day is different from that of 29 November 1947, the day the partition resolution [resolution 181 (II)] was adopted. As for zionism, after all its experience in violating the rights of the Palestinian Arab people, it is only exposing its entity to danger if it does not respond to the call for what is right. The right of the Palestinian people will inevitably be restored.

52. Mr. OTT (German Democratic Republic): The comprehensive solution of the Middle East conflict is one of the important international tasks of our time, and the key to it is undoubtedly a just settlement of the question of Palestine. This problem is highly topical. The enjoyment of their legitimate rights by the Palestinian people remains central to a peace settlement in the Middle East. The dangerous developments under way in the region show that the main obstacle to peace and security in the Middle East is Israel's continued aggression.

53. By using brutal force and perpetrating acts of terror, the Israeli rulers are stepping up the entrenchment of the occupation régime in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, the Syrian Golan Heights and southern Lebanon. Every day new crimes are added to the innumerable ones committed against the Palestinian people. The world will never forget the bloody massacres at Sabra and Shatila and the act of terror against the Palestinian refugee camp of Ein el-Hilweh. The aim behind the intensified terror is to intimidate the Palestinian population, destroy its communal and social institutions and thereby expel it from its soil. In this way, faits accomplis are to be created that will enable Israel finally to incorporate the Palestinian territories.

54. In the Final Communiqué adopted by the Meeting of Ministers and Heads of Delegation of the Non-Aligned Countries to the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly, held in New York from 1 to 5 October this year, the Ministers and Heads of Delegation quite rightly

> "expressed their opposition to the continued violation of the rights of the indigenous Arab inhabitants, their forced dispersion and other policies aimed at changing the basic character and legal status of these territories. They affirmed that these practices and policies run contrary to international law and relevant resolutions of the United Nations and were declared on many occasions and in various forums null and void, confirming that Israel is non-peace-loving and should be treated accordingly." [See A/39/560, para. 55.]

55. It is therefore only too understandable that this significant communiqué also contains the demand that measures should be applied against Israel under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.

56. The German Democratic Republic is in agreement with the overwhelming majority of States Members of the United Nations in resolutely condemning once again Israel's continued policy of aggression and occupation.

57. There is growing awareness all over the world that the attitude of the main imperialist Power based on the striving for hegemony is the main reason why, despite the great efforts undertaken by the United Nations and the majority of States, it has not yet been possible to force Israel into ending its policy, which endangers peace, and to restore the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people.

58. The United States not only ignores the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people but, through its course of confrontation and arms buildup, involving as a major component the deployment of medium-range nuclear missiles in Western Europe, encourages the Israeli leadership to perpetrate new acts of aggression against Arab States and ruthlessly to enforce its plans for territorial expansion.

59. There can therefore be no doubt that the strategic alliance between the United States and Israel remains a constant threat to peace and to the existence of the Arab peoples. That is why it is now more essential than ever before that all forces that are seriously interested in maintaining international peace and security redouble their efforts in order to expose the objectives of the fateful strategic alliance and to force Israel into abandoning its policy of aggression and occupation and implementing the United Nations resolutions on the question of Palestine.

60. In the communiqué on the meeting of the Committee of Foreign Ministers of the Warsaw Treaty States, held at Berlin on 3 and 4 December 1984, the following is stated:

> "The States represented at the meeting condemn the imperialist policy of force and manifest their solidarity with and support for the peoples fighting for their freedom, the strengthening of their independence and socio-economic progress." [See A/39/763, annex.]

61. The International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983, reaffirmed that the right to the establishment of an independent State is the central problem in implementing the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. There is no way to disregard the Palestinian people or to ignore the exercise of its right to self-determination, to the establishment of its own independent State, to return and to compensation. Attempts to reach separate deals or have negotiations without the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, the PLO, are incompatible with the interests of the Palestinian people. Guided by this awareness, the overwhelming majority of States is actively committed to ensuring the speediest implementation of the Geneva Declaration on Palestine and the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights, adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine.[2]

62. In the light of the anti-peace and aggressive course pursued by Israel and its allies, it is imperative to intensify collective efforts in order to resolutely counter the dangerous developments in the Middle East. In this connection, the German Democratic Republic attaches great importance to the principles and approaches for a Middle East settlement proposed by the Soviet Union on 29 July 1984 [see A/39/368] and fully endorses them. It reiterates from this rostrum its sympathy with and high appreciation of the courageous struggle waged by the Palestinian people. It regards the preservation of the unity and cohesion of the Palestine resistance movement and the creation of a close fighting community of all patriotic Arab forces as a condition for the victory of the just Palestinian cause.

63. In a message sent by the Chairman of the Council of State of the German Democratic Republic, Erich Honecker, to the Secretary-General on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, commemorated on 29 November 1984, the German Democratic Republic reaffirmed its principled position on the Middle East problem and the question of Palestine, as well as its solidarity with the struggle of the Arab people of Palestine:

> "To the German Democratic Republic the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People is a fitting occasion to assure the Palestinian people of its firm solidarity in the struggle for its legitimate rights under the leadership of the Palestine Liberation Organization. The German Democratic Republic advocates a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement of the Middle East conflict. This requires that the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including its right to the establishment of an independent State, be assured. Israel must without delay withdraw from all territories it has occupied since 1967, including East Jerusalem. It is only in this way that peace, security and the independent development of all States and peoples in the region can be ensured.
> "The German Democratic Republic emphatically supports the demand of the overwhelming majority of States for the early convocation of an international Middle East conference with the participation of all interested sides, including the Palestine Liberation Organization, the sole, legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. Israel and the United States must no longer be allowed to scorn world public opinion and to continue blocking the convening of such a conference."

64. Mr. AL-KAWARI (Qatar) (interpretation from Arabic): The question of Palestine has been considered by the General Assembly since the creation of the United Nations and has been present on the agenda of every session. Many resolutions have been adopted by the General Assembly and the Security Council, as well as by other United Nations bodies, regarding the question of Palestine. Despite that, all of those resolutions have remained a dead letter.

65. Nevertheless, the continued consideration by the United Nations of the question of Palestine has not been in vain. The pursuit of this question and the attempt to find solutions to all of its aspects is a moral and historic obligation for the Organization. In fact, to return to the source of the problem it is necessary to go back to the League of Nations, to which the United Nations is heir. The Organization had to play the same major role, and it conferred on the question its new image and form when the General Assembly adopted resolution 181 (II) on 29 November 1947, a resolution which gave the green light to the resort to force for the usurpation of the larger part of Palestine. It is that brute force, unfortunately, that prevails today in that cherished part of our Arab world.

66. For these reasons and because this situation continues to threaten international peace and security, it is the duty of the United Nations not to lose sight of the question of Palestine for even a moment until a just and comprehensive solution is found that will right the wrongs, respect the right of peoples to self-determination and enable peace to return to this region that has suffered for so long from the scourge of war.

67. The State of Qatar supports and endorses the ceaseless struggle of the fraternal Palestinian people to obtain its legitimate national rights. We stand side by side with this heroic people and its legitimate representative, the PLO, in all efforts to find a just settlement by every means available to it, until such time as the heroic Palestinian people can exercise its legitimate rights and benefit from the rights enjoyed by all peoples of the world, namely, to self-determination and to the establishment of a State of its own on an equal footing with other peoples.

68. The long struggle waged by the Palestinian people against usurpation, aggression and brutal oppression, and the determination of this people to recover its national rights have enjoyed broad international support, manifested each year by the observance of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, as well as by the great majority endorsing the resolutions that have been adopted condemning the Zionist entity and calling for the realization of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people. Moreover, many international conferences have adopted resolutions supporting the rights of the Palestinian people. The latest was the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983, which adopted the Geneva Declaration on Palestine and the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights,[2] two important instruments which could serve as a basis for a just solution to the question of Palestine. Noteworthy was the proposal to convene an international conference on peace in the Middle East in which all interested parties would participate, including the PLO and the permanent members of the Security Council. Most countries of the world supported that proposal. My country hopes that if it is adopted at the present session, everyone will welcome it so that the long-awaited peace in the Middle East can be achieved.

69. We wonder what enables the Zionist entity constantly to defy the international community and its resolutions. The answer to this question is clear to all: it is the unlimited support afforded by certain parties, without regard to its failure to observe the will of the international community and the resolutions of the United Nations.

Mr. Lusaka (Zambia) took the Chair.

70. The New York Times of 14 October 1984 published an article which emphasized the feeling of security enjoyed by the Zionists. It said:

> "At a dinner here in his honour Tuesday night, Mr. Peres told a story that revealed much about Israel's dependency. He recalled that when former Prime Minister Levi Eshkol was Minister of Agriculture, an aide came to him saying, 'There's some bad news; there's a drought.' Mr. Eshkol asked, 'Where? In Israel or in the United States?' When the aide said, 'In Israel,' Mr. Eshkol sighed with relief and said that as long as it was not in the United States, Israel could manage without trouble. Mr. Peres then went on to say that he was glad it was raining in Washington because the economy in Israel was 'dry'."*

71. The time factor has become so important that we cannot continue to delay serious and effective efforts to find a solution to the question of Palestine as soon as possible. The international community cannot stand idly by as an observer any longer in the face of the unchecked attempts by Israel to liquidate the question of Palestine by creating settlements, confiscating land and modifying the demographic structure of Palestine and the conditions of life in the occupied Palestinian territories; this only encourages Israeli terrorist organizations to try to force the Palestinians to leave their territory and their homeland, as well as the attempts to face the world with a fait accompli. Through these actions, Israel is defying the resolutions of the General Assembly and Security Council with complete impunity. This is why the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983, rightly emphasized the importance of the time factor and the need for a just and speedy solution to the question of Palestine.

72. The international community must reaffirm to the Zionist entity that it categorically rejects the acquisition of territories by force and cannot allow a people to be deprived of the right to live on its own land. Whatever attempts Israel may make to erase the Palestinian presence in Palestine, they will not be crowned with success. The lessons of history show this and their meaning is clear. The plundering of lands by armed aggression does not confer any rights upon the aggressor. The denial of the rights of a people through repression and terror cannot force that people to forget or to give up its rights. Peace and security cannot be founded on force. Justice and equity are the sole means of ensuring the security of peoples.

73. My country, like all peace-loving countries that support the rights of peoples, hopes that all States will realize the gravity of the situation resulting from the paralysis surrounding the question of Palestine and the need to find a just and speedy solution. The time for talk is past. It is high time that we acted decisively, without further delay.

74. Mr. GOLOB (Yugoslavia): For 37 years, generations of Palestinians have been born under foreign rule and domination or have experienced the plight of refugees. The Palestinian people, like other peoples, are born to be free but are denied their basic rights both as individuals and as a nation.

75. During all those years, we have called for and supported the exercise of the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and to establish their own State. During all those years, the main issue has remained unchanged: the right to self-determination, to national independence, to protection from the acquisition of foreign territories by force, to return to one's own home and to the establishment of one's own State. For years it has been clear that the exercise of these rights by the Palestinian people is the prerequisite for a just, lasting and comprehensive peace in the Middle East.

76. This has become a test of the conscience of the United Nations that cannot be evaded any longer. The ideals of self-determination, of national independence, of freedom have become an inspiration and a support for the endeavours to bring about a new, better and more stable world.

77. In the course of contemporary history there have been few examples of a people's suffering for so long and struggling with such determination for their right to exist as is the case with the Palestinian people.

78. During all this time, the Israeli policy of expansion and domination has been an obstacle to the solution of this issue and of the crisis in the Middle East in general. This policy not only inflicts suffering on the Palestinian people but perpetuates the process of mistrust, instability and conflict in the Middle East and beyond. The responsibility of all those that are supporting the policy of expansion and domination, either actively or passively, has become greater with the passage of time.

79. There is a growing consensus that peace in the Middle East cannot be built around the denial of the existence of an entire people or around the denial of the right of the Palestinian people to exist.

80. The international community has become even more determined in its opposition to the use of force and to the acquisition and expansion of foreign territories by Israel. The faits accomplis of that policy have never been accepted, nor have the temporary successes of aggression, expansion and the acquisition of territories by force. This would not only be contrary to the basic norms of international law, but also would run counter to the aspirations of peoples to freedom and independence.

81. The West Bank, the Gaza Strip, Jerusalem, the Syrian Golan Heights and part of Lebanon remain under Israeli occupation. Israel continues to establish illegal settlements on Palestinian and Arab lands and to disregard decisions of the General Assembly and the Security Council. It persistently attempts to resolve the question of Palestine by terror and war. Only recently, it once again sowed death among Palestinian students and youth in the West Bank. It is constantly threatening peace and security in the Middle East and beyond.

82. Palestinians have their ethnic, historic and cultural identity, as well as a political entity expressed through the PLO, its sole and legitimate representative. They are constantly showing their resolve not to give up their right to freedom and self-determination and not to be brought to their knees.

83. The Palestinian people have been dealt with without mercy. They are still being chased from their land, but they have maintained their unity and resolve in the most adverse conditions.

84. They are well aware that history abounds with testimony that those fighting for freedom are stronger than those imposing domination and that nothing attracts the support of other peoples more than determination to persist in the fight for right against the policy that might is right.

85. All those who support the just cause of the Palestinian people were heartened by the recent meeting at Amman of the Palestine National Council. The Palestinian people, through their representatives, reaffirmed once again their unity. They have served warning once again that all attempts to eliminate the Palestinian people, and the PLO as its sole legitimate representative, are bound to fail. They have shown their determination to maintain the independence of their institutions, and they have expressed again their full independence and their full confidence in the PLO and in its leadership, headed by the Chairman of its Executive Committee, Yasser Arafat.

86. It is appropriate to recall at this point the important and substantial work that has been done for the Palestinian cause by the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, of which Yugoslavia is a member. The Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Massamba Sarré, of Senegal, leads that Committee in a dedicated manner and an imaginative way, and the Committee strives consistently to increase the international community's support for the cause of the Palestinian people.

87. The Movement of Non-Aligned Countries continues to be the firmest and broadest stronghold of the struggle for freedom and independence of all peoples and countries. From the time of the first Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Belgrade in September 1961, more than two decades ago, the non-aligned countries have been steadfast supporters of the struggle of the Palestinian people for self-determination.

88. In their desire to render more effective support to the legitimate struggle of the Palestinian people in accordance with the will of the non-aligned countries, they established the Non-Aligned Committee of Eight on Palestine, of which Yugoslavia is a member. This was done in the light of an urgent need to take renewed and concrete steps within the United Nations aimed at resolving the issue of Palestine and the Middle East crisis as a whole.

89. On 3 October 1984, the Committee of Eight, chaired by India, met at the ministerial level. The meeting called for renewed efforts to ensure the convening of an international conference on peace in the Middle East, under the auspices of the United Nations. It should be recalled that such a conference was envisaged in the Geneva Declaration on Palestine, adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983,[2] and endorsed by the General Assembly in resolution 38/58 C. It was felt that such a conference should bring about the exercise of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people and that it would be the best framework for finding a comprehensive, just and lasting solution.

90. It is encouraging that an overwhelming majority of Member States have pronounced themselves in favour of convening such a conference. It should be stressed again that everything should be done to convene that conference and that it is the responsibility of all international factors to display stronger political will in that regard.

91. The Secretary-General should be supported in his own ongoing efforts aimed at convening this conference.

92. The peoples of Yugoslavia are rendering full support to the proud Palestinian people in its struggle. In conformity with its own policy of independence and non-alignment, Yugoslavia has always considered that the PLO is the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and that it should participate, on an equal footing, in all efforts, deliberations and conferences on the question of Palestine and on the Arab-Israeli conflict. The solution to that question can be based only on the unconditional withdrawal of Israel from all Arab and Palestinian territories occupied since June 1967, including Jerusalem, as well as on the realization of the Palestinian people's inalienable rights to independence and sovereignty, including the right to their own State and the right of the Palestinian refugees to return to their homes. It must be based, too, on a recognition of the right of all States and peoples in the region to secure national existence and independent social development.

93. Mr. LE KIM CHUNG (Viet Nam): The question of Palestine has been on the agenda of the General Assembly for almost four decades. Four decades is indeed a long time for the Palestinian people, who have overcome all hardships and difficulties to wage a heroic struggle for national salvation and for the past, present and future of a peaceful and diligent people. It is Israel that has taken their land, thus forcing them to seek refuge and shelter in foreign countries. It is also Israel that has massacred them in cold blood. The killing of 254 innocent Palestinians at Deir Yassin in April 1948 was only a curtain-raiser. It was followed in July 1948 by the massacre of 580 Palestinians at Dawaymeh. This was recently exposed by Hadashot, an Israeli newspaper. Sabra and Shatila will surely not be the last. So long as an independent Palestinian State has not been established in Palestine, there will still exist the displacement of people, the annexation of territory and genocide-like massacre of Palestinians.

94. We have already had the opportunity to express our views on the question of the Middle East. Superficially, that is the question of the Israeli-Arab conflict. But lying at the heart of that conflict is the question of Palestine. Anyone familiar with the situation in the region can see it, and numerous resolutions of the United Nations and of the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi in March 1983, reaffirm it.

95. The essence of the question of Palestine is the war of aggression and annexation waged by Israel against the Palestinian people and, logically, the latter's struggle for national liberation and for the establishment of an independent State of its own in Palestine. In the last four decades, these people have been held hostage to perfidious intrigues; they have become the most direct victims of Israel's zionism and expansionism. Zionism resorts to violence and sheer force of arms to impose its will on other peoples, first and foremost the Palestinian people. Violence has become a pattern of Israel's expansionist policy towards achieving the ultimate goal of setting up a "Greater Israel". The Israeli authorities want to annihilate the Palestinian resistance forces under their juggernaut of war; they wish to terminate the existence and identity of the Palestinians as a people. Therefore, within days of Israel's birth, over one million Palestinians were uprooted and forced out of their land. Subsequent wars have scattered them further, from Africa to Europe, and to other Arab countries. These wars also serve a subsidiary purpose: the Israeli authorities mean to threaten the Arab countries into ending their help and assistance to the Palestinian people, for the message is clear that Israel will use violence against those countries that give refuge and shelter to the Palestinians.

96. In recent years, Israel has stepped up the establishment of settlements in the areas under its occupation. These settlers are protected by Israeli armed forces and they themselves are allowed to carry firearms and to kill the Palestinians at will. Newspapers have reported recent killings of students and peaceful demonstrators against Israel's policy of settlements and its attempts to destroy East Jerusalem, a sacred site for all Muslims. We denounce and condemn in the strongest terms these criminal acts by Israel and demand that it put an immediate end to its inhumane practices against innocent people.

97. The United States must also bear responsibility for Israel's acts. We are not going to rake up old scores, from its hasty recognition of Israel only hours after the latter's birth, or its connivance as an accomplice of Israel in the wars against the Palestinian and Arab people, to the presence of its armed forces in the region and in adjacent areas. We simply refer to its strategic alliance and its devotion to Israel's fate. The United States has provided Israel with billions of dollars and all kinds of modern weapons. Its financial support, military aid and political protection have enabled Israel to step up its wars of aggression and annexation, to speed up its settlements in occupied areas and to be more aggressive and obstinate in its defiance of United Nations resolutions and international law. In its role as the regional gendarme, Israel has rendered service to the United States global strategy.

98. Yet the United States and its most important ally in the Middle East have never achieved their goals. Their attempt to sow division among Arab countries has failed. The Palestinian resistance forces cannot be annihilated as they expected. The Palestinian people, under the leadership of the PLO, their sole authentic and legitimate representative, have enjoyed the firm and concrete support and assistance of the Arab and international communities in their intensified struggle against the Israeli aggressors. The Palestinian fighters are admired and respected for their endurance and heroism in their resistance against Israel's forces in Beirut, in Tripoli, in the Bekaa Valley and elsewhere. The struggle of the Palestinian people has now taken on new dimensions and has gained even more support and sympathy.

99. The international community has really shown deep understanding and has made great contributions, particularly in the fields of education, health services and humanitarian relief, in order to alleviate the sustained suffering of these people. But no matter how great and important these generous activities are, they are only palliatives that cannot solve on a long-term basis the central issue of the Middle East conflict, that is, the question of Palestine. The root cause of the deadlock in the situation in the Middle East and in the settlement of the Palestine question, and hence the prolonged tension in the region, is the United States policy of aggression and intervention, either directly or with Israel as its instrument. It is clear that the United States "peace plans" can never solve the problem; the process of Camp David can only lead to deadlock. There will be no breakthrough; there will be no peace and security in the Middle East so long as the question of Palestine has not been solved. To do so, Israel must stop its policy of state terrorism and territorial annexation. It must respect the fundamental national rights of the Palestinian people, their right to self-determination, including the right to return and to establish an independent State of their own in Palestine. The two entwined questions, that is, the question of the Middle East and the question of Palestine, should be settled through a peaceful comprehensive solution which ensures Israel's withdrawal from all the occupied territories, including Jerusalem, and respect for the legitimate interests of all countries in the region—and Palestine must be one of those countries. Such a solution can be achieved only through the convening of an international conference on the Middle East, with the participation of all parties concerned on an equal footing, including the PLO, the United States and the Soviet Union. Such a conference has been envisaged in the relevant resolutions of the thirty-eighth session of the General Assembly and by the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held in 1983. The proposals by the Soviet Union of 29 July 1984 [see A/39/368] serve as a good basis for the conference on the Middle East, for they have settled the principles and modalities for the conference, thereby enjoying the support of public opinion. So far, the only obstacle to the convening of such a conference is the negative attitude and reaction of the United States and Israel, and we must condemn them for that.

100. The delegation of Viet Nam once again commends the Secretary-General for his tireless efforts to bring about the convening of an international conference on the Middle East. Special credit should also be given to the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People for its efforts to mobilize world public opinion and solidarity with and material support for the just cause of the Palestinian people, and for its exhaustive report and up-to-date information on the situation concerning the plight of these people. We fully support the strict implementation of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, which, among other things, call for the total boycotting and isolation of Israel and an end to any form of relations with Israel. We support the Geneva Declaration on Palestine and Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights, approved by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine,[2] held at Geneva last year. We are pleased to say that we have joined the list of co-sponsors of the draft resolutions which the Committee has worked out in detail.

101. In conclusion, I would like to quote from the message of the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Socialist Republic of Viet Nam, addressed to the Secretary-General and to the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, commemorated on 29 November of this year:

> "The people and Government of the Socialist Republic of Viet Nam constantly and resolutely support the just struggle of the Palestinian people for its sacred, inalienable national rights, including the right to self-determination and the right to return to its homeland and to establish a sovereign, independent State of Palestine. The proposal put forth recently by the Soviet Union on convening an international conference on the Middle East, with the participation of all parties concerned, including the PLO, is a reasonable and practical proposal aimed at finding a proper solution to the Middle East and Palestine question."

102. Mr. KIRCA (Turkey): Another year has elapsed since the Assembly last debated the question of Palestine without as yet any significant change in the situation for the better.

103. Another year has elapsed with Israel persisting in its policies of occupation, annexation and the systematic establishment of new illegal settlements.

104. Another year has elapsed with Israel tightening its oppressive grip over the civilian Arab population of the occupied territories, in disregard of the relevant international conventions.

105. Another year has elapsed, only to remind us that the question of Palestine has been and still remains unquestionably the most striking and costly failure of the United Nations since its inception.

106. My delegation, in speaking this year, too, does not simply wish to reiterate the firm support of the Turkish nation and Government for the legitimate aspirations of the Palestinian Arab people, who for decades have been looking to the United Nations for the elimination of the unwarranted barriers preventing them from exercising their inalienable rights, including their right to self-determination and to establish their own independent State. We wish to underline once again that more than enough time has been consumed and sufficient suffering has been endured in the Middle East, particularly by the Palestinian Arab people, for the parties directly or closely involved in this dispute to think about respecting each other's existence and legitimate rights—an unavoidable prerequisite in order to achieve a realistic, comprehensive and viable peace in this important region of the world.

107. The Turkish people and Government, which admire the determination of the Palestinian Arab people to maintain their national rights and identity against all odds, are convinced that there is no sensible alternative for the people and Governments of the Middle East. To choose confrontation to the end and to further bear the manifold political, material and moral burden inevitably resulting from the ongoing state of affairs would not benefit any party, including Israel, in the long run. As a neighbouring country of the region, we strongly believe that this state of affairs can be changed for the better if only realism, political courage and mutual respect prevail over mutual distrust, fanaticism and short-sighted considerations.

108. In this connection, we are of the opinion that it is incumbent upon the Israeli Government, first and foremost, to reassess the situation in its proper historical and political perspective, with a forward-looking approach, and to heed the repeated and unequivocal calls from the United Nations for Israel to withdraw to and live in peace and security within its pre-June-1967 borders.

109. We believe that Israel owes a forthcoming attitude both to this world body, to which it owes its original existence, and to the future generations that will cohabit the Middle East. We are not prepared to admit that any Government on earth can think itself empowered to condemn, if it so chooses, its society and, moreover, neighbouring societies, to inhaling fear and exhaling hatred indefinitely. We are not prepared to admit that any Government can have enough reasons to throw its weight behind the continued exacerbation of explosive tensions when peace is certainly not beyond its reach.

110. It is with this understanding that we call on Israel to quit its intransigent stand and consider, with vision instead of prejudice, the opportunities that an international peace conference on the Middle East, as foreseen by the Geneva Declaration on Palestine,[2] adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983, and called for in General Assembly resolution 38/58 C, can indeed offer to Israel, on the one hand, and to Arab States and the PLO, on the other.

111. It is in the same frame of mind that we would like to add our voice to the voices of those delegations that have urged the other parties concerned which have not yet expressed their readiness to participate in the peace-making process, as outlined in the Geneva Declaration on Palestine and resolution 38/58 C, to reconsider their respective positions and give new and favourable thought to the holding of the international peace conference on the Middle East.

112. The core of this problem is the question of Palestine, which, particularly during the last 17 years, has been rendered even more acute and complex, both politically and socially.

113. The Turkish Government is of the opinion that any flexible attitude by one of the parties directly involved must be reciprocated by the other parties concerned, including, of course, the PLO, which is the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. The beginning of such a trend not only would be conducive to putting an end to the ordeal of the Palestinian people and pave the way for a comprehensive Middle East peace, but also would be an achievement with which the United Nations could crown its 40 years of existence.

114. We would like to add that other initiatives susceptible to bringing a just and honourable peace to the Middle East would also enjoy Turkey's firm support and encouragement, provided that they encompassed the basic principles enunciated repeatedly in the United Nations resolutions pertaining to the question of Palestine. We should like to recall in this regard the Arab peace plan adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference.[3] We have been following with interest the recent political activity in the region. In this context, we are of the opinion that the proceedings of the meeting held at Amman and the ensuing decisions taken by the PLO constitute positive steps in the Middle East scene. The problem has acquired such dimensions over the years and the plight of the Palestinian Arab people is so tremendously embarrassing for humanity as a whole that, in our view, particularly, those who prefer not to offer new ideas at this stage should at least consider, without prejudice, the merits that initiatives taken by others may well have. The fact should not be lost sight of, also, that time, which some may be construing to be on their side, may prove not to be a reliable ally. As we stated on 27 November [74th meeting], in the debate on the situation in the Middle East, we believe the time is now ripe to give a fresh impetus to the search for a lasting peace in the Middle East.

115. Mr. BENJELLOUN (Morocco) (interpretation from Arabic): The question of Palestine has been the focus of interest of the General Assembly since the United Nations was created. The unhappy reality is that the Organization is responsible for the present situation obtaining in Palestine, an unparalleled responsibility in the history of all contemporary issues. Despite the serious error that was committed by the General Assembly in 1947 against the rights of the Palestinian people and its rights to its own territories and property and to sovereignty over its own land with its wealth and resources, we appreciate the efforts that have been made by the United Nations recently to correct the errors of the past and to restore those rights to the Palestinian people.

116. The great interest shown by the international community in the question of Palestine is ample proof of its full awareness of the injustice of which the Palestinian people are victim and of the necessity of supporting the restoration of its rights and its determination to struggle to recover them fully. The opposition of the international community to Israel's aggressive policy, which is based on brute force, displacement of populations and denial of the most elementary rights to the peoples who have lived in this region for thousands of years, is a sign of a positive change that has taken place in the attitude of the international community towards the question of Palestine.

117. The question of Palestine, which is the very heart of the Middle East tragedy, is a matter of justice and of the denial of justice and right; it is a problem of a people which has been expelled from its lands, driven into exile by brute force, and even in its exile subjected to attempts to annihilate it physically and politically. The massacres of Palestinians at Sabra and Shatila, in Lebanon, are striking proof of this. For about 40 years this people has known trial after trial; it still waits for the international community to assist it in correcting the errors of the past, permitting the recovery of its usurped rights and creating conditions which would make possible a return to its homeland and the establishment of its own independent State.

118. We are gratified to note that the General Assembly has once again embarked upon the path of justice and law. In 1974 it adopted its historic resolution 3236 (XXIX), in which it reaffirmed the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination, and its undeniable right to independence, to sovereignty and to form its own independent State in its own territory. At successive sessions of the Assembly, those inalienable rights were further confirmed, and recognition was also given to the right of the Palestinian people to be considered a principal party in any efforts aimed at establishing a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

119. The Security Council, which is responsible for maintaining international peace and security, has also assumed its role by condemning Israeli practices in Palestine in all their aspects, particularly the policy of creating settlements, which is aimed at altering the demographic composition of occupied Palestine. The Security Council has also frequently requested that the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people be restored and that their lands be recovered.

120. Despite this widespread international support for the Palestinian people, Israel continues to scorn the resolutions of the United Nations and to persist in its policy of occupation, annexation, terror, collective punishment, removal of elected officials, profanation of holy places, burning of harvests and destruction of houses: all these are practices which have been condemned by international law. This is the challenge which Israel has thrown down to the international community, capped by its annexation of the Holy City of Jerusalem, the cradle of revealed religions, which it has declared to be its capital in perpetuity. This challenge was to be seen clearly in the measures adopted to Judaize this holy city and to modify its historic and cultural sites in order to obliterate all traces of the past attesting to the Arab nature of the region and the fact that it belongs organically to the Arab communities who have always lived there and who have embraced both Islam and Christianity.

121. It is strange to see the leaders of the Zionist entity continuing to seek to justify their policies of annexation, expansion and terror against the indigenous population by obsolete historical arguments. We still hear them speak of the need to set up a greater Israel and the third kingdom of David, as if time had stopped 4,000 years ago. While Israel puts forward its historic rights to justify what it calls the right of Jews to return to Palestine, it arrogantly denies those same rights to the Palestinians who were driven from their land and their homes only a few years ago.

122. In order to entrench this tragic situation, Israel persists in its policy of threats and terror and is stockpiling destructive weapons in the region of the Middle East, thus threatening the security of the region and international peace and security. This policy could also cause a fifth war, the consequences of which would not be confined to the Middle East.

123. We can deal with this dangerous situation only on the basis of international law, equity and justice and by restoring the rights of the Palestinian people, in accordance with the many relevant resolutions adopted by the United Nations over the years.

124. The International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held last year at Geneva under the auspices of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, gave a further opportunity for the international community to call anew for the speedy implementation of the relevant resolutions adopted by various international bodies. In this context, we would request the United Nations, whose responsibility it is to protect international law, and all States that are concerned for peace and security in the region, to shoulder their responsibility and work to ensure respect for the resolutions, in particular the provisions calling for the restoration of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people.

125. The Palestinian people, whose historic past has shed a cultural and religious light, is an authentic people which will never give up its inalienable rights. The aspirations of the Palestinian people to freedom and its determination to throw off the Zionist yoke and fully to recover its rights are legitimate aspirations recognized by international bodies and by the international community. The PLO is the defender of these aspirations, because it is the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. It is entrusted with the fulfilment of the hopes of the Palestinian people and of its political will. That is why that organization is the main and only negotiating partner in all questions relating to the Palestinian people in general.

126. The Kingdom of Morocco had the honour of hosting, at Fez, the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference, which adopted unanimously, on 9 September 1982, an Arab peace plan—better known as the Fez plan[3]—to settle the question of Palestine and the Middle East. Also, at the beginning of this year my country welcomed at Casablanca the Fourth Islamic Summit Conference. King Hassan II, who is Chairman of the Al-Quds Committee of the Organization of the Islamic Conference, has asked me to take this opportunity to reaffirm his total and unconditional support for the just, legitimate and heroic struggle of the Palestinian people, under the leadership of its sole authentic representative, the PLO, to recover its inalienable rights, return to its homeland and establish an independent State in the land of Palestine.

127. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the Observer of the League of Arab States, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 477 (V).

128. Mr. EL-FARRA (Observer, League of Arab States) (interpretation from Arabic): Another year has elapsed and the question of Palestine is still included on the agenda of the General Assembly. Another year has elapsed and the renewed debates and continued stumbling efforts to settle this question serve only as striking proof of the inability of the international community to establish a just peace in our world and enable this people struggling for freedom and dignity to regain its right of self-determination. Another year has elapsed and the question of Palestine remains without a solution, even though it is the core of the conflict in the Middle East. The dimensions of that situation have spread and branched out to threaten the peace and security of the peoples not only of the region but of the whole world.

129. I will not recapitulate here the events relating to the question of Palestine that have occurred during the past year. I will refer only to the principal realities that those events revealed, for in this way we may be able to shed light on the necessity and importance of convening an international peace conference and thereby show that any delay in convening such a conference will impede the achievement of peace and security in a region which is one of the most volatile in the world, and the recovery by its people of their inalienable rights, of which they have been deprived.

130. The first reality is that Israel does not in any way want a peace based on international legitimacy. Israel has rejected all initiatives aimed at the establishment of a just, lasting and comprehensive peace in our region. It has become clear that this rejection is connected with the substance of these initiatives, not with their form. By rejecting the principles which this international body has established, basically, the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force and of rewarding the aggressor for its aggression, Israel denies the right of self-determination of the Palestinian people, the owner of the land.

131. Israel has taken measures, which have been denounced as illegal, to annex Jerusalem and proclaim it the "eternal capital" of Israel and to annex the Syrian Golan Heights. The General Assembly is thus clearly aware of Israeli efforts to prepare the necessary conditions for annexing what remains of the occupied territory in perpetuation of the occupation and the imposition of a fait accompli.

132. One of the clearest manifestations of those practices, which constitute the real reason for Israel's opposition to all peace initiatives and make it oppose them so fiercely and work against their implementation, is the expulsion of the inhabitants and the confiscation of their lands to achieve the objectives of zionism.

133. The occupied Arab territories have been and remain the scene of continuous oppression of the Palestinian people through the proliferation of terrorist organizations established by the Israeli settlers, with the protection and support of the Israeli occupying authorities, in order to create a material and psychological situation that compels the Palestinian citizens to leave their lands. Those terrorist organizations conducted acts that are considered to be, in scope and severity, proof of a new campaign similar to the one that accompanied the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948. Israeli laws have been applied to the Israeli settlers in the occupied Arab territories and this has created a state of duality between the legal situation of the natives and that of the settlers.

134. Moreover, the colonial settlement movement has intensified in the Arab lands that have been confiscated. Through coercive Zionist practices, the Israeli occupation authorities are seeking to Judaize Palestinian territory, destroy its Arab heritage, expel its inhabitants and distort its history.

135. The confiscation of water resources in the occupied territories constitutes one of the most dangerous manifestations of these practices and one of the main reasons for the intensification of tension in the region. Israel's continued effort to monopolize the water resources with the aim of exploiting them in the service of its colonial settlements has always been an incentive for its aggression and expansion.

136. In this respect, the Israeli terrorists who massacre peaceful civilians, including women and children, are an army whose task is to commit terrorist acts not only on the land of Palestine but throughout the Arab lands. The injustice suffered by the Palestinian people with respect to their right to return and to independence, the daily practices against them in their towns and villages or in their camps, and the air, sea and land raids which are being carried out in the region and by means of which Israel threatens all Arab countries—all are taking place because there is a bridge connecting Israel to the United States and supplying the necessary financing to protect its conquests and underwrite its military operations, as well as the arms needed to launch its attacks and create destabilization and trouble in the region.

137. Such practices and injustices could come to an end if the United States used its financial leverage to put pressure on Israel to stop practising terrorism and to participate in the structuring of a just peace in the region.

138. I wish to point out that the United States bears direct responsibility for the failure of efforts towards a just peace in our region because of Israel's rejection of all the peace initiatives and its obstinacy in its contempt for the international will. The United States, through its special relations with Israel, which it has developed extensively in the past few years, has chosen complete alignment with Israel. The most conspicuous development has been the agreement on economic assistance to Israel and on strengthening American-Israeli co-operation and co-ordination in the military and strategic fields, not to mention the unlimited political support enjoyed by Israel in its acts of aggression against the Palestinian people and the Arab States.

139. The Charter of the United Nations has given the United States, as a great Power, special responsibilities for the maintenance of international peace and security; yet, as a permanent member of the Security Council, the United States is preventing the United Nations from playing its role in achieving peace. In his report, the Secretary-General draws attention to the letter from the representative of the United States to the President of the Security Council, dated 13 January 1984, in reply to his invitation to the United States to participate in an international peace conference on the Middle East. The reply was as follows: "The United States considers the recommendation of a Middle East Peace Conference in General Assembly resolution 38/58 C to be ill-considered and harmful." [A/39/130, annex III, appendix.]

140. The total American alignment with Israel, an occupying, expansionist and terrorist force, has curtailed the capacity of the United States to participate, as a mediator, in the achievement of a just settlement in the Middle East and further diminishes the chances for peace in the region. Real peace, with all its elements of justice, permanence and comprehensiveness, will not be achieved with this imbalance. We ask the United States—which gave the world Presidents such as Washington, Lincoln, Jefferson and Eisenhower, who, through their struggle, exemplified the values of freedom and equality—as a great Power with special interests that it needs to defend, to take big and courageous steps to correct the imbalance in its current relations with the parties to the conflict in the region. This is the only way for it to regain the credibility and effectiveness that would enable it to fulfil its role; and it is the only way to increase the opportunities for success of the efforts exerted towards settling the conflict that has been going on in our region for several decades, and to remove the current elements of instability and complexities in the region.

141. I wish also to point out that the Arab countries, with the Palestinians in the forefront, have proved beyond doubt that they are calling for peace. They have done this through the many initiatives they have proposed or accepted. The Arab countries, including the Palestinian people with the PLO as their sole legitimate representative, unanimously specified in the decisions adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference,[3] their concept of the peace process, based on international legitimacy and in harmony with the international will as reflected in United Nations resolutions. Those resolutions have taken into account the realities of the situation in the region and have included the principles that constitute an objective starting-point for the establishment of a just, lasting and comprehensive peace in the region, such as the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination and to the establishment of a sovereign State in their homeland.

142. The Arab countries and the PLO have declared their acceptance of the Geneva Declaration on Palestine, adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983,[2] and have said that they are ready to participate in the international peace conference which the General Assembly has recommended to settle the situation in the Middle East. Mr. Yasser Arafat, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the PLO, in his speech at the opening meeting of the latest session of the Palestine National Council, stated that: "The PLO supports the idea of holding an international peace conference on the Middle East attended by all parties concerned, on the basis of United Nations resolutions and the resolutions of the Arab Summit Conference at Fez."

143. This belief in the need to establish peace in the region is not surrender. The Arab countries and the Palestinian people would never give up their freedom or dignity or their conviction of the need for peace itself and for achieving the rights that the international community has acknowledged to be legitimate.

144. Despite all the efforts exerted by zionism prior to or after the establishment of the State of Israel to destroy the Palestinians' national identity, to erase their feeling of belonging to the Arab homeland and nation and to deny them their rights, the Israelis have not destroyed the will and hopes of the Palestinians for a life in freedom and dignity, nor their capacity for resistance and struggle, which they continue to demonstrate in order to preserve their identity and their right to self-determination. In the occupied Arab territories there is daily testimony to their sacrifices.

145. The Palestinian resistance in the occupied Palestinian territories and the Lebanese struggle in southern Lebanon are living proof of the fact that the forces of resistance will never accept a fait accompli or any other situation that is not in keeping with a just, lasting and comprehensive peace; nor will they lose faith in the inevitability of the attainment of such peace through their struggle and refusal to surrender. This is the lesson we have learned from the experience of all peoples that have struggled for their sacred rights and which today constitute the overwhelming majority of Members of the United Nations.

146. Finally, any peaceful settlement of the conflict in the region requires that we take into consideration the following elements in achieving a just, lasting and comprehensive peace. These elements are the outcome of a long struggle and various peace initiatives based on international legitimacy and the relevant United Nations resolutions.

147. First, peace cannot be achieved through expansion. He who seeks peace must abandon a policy of occupation, colonization, aggression and expansion. This means that any peace that does not encompass withdrawal from all the occupied lands, including Jerusalem and the Golan Heights, would be unsuccessful.

148. Secondly, security cannot be achieved through expansion, for expansion, aggression and the denial of the rights of other peoples are the basic source of the threat to peace and the increase of conflict. The security of one party can never be achieved at the expense of the other, nor can security be achieved through aggressive terrorist practices and through depriving the Palestinian people of their legitimate rights.

149. Thirdly, the rights of the Palestinian people in their homeland and country are sacred and inalienable. First among these is the right to self-determination and the right to establish their own independent State in Palestine. Attempts to deny those rights have always been the major reason for all the tensions, conflicts and disputes that have characterized the region for many years.

150. Fourthly, the people of Palestine have their own organization, the PLO, their sole legitimate representative, which is the expression of their free will and to which and to the leadership of which they remain loyal. The PLO, despite all the acts of aggression and the challenges aimed at it and the attempts to paralyse it, is still capable of absorbing all those challenges and attacks because of the clarity of its strategy and the democratic system which governs relations among the various forces and political trends represented within it. The challenges facing the PLO have only strengthened its determination and its cohesiveness, its insistence on its objectives and its struggle to achieve them. The Palestine National Council, at its recent session, provided the best evidence of the way it has been working towards these goals.

151. A revolution which functions openly and is capable of holding meetings of its national council in the presence of television cameras, journalists and foreign delegations, and which is willing to discuss its problems frankly before its people and only a few kilometres away from its enemies—such a revolution has proved its ability fully to shoulder its responsibilities.

152. Lastly, it is essential that an international conference on peace in the Middle East be convened as soon as possible. The PLO, as the sole legitimate representative chosen by the Palestinian people, must participate on an equal footing with all other parties in that conference and in any settlement of the situation in the region that is aimed at achieving a just, lasting and comprehensive peace.

153. These facts, summaries and results are very clear to any observer of the situation in our region today. They require us to pool our efforts and take firm stands in support of international legitimacy, in an effort to maintain the credibility of the United Nations and avoid any additional suffering and disasters in our region that has suffered for so long.

154. In conclusion, I wish to recall something Mahatma Gandhi once said:

> "There were once many tyrants, oppressors and killers who for long appeared to be so powerful that they could never be defeated. But in the end they fell. Let us always remember this: throughout history, honesty and love have always triumphed."

Yes, that was the doctrine of Mahatma Gandhi, which summed up the experiences of man throughout his long history. That today is also the Palestinians' concept of their cause, their hopes, their rights and their future.

The meeting rose at 1.20 p.m.

United Nations

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

THIRTY-NINTH SESSION

91st PLENARY MEETING

Friday, 7 December 1984, at 3.10 p.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

AGENDA ITEM 33

Question of Palestine (continued):

(a) Report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People;

(b) Report of the Secretary-General

1. The PRESIDENT: Four draft resolutions have been submitted under this item [A/39/L.37 to L.40].

2. Mr. NDONGO (Congo) (interpretation from French): Since the United Nations adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, many countries and peoples, one after another, have achieved freedom and dignity.

3. The same does not hold true for the Palestinian people, which still today does not enjoy its inalienable rights. Indeed, without consultation with the Palestinians and in contradiction of Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, according to which "The wishes of [the] communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the Mandatory", Palestine was put under a British Mandate. Moreover, five years before that Mandate, Great Britain had committed itself to promoting the establishment of a "national Jewish homeland" in Palestine, a country with which the Zionist leaders claimed a "historic tie".

4. After the revelation of the Sykes-Picot agreement by the Soviet Union and the contradictory statements made by the British Government, including the Balfour Declaration, the Palestinian Arabs energetically opposed the Mandate. At the end of the Second World War, acts of violence were carried out by the Jewish community.

5. Alleging that the Mandate imposed contradictory obligations on it, Great Britain, after 25 years of administration in Palestine, put the issue before the United Nations—which had just been created—proposing the division of Palestine into two independent States: one a Palestinian Arab State and the other a Jewish State, the City of Jerusalem being internationalized. Peace was not restored and Palestine continued to be in a state of upheaval. Thus a war broke out in the Middle East which was halted only through United Nations intervention. One of the two States envisaged in the partition plan, having proclaimed its independence under the name of Israel, during a series of wars proceeded to expand its control over all of Palestine.

6. The Arab State of Palestine never saw the light of day, and since that time the Palestinian people has never ceased struggling to regain its lost rights. Successive wars and acts of destruction, in particular since 1948, have forced millions of Palestinians to embark upon the road of exile and the United Nations to seek a solution to the Palestinian problem, which constitutes "a grave danger for international peace and security".

7. Abused by the expansionist and Zionist régime of Israel, wandering from country to country and shunted off into refugee camps—such is the sad plight of the Palestinian people.

8. But that did not suffice. For mendacious reasons of security, in 1967 the Israeli Zionist régime decided to annex some areas of neighbouring Arab countries in Egypt, Syria, Lebanon and Jordan.

9. Nor was the Holy City of Jerusalem spared; the occupying force has declared it the capital of Israel. As we are all aware, the problem of Palestine lies at the heart of the tragedy of the Middle East.

10. The difficulty of finding a just, equitable and satisfactory solution to the problem of Palestine is compounded by the fact that, in defiance of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949,[1] and the Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907 respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land,[2] and despite numerous resolutions of the General Assembly, the Commission on Human Rights, the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council, Israel is pursuing with impunity its policy of collective and individual retaliation, criminal acts, intimidation, arbitrary arrest and imprisonment without right to counsel.

11. In proceeding to expel populations from various regions, the occupying force is trying to destroy the demographic and geographic unity of the Palestinians, thus trampling underfoot General Assembly resolutions 194 (III) and 513 (VI). There is no need to recall here that, despite its arrogance and unjustified stubbornness, Israel has an obligation to respect the rules of the international community and in particular the Charter of the United Nations. It is obliged to do so for it has itself suffered and it owes its very existence to a General Assembly resolution. Hence it is hardly fitting that it should force the Arab people to suffer those very atrocities to which its own people fell victim.

12. As some can see, this Zionist policy is based on the theory of a régime which intends to pursue the application of colonialism through settlements and a frenzied expansionism which believes that the use of terror is the best means for achieving its sordid plans.

13. It is perfectly clear that no progress can be made until Israel ends its policy of annexation and occupation of Arab and Palestinian territories and its habitual behaviour of violating the rights of the population of those territories.

14. The problem of the Palestinian refugees flows from the Israeli occupation of Arab territories. At present we see the emergence of the fourth generation of Palestinian refugees of the diaspora. The Israeli authorities, not satisfied with pursuing their policy of uprooting populations, have added to this saga of persecution acts of aggression and raids against refugee camps and even massacres such as those of Sabra and Shatila.

15. In each case those acts of oppression are alleged to be the result of the struggle—the legitimate and permanent struggle—waged by the Palestinian people. Is it not a law of nature that any occupation by force, any invasion, brings in its wake resistance to it? Thus the Congolese delegation can only encourage and support those peace-loving people in their will to reconquer their lands.

16. For this reason we pay tribute to the Palestine Liberation Organization [PLO], the sole authentic representative of the Palestinian people, for the heroic struggle it is waging, despite the difficulties it has always encountered on the road towards its final objective—the liberation of its people. The Congo condemns any attempt to divide and weaken that organization through fratricidal struggles. More than ever, the Palestinian people places its hopes in a PLO which is ever strengthened by its cohesion, unity and commitment.

17. The Congolese delegation supports the idea put forward by the United Nations of convening an international conference on the Middle East, at which all parties in conflict would be represented, including the PLO, and in which the two great Powers would take an active part.

18. The time is more than ever ripe for the international community to deal resolutely with the implementation of General Assembly resolution 194 (III), which guarantees the return of the Palestinian refugees to their country, for those who have been forced to leave occupied Palestine have only one desire: to return to their native land and to live in peace, dignity and respect for their national identity.

19. My delegation would like to repeat here the terms of the Final Communiqué adopted by the Meeting of Ministers and Heads of Delegation of the Non-Aligned Countries to the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly, held in New York from 1 to 5 October 1984. In that communiqué, the Ministers

> "condemned any agreement or treaty which violates or infringes the rights of the Arab nation and the Palestinian people as recognized by the Non-Aligned Movement, and in accordance with international law, the United Nations Charter and its relevant resolutions and which prevents the liberation of Jerusalem and the occupied Arab and Palestinian territories and the full exercise of, and attainment by the Palestinian people of its inalienable rights." [See A/39/560, para. 50.]

Finally, the Ministers "recalled that the summit conferences had called upon the Security Council to recognize the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people and facilitate their achievement" [ibid., para. 52].

20. As long as the occupation of Arab territories continues and as long as the Palestinian people is unable to enjoy its inalienable rights—its right to self-determination, its right to return and its right to the establishment of a sovereign State—my delegation will have no choice other than to denounce and condemn the atrocities perpetrated against that peace-loving people.

21. Mr. MBYE (Gambia): The central factor in the complex question of Palestine concerns the fundamental principle of self-determination and human rights. Stated simply, it concerns the rights of the people of a given territory—Palestine—to decide for themselves their own political destiny. It is to my delegation a source of pain that the Zionist State of Israel and its backers continue to behave as if the people of Palestine were not deserving of enjoyment of the same rights as others and at times to pretend to make a specific exception of them.

22. Thirty-seven years after the adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 181 (II), which provided, inter alia, for the creation of a Palestinian State, the people of Palestine still remain without a State. They have instead been collectively reduced to the status of refugees, a whole generation of whom have grown up in camps, dispersed in various States of the Middle East.

23. The land of Palestine is a geographical and historical fact that is not easily erased. Good parts of it are to be found in the West Bank and Gaza, which Israel has occupied illegally since 1967. It is in those territories that the most poignant chapters of the Palestinian tragedy are being enacted. There Israel has embarked on a process of progressive absorption, aimed at nothing less than the ultimate annexation of those territories. To that end, the most ruthless methods of coercion have been employed to scuttle Arab businesses and to expropriate lands owned and farmed by Palestinians for generations. On top of such totally unwholesome activities, Israel has cynically and deliberately set about the task of transforming the demographic composition of the illegally occupied territories.

24. Gambia condemns the odious settlement policy being pursued by Israel, a system that is literally designed to inundate the area with colonial settlers. We cannot but be struck by the similarities between its policy and that adopted by another pariah régime to the vexatious issue of population statistics. I refer, of course, to the diabolical racist régime in South Africa and its heinous policy of bantustanization.

25. The ominous trend of events in the West Bank over the past year has clearly highlighted the gravity of the circumstances in which the sons and daughters of Palestine are compelled to exist. These events are epitomized by the series of terrorist outrages perpetrated against a variety of Arab individuals and institutions. In the past, the Israeli authorities have tried to dismiss such atrocities as the random work of mentally unstable persons. However, the planned grenade attack upon the Dome of the Rock Mosque in January and the narrowly averted bomb attack on Arab buses in Jerusalem last April have demonstrated beyond doubt the existence of an underground Jewish terror network rejoicing in the sinister acronym TNT ("Terror Against Terror"). It is moreover evident that this terrorist network enjoys close ties with extremist settler groups. My delegation therefore views with the gravest misgivings the election to the Knesset of Rabbi Kahane, whose racist "Kach" group has openly advocated the mass expulsion of all Palestinian Arabs from the occupied territories.

26. It will, of course, be recalled that Jewish settlers, in their relations with the Arab population of the occupied territories, have always been encouraged to take the law into their own hands. This has conveniently tied in with official attempts to eradicate any and all manifestations of Palestinian nationalism on the part of the Arab population. Thus, the perpetrators of the 1980 car-bomb attacks on the three West Bank mayors have yet to be identified. Similarly, even where Jewish settlers have been apprehended in flagrante delicto, they have tended to receive only the mildest punishment. The wave of bombings and other terrorist outrages which we have witnessed in the recent past is, then, attributable to the passive indulgence that Israel has maintained towards crimes committed by settlers. This indulgence, incidentally, was acknowledged in the Karp report, issued earlier this year.

27. Not even this ordeal of terror, however, has succeeded in quenching the ardent yearning of the Palestinian people for its birthright. Instead, it remains committed to the cherished ideal of an independent Palestinian State. In this regard, my delegation wishes to pay a tribute to the PLO and to congratulate it on the recent successful meeting at Amman of the Palestine National Council. Our heartfelt congratulations go also to Chairman Yasser Arafat for graciously accepting the verdict of the Palestinian people that he should continue to be at the head of the courageous struggle for their inalienable right to self-determination and independence.

28. My Government fully supports the praiseworthy efforts being exerted by the Secretary-General in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 38/58 C on the convening of a Middle East conference, under the auspices of the United Nations and with the participation of all parties directly involved in the conflict, including, of course, the PLO, which must be involved at all stages as an equal partner.

29. On the fundamental question of Palestine, we must reiterate that only the PLO, the sole representative of the Palestinian people, can negotiate for that people. If a durable peace is to be achieved in the Middle East, there must be an independent Palestinian State, through the restitution of the Palestinians' ancestral lands, usurped by Israel.

30. I cannot conclude without paying a tribute to the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and his colleagues for the valuable contribution they continue to make to the drive to secure a just settlement of the Palestine question.

31. Mr. ALATAS (Indonesia): This year marks a decade since the General Assembly adopted resolution 3236 (XXIX), appropriately elevating the cause of the Palestinian people for self-determination and independent statehood to an issue of major concern to the international community in its own right. In a concomitant decision [resolution 3237 (XXIX)], the Assembly accorded recognition to the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, by granting it observer status at the United Nations. The establishment of the Committee on the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People the following year completed the process of bringing the question of Palestine into full focus. As a result of those historic decisions, the question of the national rights of the Palestinian people was removed from the rubric of humanitarian concerns, under which it had been subsumed, and was recognized as the very core of the Middle East conflict.

32. Through the ensuing years and in consecutive sessions, the United Nations has considered this issue in that proper perspective. The convening at Geneva, from 29 August to 7 September 1983, of the International Conference on the Question of Palestine was yet another high point in the reflection of this fundamental reorientation. The Conference, attended by the vast majority of Member States, once again showed international solidarity to be firmly on the side of the struggle of the Palestinian people for national independence, for peace and for human dignity. The Geneva Declaration on Palestine and the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights, adopted at the Conference,[3] set in motion a broad and far-reaching initiative to convene an international peace conference on the Middle East. Subsequently, at its thirty-eighth session, the General Assembly adopted resolution 38/58 C, endorsing the proposed peace conference and thereby bringing the universal authority of the United Nations to bear on establishing a rational framework towards a solution.

33. Despite the overwhelming concurrence of Member States, and of the PLO itself, with this approach, the diligent efforts of the Secretary-General to make progress towards convening the peace conference have run up against what has always been an insurmountable obstacle to a negotiated settlement—namely, Israel's obstinate refusal to respond positively to any proposal for peace. We have noted with sincere regret that the United States has also responded negatively to this proposal, and we should like to join others in appealing for a reconsideration of its position, for it has been clear all along that the active participation and support of both super-Powers is essential if this process is to have any chance of success.

34. At every instance when the United Nations has sought to embark on a fresh initiative to establish a structure for comprehensive negotiations, Israel has consistently frustrated those efforts by persisting in its policies of terror and oppression of the Palestinian Arabs in the occupied territories and of aggressive expansionism against its neighbours. Time and again, Israel has consciously chosen belligerency over diplomacy and stubborn reliance on policies of force over efforts for peace.

35. The Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, in its report [A/39/35], has graphically detailed these Israeli policies and practices of blatant aggression and repression, as well as Israel's systematic attempts to destroy the PLO politically and physically, in the vain hope of extinguishing the fire of Palestinian nationalism and obliterating Palestinian national identity.

36. Without going into further detail, my delegation would only wish to highlight the fact that in the occupied territories Israel has stepped up its illegal settlements policy, which by its own admission is aimed at achieving 100,000 Israeli settlers by 1987 and a projected figure of 190,000 by the year 2010. In pursuit of this objective, the Tel Aviv régime has intensified its ruthless measures to render life unbearable for the Palestinian Arabs, with the sole intention of eventually forcing them out of their ancestral homeland. More recently, the Palestinians in the occupied territories have been subjected to attacks by gangs of armed Israeli settlers who enjoy the tacit encouragement, and even the connivance, of the occupation régime. Israel's appalling record of brutality against the indigenous Palestinians is clearly directed towards nothing less than the permanent denial of their national rights, thus exposing also its goal of ultimately annexing the occupied territories.

Mr. Adjoyi (Togo), Vice-President, took the Chair.

37. Israel's contemptuous rejection of all peace initiatives is further reflected in its unceasing hostility towards the United Nations itself, which, ironically, is the very Organization that gave birth to that State. In fact, Israel has gone so far as to blame the United Nations, accusing it of fanning the flames of the conflict by adopting "unbalanced resolutions". However, the incontestable truth is that the United Nations response to Israel's aggression and its violations of the human and national rights of the Palestinians can in no way be considered biased, as all relevant United Nations resolutions scrupulously and consistently defend international norms and principles.

38. Therefore, the reason why today Israel is regarded as a renegade State is to be found in its own actions and policies, not in any decisions taken by the United Nations. It is isolated because its attitudes and policies are anathema to the eyes of the world community, for it has rejected virtually every cardinal principle enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations.

39. Israel has sought to portray its aggressive and annexationist policies as somehow conforming to the dictates of national security and self-defence. The death and destruction wrought upon the Palestinian and Arab peoples throughout the long and savage years of Israeli aggression, oppression and foreign occupation, however, have opened the eyes of most of Israel's ardent supporters to the utter falsity of that claim.

40. In contrast to Israel, which is in a position of isolation, the PLO today enjoys the recognition and support of the international community, which has closed ranks with it in the efforts to ensure the realization of the Palestinian people's inalienable right to a sovereign State of its own. The PLO has earned this respect and admiration because few other national liberation movements have so heroically withstood for so many years the merciless onslaught of their enemy. Moreover, its strength and viability were reaffirmed most recently by the successful outcome of the Palestine National Council meeting held last month at Amman. Thus, it is beyond question that the PLO has a legitimate and indispensable role to play as an equal party in all efforts and any negotiations leading to an enduring peace in the Middle East.

41. My delegation has consistently supported the call for a peace conference, as was reflected most recently in our statement on the situation in the Middle East [75th meeting], when we affirmed our full backing for the Secretary-General's continuing efforts to bring about the convening of the conference. We agree with him that the United Nations is duty-bound to persevere in trying to devise, within the overall context of the international peace conference, a negotiating process or structure acceptable to all concerned.

42. Indonesia is convinced that at the present stage the peace conference proposal offers the only promising avenue to a comprehensive, just and lasting peace: comprehensive in the sense of simultaneously resolving all the interrelated aspects of the Middle East conflict, with the question of Palestine and unconditional Israeli withdrawal from Arab lands as its essential elements; just, by ensuring respect for the rights and security requirements of all parties to the conflict, in accordance with the tenets of international law, morality and human dignity; and lasting, by eliminating the major elements of tension in the region by removing their root causes.

43. Mr. TSVETKOV (Bulgaria) (interpretation from French): For 40 years, the Middle East has been one of the most dangerous hotbeds of international tension, and the situation has not improved in recent years. On the contrary, it has deteriorated further owing to the increasingly aggressive nature of Israeli policy and brutal imperialist interference in the internal affairs of States of the region.

44. It is generally considered that the question of Palestine always has been and continues to be at the core of the Middle East problem.

45. We deeply regret that yet another year has been added to the 37 years of the tragic history of the Palestinian people without any real progress having been made in efforts to settle the question of Palestine. Today, the tragedy of the Palestinians is eloquent proof that the imperialist policy of expansion and aggression brings only misfortune to peoples. It is as a result of that policy that an entire people, a people with a long history and a rich culture, has been deprived of its right to a homeland and condemned to live in exile.

46. In the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied since 1967, the Israeli aggressor has consistently applied a policy of cruel terror, massive repression, national oppression and genocide. These territories have been the target of mass colonization of unprecedented magnitude. New military settlements are constantly created, and existing ones are expanded and consolidated.

47. Those in the Tel Aviv ruling circles not only do not hide their aggressive intentions regarding the occupied territories, but declare them as openly as possible. To illustrate their plans in this regard, suffice it to cite the study on Israel's policy in the West Bank, prepared by a commission presided over by a former mayor of Jerusalem and published in The New York Times of 25 April 1984, which concluded that the annexation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip was only a matter of time.

48. This policy of rampant aggression, whose guiding principle is amorality and expansion through brute force, is absolutely contrary to the principles of contemporary international law and to the relevant decisions of the United Nations. In spite of the expressed will of the international community, Tel Aviv persists in this adventurist policy, the most recent example of which is the barbaric invasion of Lebanon.

49. The memory of the monstrous crime perpetrated against the Palestinian refugees in the Sabra and Shatila camps will live for ever in the memory of the world community. The mass extermination of the peaceful inhabitants of those two refugee camps—an example par excellence of genocide—has been equalled only by the crimes of the Hitlerite Fascists during the Second World War.

50. The results of Israel's large-scale aggression in Lebanon, now in its third year, are well known: more than 20,000 Lebanese and Palestinians dead and more than 30,000 wounded; one third of the territory of Lebanon still under Israeli control; immense material losses suffered by Lebanon. On Lebanese soil, Israeli militarism applies on a wide scale the sinister experience it gained in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights.

51. The brutality of Israel's policy and the active assistance given it by Washington have not been sufficient to enable it to attain its major objective: the destruction of the Palestinian movement of national liberation, the removal of the question of Palestine from the agenda of the United Nations and of other international forums, and the eradication of the question from the spirit and conscience of mankind.

52. The tragic events of the last few years have demonstrated more clearly than ever before that there is no force capable of stifling the aspiration of the Palestinian people to freedom and independence. Its determined struggle to achieve its inalienable national rights daily increases the sympathy and respect of the peoples of the whole world.

53. The huge international consensus on the principles and the sole means of justly resolving the question of Palestine has been expressed in numerous resolutions adopted by the General Assembly during the last 15 years. Among them is the important resolution 38/58 C, in which the Assembly endorsed the Geneva Declaration on Palestine,[3] adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva last year, and reaffirmed the proposal to convene an international peace conference on the Middle East. That consensus was also supported in the Final Declaration of the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference, adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982;[4] in the Political Declaration of the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi from 7 to 12 March 1983;[5] and in the Political Declaration of the States Parties to the Warsaw Treaty, issued at Prague on 5 January 1983.[6]

54. Against this backdrop, it is natural to wonder why the question of Palestine still remains unresolved, given the clearly expressed will of the international community.

55. It is as clear as daylight that Israel would never have been able to carry out its brazen policy in the Middle East without the unreserved and total assistance given by its "strategic ally", if the United States did not systematically use its right of veto in the Security Council to block any possibility of equitably resolving the question of Palestine and of applying effective measures against the aggressor. United States assistance to Israel within the context of that well-known "strategic alliance" is based not on moral considerations but on the objectives of military policy. The development of events in the Middle East has revealed the true nature of the separate agreements announced by their authors, with much fanfare, as a "road to peace". Immediately after the signing of the Camp David agreements, there were far more casualties than during the Israeli aggression of 1967, the situation in the region became even more explosive and the danger to international peace even more serious.

56. Thus the great majority of States Members of the United Nations, as well as the Palestine National Council, are right to declare that they are against the attempts to revive the American "plans" for a settlement of the problem of the Middle East that do not take into account the legitimate interests of all the peoples of the region.

57. Experience has shown that peace and stability in the Middle East can be assured only through collective efforts and with the participation of all the parties involved, including the PLO, not through separate agreements and dubious missions of good offices.

58. The People's Republic of Bulgaria has more than once stated that it favours a comprehensive, just and lasting solution to the conflict in the Middle East. An integral part of such a solution is the restoration of the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to establish its own state on the soil of Palestine and under the leadership of the PLO.

59. While reaffirming its full solidarity with the heroic Arab people of Palestine, the People's Republic of Bulgaria will continue to give its active support to the just struggle which that people is waging against aggression and national oppression, the final objective of which is the enjoyment of its legitimate right to live in its own independent, sovereign Palestinian State, in peace and co-operation with all peoples of the region.

60. The People's Republic of Bulgaria firmly believes in the just cause of the Palestinian people and in the triumph of that cause.

61. Mr. MOUMIN (Comoros) (interpretation from French): The Israeli-Palestinian conflict constitutes the major source of tension in the world, and the failure to settle this problem constitutes a serious threat to international peace and security, just as it frustrates the various measures that have been adopted by the United Nations to preserve peace in the world.

62. The Palestinian question emerged from the conflict between zionism and the Arab people of Palestine, but it also constitutes the axis of the Arab-Israeli conflict—in short, the key to the crisis in the Middle East.

63. The essence of this problem is the fact that, since 1948, a people driven from its land and dispersed throughout several countries has been struggling to exercise its fundamental rights and establish its own State in accordance with the right of peoples to self-determination.

64. The fate of the Palestinian people arouses feelings of profound sympathy and fraternal support from other peoples of Africa, Asia and Latin America in particular. No one today can contest the justice of the Palestinian claim; no one can deny the legality of that claim under international law.

65. The Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros, since its arrival on the international scene, has never failed to proclaim loudly and clearly the legitimate right of the Palestinian people to establish an independent and sovereign State on the Arab soil of Palestine, which has been occupied arbitrarily by Israel.

66. For very nearly 40 years, the United Nations has endeavoured, as set forth in Article 1 of the Charter:

> "To maintain international peace and security, and to that end: to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, . . . "

67. All these efforts of the United Nations to ensure that the spirit and the letter of that Article are respected unfortunately come up against the intransigence of the Zionist State. We are therefore entitled to ask how the United Nations can be the craftsman of peace if Member States do not abide by its Charter.

68. The Israeli State, warmongering and expansionist by nature, is continuing to defy the international community and flagrantly violate the various resolutions that have been adopted by the United Nations to promote friendly relations among peoples. The continuance of the illegal occupation of Arab territories of Palestine, their militarization and the barbarous massacres carried out against the Palestinian people, as well as the base acts of destabilization against the Arab people of the region, are but further obstacles that lessen the chances of success of United Nations efforts to establish peace in that part of the world.

69. My country admires the dynamism with which the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People is discharging its heavy and complex mission. My delegation would like to avail itself of this opportunity to extend its deep gratitude to the Committee and in particular to its Chairman, Mr. Massamba Sarré, for their tireless efforts on behalf of the Palestinian people. I should like to pay a tribute to this people for its courage and firm determination to regain its ancestral land that has been unjustly occupied by the force of arms.

70. Despite the various trials used to pit Palestinian against Palestinian, despite indiscriminate massacres and physical liquidation, the Palestinian people remains devoted to its national unity.

71. My country appreciates the role that is played by the PLO, the sole authentic representative of the Palestinian people, to preserve the national unity of this people that has been dispersed in various countries.

72. Last month's gathering at Amman of the Palestine National Council constitutes the best example of this unity. My country is most gratified with this success, which will be able to dash divisionist speculations.

73. The Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros is proud of the heroic struggle that is courageously being waged by the Palestinian people. That is why my delegation would like to take this opportunity to reiterate its unswerving support for their just cause.

74. We would like urgently to appeal to all the fraternal Arab countries to stand behind the PLO, the sole authentic representative of the Palestinian people. Any attempt to divide that historic movement does nothing other than redound to the benefit of the Zionist enemy.

75. Mr. KURODA (Japan): The situation in the Middle East continues to be volatile and is a source of concern to countries of the world. In particular, there is still no sign of a solution to the question of Palestine, which is the core of the Middle East problem. The bloodshed and suffering in the Middle East will continue until a just and lasting solution to the question of Palestine is found. Regrettably, efforts towards a solution have not been fruitful. Indeed, the plight of the Palestinian people has recently become even worse.

76. Since I already stated the position of the Government of Japan on the question of Palestine in the debate on the situation in the Middle East, on 27 November [75th meeting], I will not repeat it here. I wish at this time simply to say that Japan has consistently maintained that, in order to solve the question of Palestine, it is essential that Israel and the PLO recognize each other's position and that the PLO participate in the peace process.

77. We hope that, in order to realize the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, including the right of self-determination, the unity of the PLO will be restored and that it will consolidate its position as an integral party in the search for peace. In this connection, we intend to follow what course the PLO will take subsequent to the recent meeting of the Palestine National Council.

78. Moreover, Japan believes it is of utmost importance that both Israel and the Palestinian people make every effort to dispel mutual distrust and foster a will to coexist. From this point of view, too, Japan cannot condone Israel's policy of establishing settlements in the occupied territories, nor Israel's measures unilaterally to change the status of the occupied Arab territories, such as the annexation of East Jerusalem and the Golan Heights. At the same time, Japan strongly appeals to Israel, as the occupying authority, to make special efforts to protect the human rights of the Palestinian inhabitants of those territories in accordance with the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949.[1]

79. At present, the peace process is at a stalemate. The Government of Japan strongly hopes that the parties concerned will carefully consider past international efforts, such as President Reagan's initiative of 1 September 1982,[7] and the Final Declaration of the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference, adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982,[4] and, with a realistic, constructive and flexible attitude, will make serious efforts towards the achievement of genuine peace in the region.

80. There is, of course, no easy solution to the Middle East problems, but the Government of Japan reaffirms its intention to co-operate with all efforts towards the early attainment of our common goal—a just, lasting and comprehensive peace in the Middle East, achieved through a process of negotiation and without recourse to the use of force.

81. Mr. KHALIL (Egypt) (interpretation from Arabic): At the heart of the struggle between the Arabs and Israel, which enters its fourth decade in the region of the Middle East, lies the question of Palestine, that of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories, in the refugee camps, in exile or in the diaspora.

82. A sound historic approach to the question of Palestine shows that it is no longer acceptable or logical continually to scorn the right to independence and existence of the Palestinians as a people which wants respect for its legitimate rights, foremost among which is its right to self-determination.

83. The Palestinian nation, which is a distinct and strong entity, has a national consciousness around which its people rallies. It therefore wishes to be recognized and not scorned, to be taken into account and not ignored. On this basis, Egypt appreciates the importance of the session of the Palestinian National Council at Amman from 22 to 29 November 1984, which confirmed the independent nature of the Palestinian decision and the freedom of the Palestinian will. Herein, Egypt finds a conscious choice with regard to a just peace and an enhancement of the legitimacy of the Palestinian people and the victory of Palestinian rights and interests.

84. The objective, comprehensive and democratic dialogue between the Palestinian people and its legitimate leadership in the PLO, as well as its struggling contingents, reaffirms the vitality of that people, its unity of purpose and its unflagging determination to continue the struggle for the exercise of its national and legitimate right to return and to self-determination.

85. There is no perspective more significant or more profound than the comprehensive perspective based on principle from which Egypt views the unity of the Palestinian people and their continuing struggle within the framework of the unity, cohesion and solidarity of the one Arab nation.

86. This was manifested in the meeting of the Palestine National Council at Amman. It was explicit in President Mubarak's statement before the Egyptian Parliament on 2 December 1984, when he welcomed the Jordanian monarch, King Hussein, during his visit to Egypt. President Mubarak stated:

> "The events unfolding around us make it necessary for me to dot the i's and cross the t's. I listen to the one Arab voice, the voice of one Arab nation, from the Atlantic Ocean to the Gulf, calling on all Arab leaders to turn to the new page on which our future history is written. This is our historic responsibility towards the coming generations.
> "Accordingly, we greeted the Palestine National Council, which met in the capital of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. That meeting is an indication of the Arab capacity to overcome artificial barriers and of the fact that the will to unity and solidarity is far stronger than division and dissension."

The Egyptian President added:

> "Egypt will never abandon its vanguard role in the service of Arab causes and will never falter in carrying out its duty, however violent the storms and waves. It is a firm strategy of Egypt's policy to champion the Palestinian cause."

87. Day after day in the occupied Arab territories there are numerous examples of colonization, de facto annexation, coercion, duress, the seizure of lands, expropriation of property, unjust exploitation of resources and continuing arbitrary practices, the most abhorrent of which is the imposition of a dual legal system that discriminates between the Palestinian inhabitants, who are the rightful owners of the land, and the Israeli settlers. All this has led to a vicious circle of occupation, followed by resistance, then oppression and then yet more resistance. Occupation has led to what we see today in the way of obnoxious fanaticism and organized terrorism perpetrated by intruding settler groups.

88. In spite of all these material conditions which have been imposed, and in spite of arbitrary practices, an enlightened reading of all these events shows that power, domination, the bonds of military occupation and structural or demographic changes can never quell the desire for national existence of an authentic people which has lived hundreds—nay, thousands—of years on its land in Palestine. This is not the position of the international community alone, but is indeed the voice of reason among peoples that cherish peace and justice, a voice now beginning to echo within Israel itself.

89. Israeli policies in the occupied Arab territories stem from a false assumption and therefore lead to the wrong results. Israel's non-recognition of the applicability of the Geneva conventions to the occupied Arab territories and its non-compliance with its responsibilities as a signatory to those conventions in its capacity as an occupying authority can never impart legitimacy or legality to any measures—recent or old—emanating from those arbitrary policies, based on faits accomplis.

90. The establishment of new illegal settlements and the expansion of existing ones are illegal. The original settlements and the proliferation of settlements are also illegal.

91. Above all, the annexation by the Government of Israel in 1980 of the City of Jerusalem is an illegal act. This legal and political position was reaffirmed by the Security Council in resolution 478 (1980).

92. It is incumbent upon the international community to take deterrent measures to prevent the loss of the Holy City of Jerusalem through the action of Israeli forces within the framework of Israeli sovereignty over and occupation of the Arab territories.

93. The international community is called upon to take the necessary measures to preserve the security of the Holy City, which is a source of inspiration for all those who believe in divine revelation and is a place of fraternity and tolerance, and to prevent Israel from imposing its will unilaterally on a historic, unique city which the whole world regards as special.

94. Egypt's position of principle is unswerving: it rejects Israeli sovereignty over Jerusalem. Egypt insists that Jerusalem is part of the occupied Arab territories and subject to the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force, as well as to the Geneva conventions. No change in its demographic, geographic or administrative nature can be regarded as legal or in any way serve as a precedent.

95. The Holy City of Jerusalem must remain Arab and must be protected from all regional conflict and from Israeli domination. It must remain a city of peace and love, as ordained by God and the prophets.

96. In his statement before the General Assembly on 28 September last [12th meeting], the Egyptian Minister for Foreign Affairs made a general evaluation of the different elements of the Palestinian question, its causes and dimensions and the elements of a just and comprehensive solution.

97. That statement included a number of considerations that are indispensable in arriving at a just political settlement of the question of Palestine. These can be summed up as follows.

98. First, peace and expansion into the land of others are irreconcilable. Israel must therefore relinquish the occupied Arab territories so that genuine peace can be attained. This applies equally to the West Bank, including the Holy City of Jerusalem, to the Gaza Strip and, of course, to the occupied Syrian Golan Heights.

99. Secondly, the question of Palestine must be resolved through negotiations, with the participation of the Palestinian people, the party directly concerned, and Israel.

100. Thirdly, these negotiations must be based on the principle of mutual and reciprocal recognition of the right of the other to exist.

101. Fourthly, the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination is a sacred, inalienable right and necessarily entails its right to establish an independent State on its national soil and, if it so wishes, to choose unity with any other entity through the free expression of its will.

102. Fifthly, the Palestinian people, as the party directly concerned, has the right to choose its representatives and spokesmen. The Palestinian people has already chosen the PLO as its representative and spokesman.

103. Egypt, which honours its commitments and its signature to treaties and conventions, foremost among which is the Charter of the United Nations, which calls for the peaceful settlement of disputes, has chosen the path of peace. Egypt is following that path in the firm conviction that peace must be based on justice and that only such a peace can satisfy the interests of all concerned. The arduous road that leads to peace and progress must proceed through free negotiations, based on the principle of mutual recognition of rights and respect for mutual commitments. This is the challenge we must all meet.

104. Egypt, which has expressed its readiness to explore all possible avenues, in President Mubarak's message on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, commemorated on 29 November 1984, reaffirmed that it favoured

> "all constructive initiatives, including that of the United Nations, for the holding of an international peace conference on the Middle East with the participation, on an equal footing, of all concerned parties, including the PLO, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, so as to translate the aspirations for peace and coexistence into an historic reconciliation guaranteeing rights and based on law".

105. The recommendations of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People [see A/39/35, annex I], endorsed by the General Assembly at its thirty-first session, in 1976, continue to serve as an acceptable basis. There is no doubt that the efforts of the Committee and its members have advanced those recommendations towards more developed and more effective horizons through the documents of the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in the summer of 1983.

106. In this context, we wish to pay a tribute to the efforts of the Committee and its Chairman. We appreciate their contribution and lend our support to their efforts.

107. Egypt, with responsibility and effectiveness, participated in the preparation for that historic conference and, together with all the participating countries, worked for its success. We feel that the Geneva Declaration on Palestine,[3] unanimously approved by the Conference, constitutes a balanced, constructive and realistic framework for opening the peace process, based on justice, to new horizons. Egypt believes that the implementation of the multifaceted Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights,[3] adopted by the Conference, constitutes a continuous and renewable framework that would enable the Palestinian people to recover their inalienable and legitimate rights.

108. The recommendations of the Committee this year [ibid., paras. 155-160], have highlighted the great importance attached to the holding of an international peace conference on the Middle East, called for last year by the General Assembly in resolution 38/58 C and described in the Committee's recommendations as providing an opportunity for all the concerned parties to participate in the negotiations leading to a just settlement of the question of Palestine.

109. In this connection, we wish to recall again the relevant observations made by the Secretary-General in his report on the situation in the Middle East [A/39/600] and refer to his precise analysis of the need to move in this direction in the search for a peaceful settlement, especially with regard to the cardinal role attributed to the Security Council as the organ primarily responsible for the maintenance of international peace and security, as well as to his practical views on the basis of negotiation, its context and the role that the Secretary-General himself can play in consultation with the Council and the concerned parties in preparation for such a conference.

110. Discussion of the question of Palestine began with the establishment of the United Nations. The passage of four decades since the beginning of the conflict should not make us forget for one moment its true causes and origin. Nor must we forget the fate met by the resolutions adopted year after year by the United Nations.

111. The time elapsed after the adoption of a United Nations resolution does not rob it of its legitimacy or legality, in spite of Israel's disregard of United Nations resolutions, or violation of them.

112. The rights of the Palestinian people are deep-rooted in their land. The Palestinian people's right to return and to self-determination is authentic, however long that may take. No matter how long Israel continues to violate international conventions, the political, legal and historic bases of the national and legitimate rights of the Palestinian people in their land cannot be denied.

113. In the final analysis, the Palestine cause remains the core of the Arab-Israeli conflict. It will symbolize the human reality which the voice of reason beckons us to acknowledge and not deny. It calls on us to deal with it, not to ignore it, for the Palestinian people, like all other peoples in the region, are entitled to a secure existence and a free and dignified life.

114. Palestine will always remain a source of peace—if that is indeed the will of the peoples of the region—or it can continue to be a theatre of slaughter, agony and loss of life, if one party to the conflict continues to be the prisoner of historic illusions and the victim of a desire for domination and supremacy over the other parties.

115. The choice in Palestine is between peace and strife. Wisdom and realism call on us to look to the future, to opt for peace and to exploit all the opportunities that are before us all. We must choose peace, a peace based on justice—the only kind of peace that can result in the security and stability to which we all aspire.

116. Mr. KRAVETS (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) (interpretation from Russian): Post-war history has seen quite a few examples of the emergence and fanning of regional conflicts for which imperialist and other reactionary forces are to blame. These are conflicts which threaten international peace and security. But probably the most acute and protracted of them is still the conflict in the Middle East, of which a key element is the Palestinian problem.

117. The core of this problem, as is well known, is the fact that the Arab people of Palestine is deprived of its inalienable right to self-determination and the establishment of its own State. Despite numerous United Nations resolutions and efforts of the international community, the past year has not alleviated the plight of the long-suffering Palestinian people. This is attested to by many facts cited in the discussion and in reports from the occupied territories.

118. The present explosive situation in the Middle East region is the result of the adventuristic, expansionist policy of Israel, encouraged and supported by the United States. It is the ruling circles of Israel which are carrying out an inflexible chauvinistic policy towards the Arab people of Palestine, egging on the country to continue the occupation of Palestinian and other Arab lands, implementing a deliberate policy of expelling the Palestinian people from the lands they have seized and trying by force of arms to put an end to the Palestinian question.

119. At present, Tel Aviv has behind the bars of the occupation régime about 2 million persons, that is, a population equal to about half the inhabitants of Israel. Numerous events attest to the fact that the Israeli clique is carrying out a policy of mass terrorism in the occupied territories. Murder of the civilian population, mass acts of repression and torture, collective reprisals, medical experiments on prisoners, destruction of housing and expulsion of persons—those are ingredients of the Zionist "iron-fist" policy, the major objective of which is to gain for Israel more "vital space."

120. It is accompanied by stepped-up colonization of the Arab lands seized as a result of aggression and is aimed at changing the demographic picture. According to several sources, as a result of expropriation, Israel now controls 60 per cent of Palestinian lands. The establishment of Israeli settlements on these lands is going on at an ever faster pace. The number of such settlements is already about 200. In the next 30 years, the number of colonists in them will exceed a million, given the present level of 50,000. Such are the results of the plans and the policies of "creeping annexation" regarding the occupied territories. These actions are a crude violation of the Charter of the United Nations and the provisions of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949,[1] and they have been condemned on numerous occasions by the Security Council, the General Assembly and other United Nations bodies.

121. The question naturally arises as to how Israel, which received its own statehood as a result of United Nations decisions, has been able for so many years blatantly to ignore decisions of the Organization, openly trample underfoot all norms of international law and the provisions of the Charter, continue to occupy Palestinian lands and cynically deny the legitimate owners their inalienable rights.

122. There is one answer to this: Israel could not behave in such a brazen and provocative manner were it not for the patronage and comprehensive support it receives from its overseas partner in "a strategic alliance". By arming and watching over the aggressor, defending it in the United Nations, the United States, together with Israel, bears direct responsibility for the dangerous situation existing in the Middle East which threatens international peace, and they bear the responsibility for the fact that the Palestinian problem has not yet been resolved. As has been rightly noted in the course of the current Assembly session, it is precisely those two States which are now blocking the way to genuine peace in the Middle East, peremptorily trying to impose on the Arabs separate deals which are in contradiction with the true interests of the Arab countries and ignore the inalienable national rights of the Arab people of Palestine.

123. It is well known that only thanks to generous financial injections from overseas can Israel continue its expansionist policy against the Arab peoples. This year alone, financial assistance to Israel accounted for $2.61 billion, and the needs of the aggressor grow unchecked. Thus, for the new financial year, Tel Aviv, it is reported, is planning to request $5 billion. There can be no doubt that Washington will turn a sympathetic ear to this request. In this connection The Christian Science Monitor of 6 September this year noted that: "The pro-Israeli lobby has shown on many occasions that it can win out over the Administration, both in Congress and in the Senate, on any question which affects the interests of Israel".

124. The pro-Israeli policy of the United States has once again been reaffirmed in discussion in the Security Council this year of incidents of the lawlessness of the Israeli military clique against the Lebanese and Palestinians in occupied southern Lebanon.

125. The anti-Arab and anti-Palestinian essence of the policy of strategic partners was also reaffirmed by their negative attitude towards the idea of convening an international peace conference on the Middle East. It is because of the obstructionist policies of those two Governments that General Assembly resolution 38/58 C, regarding the convening of such a conference, has still not been implemented. From 1976 onwards, because of the United States veto, implementation of the recommendations of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People has not been carried out. Those recommendations lay down ways and means of implementing those rights. Using trumped-up excuses, they also reject other constructive proposals, including the Arab peace plan, adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference,[4] and others aimed at solving the Middle East problem and finding a just solution to the Palestinian problem.

126. The Ukrainian SSR is convinced that it is not through military adventures or backstage intrigues and separate deals that peace can be brought to the peoples of the Middle East. A fundamental improvement in the situation in the Middle East can be achieved only through joint efforts, through convening an international conference with the participation of all parties involved, including the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Arab people of Palestine. It is precisely that course which is indicated in the 29 July 1984 proposals of the Soviet Union [see A/39/368] on the settlement of the Middle East problem. They provide for a full withdrawal of Israeli troops from the Arab territories occupied in 1967, a just solution to the key problem of a settlement for the Middle East and for the Palestine problem on the basis of the implementation of the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people, inter alia, its right to self-determination and to the creation of its own independent State. The Soviet proposals give both an overview and a summary of the initiatives put forward by the Soviet Union at various stages of the development of this conflict and lay down clear principles and concrete means for eliminating the problem. Those proposals, which take into account the legitimate interests of all countries and peoples of the region, received broad approval in the Arab world and also a positive assessment during the course of the current session of the General Assembly. All those who genuinely aspire to a peaceful settlement of the problem of the Middle East supported them.

127. In stating our solidarity with the just struggle of the Palestinian people for their inalienable rights, we call for a closing of ranks among anti-imperialist national patriotic forces of the Arab countries, including the Palestine resistance movement. This is an earnest of the success of the struggle of the Arabs against imperialism and zionism and for the establishment of a just, lasting peace in the Middle East and ensuring the legitimate rights of the Arab people of Palestine.

128. The Ukrainian SSR favours the adoption by the General Assembly of effective measures aimed at the speedy solution of the problem of the Middle East. Such a solution is awaited by all peoples of the region, and first and foremost by the Palestinian people.

129. We believe the General Assembly should take an unequivocal stand favouring the continuation of efforts for the speedy convening of an international conference on the Middle East. The obstacles raised to so doing must be eliminated. In this connection, we call on the Assembly to adopt an appropriate decision, and we are ready actively to support it.

130. Mr. AL-ALFI (Democratic Yemen) (interpretation from Arabic): The fact that the question of Palestine, the core of the conflict in the Middle East, remains without a just solution has serious consequences for stability in the region. This question, which continues to be given priority attention by the United Nations, requires serious measures to find a just solution, especially since the absence of a solution to the problem only adds to the sufferings of the Palestinian people, who have been forcibly expelled from their land and are subjected to the most horrendous forms of terrorism and torture and whose lands and properties have been expropriated by the Israeli occupying authorities.

131. The successive events and developments in the Middle East amply demonstrate that without a withdrawal by Israel from the Arab territories it occupies and without a just solution of the question of the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to return to its country, the right to self-determination and the right to establish an independent State on its national soil, the explosive situation in the Middle East will be exacerbated.

132. The continuation of these aggressive, racist and expansionist policies of Israel in the Palestinian territories and the occupied Arab territories—occupation, annexation, expropriation, the expansion and establishment of settlements, oppression, terrorism and deportation of the Palestinian people, according to an overall framework of Zionist schemes and goals—is only making the Palestinian and Arab peoples more than ever determined to cling to their ancestral lands and to continue their struggle for liberation, knowing that they enjoy the support and solidarity of all forces and countries in the world that cherish peace and freedom.

133. The only path to peace and security in the Middle East is that of a comprehensive, just and lasting solution, one that does not fragment the question or disregard the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people. The policy of separate, bilateral agreements which the United States and Israel are trying to impose on the peoples of the region is contrary to the legitimate interests of the Arab people and constitutes partiality and support on the part of the United States for Israel's policy of aggression and expansion in the region.

134. I would like to emphasize once again my country's firm position. It supports the struggle of the Palestinian people, under the leadership of the PLO, against aggressive policies and conspiracies designed to impose final solutions that are contrary to United Nations resolutions and to the legitimate national rights of the Palestinian people.

135. At the same time, we express our appreciation for the international efforts and initiatives designed to restore a just and lasting peace to the Middle East and to defuse the explosive situation, through the holding of an international conference with the participation of all the parties concerned in the conflict, including the PLO.

136. The Geneva Declaration on Palestine,[3] adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983, emphasized that a just solution of the question of Palestine is the crucial element in a political, just, lasting and comprehensive settlement in the Middle East. That declaration also lays down the guidelines for such a settlement. They include the right of the Palestinian people to return to its land, its right to self-determination and its right to establish its own independent State in its homeland. The Geneva Declaration also calls for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East, under the auspices of the United Nations, with a view to the achievement of a comprehensive, just and lasting solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, based, above all, on the establishment of an independent Palestinian State in Palestine. The declaration provides that the conference should be held with the participation, on an equal footing, of all parties to the Arab-Israeli conflict, including the PLO, the United States, the Soviet Union and other concerned States.

Mr. Lusaka (Zambia) resumed the Chair.

137. Furthermore, the Soviet Union recently put forward some proposals [ibid.] regarding the question of Palestine and the Middle East. Those proposals are essentially in line with the General Assembly's call for the convening of an international conference on the Middle East.

138. In our view, these international proposals and initiatives provide a viable, practical and realistic framework for the realization of a just and comprehensive peace in the Middle East, under which the Palestinian people could exercise their inalienable national rights and the occupied Arab territories, including Arab Jerusalem, could be liberated. Democratic Yemen calls on the international community to take practical steps to achieve a just and lasting settlement in the region.

139. Moreover, in our opinion, the rejection by Israel and its strategic ally, the United States, of these initiatives and their continued denial to the Palestinian people of their inalienable national rights emphasize the fact that this strategic alliance between the United States and Israel, which has been condemned by the General Assembly, only exacerbates tension in the Middle East and turns the region into an arena for conspiracies against the peoples of the Arab countries, thereby endangering peace and stability in the region. The aim is to pave the way for imposing imperialist hegemony on the Arab lands, plundering the wealth of the Arab States and taking control over their destiny.

140. The true American-Zionist intentions and objectives in the region are very clear; they cannot be hidden. Unlimited support by the United States for Israel, in all fields, is the principal factor behind Israel's refusal to comply with United Nations resolutions and its continued defiance of the international community's will. As is known, the United States continues to support Israel in the United Nations by using its veto power in the Security Council. The United States even resorts to threatening States and international organizations that condemn Israeli policies and practices. That demonstrates the complete bias of the United States in favour of Israel.

141. We hope that the discussions at the current session will provide new impetus for international solidarity with the just cause of the Palestinian people and its legitimate struggle. We also hope that it will bolster the Assembly's condemnation of the aggressive, expansionist and racist policies pursued by Israel, with the support and encouragement of the United States. In that way, the United Nations will shoulder its full responsibility to eliminate the injustice and suffering to which the Palestinian people is subjected and will be able to take practical steps to achieve a just and lasting settlement so that peace may reign in that explosive region and the Palestinian people may be enabled to exercise its inalienable national rights.

142. Mr. Shah NAWAZ (Pakistan): The consideration of the question of Palestine is yet another sombre reminder, if any is needed, that the international community has not been able to resolve what is perhaps the oldest issue on the General Assembly's agenda. The question of Palestine has been figuring in our debates for nearly four decades and we are no nearer a solution of the problem today than we were 37 years ago, when the issue first came up for the consideration of the General Assembly.

143. Year after year, the General Assembly in its deliberations on the Palestinian question has focused its attention on the two distinguishable, though inseparable, aspects of the problem—namely, the plight of the Palestinians in the occupied territories, and the reaffirmation and realization of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination and national independence, which is at the heart of the Middle East conflict. On both counts, the picture remains dismal.

144. All over the world, people are vividly conscious of the cruel fate which has overtaken the Palestinian people, under alien occupation in the land of their birth and as refugees scattered in foreign lands. This tragedy is of such enormous proportions that familiarity with it does not blunt the edge of our sensitivity or render us immune to suffering the pangs of conscience which it generates.

145. In the West Bank and in Gaza, the indomitable people of Palestine face a relentless oppressor which is pursuing a calculated policy of harassment and terrorism aimed at compelling them to abandon the land on which they have lived for over a millennium and where they have built a vibrant nation and a proud civilization. Outside the land of their birth, most of them suffer the indescribable hardships of deprivation and life in exile. Even in the refugee camps they have not found safety from relentless vengeance and ruthlessness, of which the brutal massacres in the Sabra and Shatila camps in Lebanon following the Israeli onslaught against that country in 1982 were the most savage expressions.

146. We wish to convey our deep appreciation to Mr. Massamba Sarré, Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, for the report of the Committee [A/39/35], which reviews in detail the appalling conditions of the Palestinians living under Israeli occupation. The report gives numerous instances of harassment and persecution of the Arab and Palestinian population in the occupied territories, which are kept constantly terrorized through frequent curfews and the routine practice of security checks by the Israeli occupation authorities—soldiers, police and settlers—at any time of the day or night. At the same time, the economy of the occupied territories is being manipulated in a manner which facilitates control over production and reduction of the capacity to create employment. Consequently, young Palestinians are forced to leave the land of their fathers in search of employment and sustenance abroad.

147. Terrorism is rampant, and even the Islamic holy places are not immune from desecration at the hands of fanatics who openly advocate the obliteration of Arab and Palestinian existence and the banishment of their cultural heritage from the occupied territories.

148. The most disturbing and sinister aspect of Israeli policy in the occupied territories is the systematic pursuit of the objective of permanent annexation of the occupied territories by altering their Palestinian and Arab character. The main thrust of this policy is towards changing the demographic pattern of the occupied territories through the expropriation of Arab and Palestinian lands and the establishment of Israeli settlements. Measures have been taken to limit or obstruct the expansion or growth of Palestinian towns and villages and to divert the resources of the land, particularly water, for the benefit of Israeli settlers. According to the report of the Committee, the ominous long-term consequences of this policy are evident in the Israeli projections, which envisage settling a minimum of 100,000 Israeli citizens in the occupied territories by 1987 and 190,000 by the year 2010. These numbers exclude Israeli settlers in Jerusalem and other Palestinian localities incorporated into the city immediately after the 1967 war.

149. The report of the Committee also touches upon the conditions in the Palestinian refugee camps in southern Lebanon, which fell under Israeli occupation in 1982. The concern, reflected in the report, over the security of the Palestinian refugee camps, particularly at Ein el-Hilweh, was the subject of Security Council deliberations in May of this year. It is a matter of deep regret that the Council was unable to respond to the Lebanese complaint about the coercive practices and measures enforced by the Israeli occupation authorities against the civilian population in southern Lebanon, which includes a large segment of Palestinian refugees who, like their compatriots in the West Bank and Gaza, have become the victims of Israeli intolerance.

150. The continuously deteriorating conditions inside the occupied territories are rendered more poignant by the bleakness of the prospects for a solution of the Palestinian question on the basis of the realization by the Palestinian people of their inalienable national rights. The numerous international initiatives seeking a just solution to this festering problem have all foundered on the rock of Israeli intransigence.

151. In the wake of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1982, the Arab leadership, demonstrating exemplary moderation and restraint, announced at Fez on 9 September 1982, at the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference,[4] a plan which was acclaimed throughout the world as offering a reasonable basis for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East. The Israeli authorities rejected the Fez plan out of hand. They even dismissed President Reagan's initiative of 1 September 1982,[7] leaving little doubt about the existence and pursuit by Israel of a policy of relentless expansion in which the national rights of the Palestinian people have no place.

152. Undeterred by Israeli defiance, the United Nations has persisted in its efforts to ensure the restitution of the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people. Last year, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 36/120 C, the United Nations convened at Geneva, from 29 August to 7 September, the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, with the object of making a comprehensive effort to seek effective ways and means to enable the Palestinian people to regain and exercise their rights. Shortly afterwards, the General Assembly, echoing a decision taken at the Geneva Conference, adopted resolution 38/58 C, recommending the convening of an international conference on peace in the Middle East, which, if it were to materialize, could provide an opportunity for all parties concerned to participate in negotiations leading to a comprehensive solution of the problem.

153. We are grateful to the Secretary-General for undertaking efforts to promote this General Assembly initiative, which are the subject of a report [A/39/130 and Add.1] under this agenda item. Consultations held last February in the Security Council enabled the Secretary-General to pursue the initiative regarding the convening and organization of the conference. It is clear, however, that in the absence of support from the United States and Israel, the initiative on an international conference on the Middle East will be stillborn.

154. The continuing deadlock over these initiatives will benefit no country in the Middle East; nor can it bring any advantage to the two super-Powers, which have long professed their interest in the peace and stability of this sensitive region of the world. The deteriorating political climate in the region, and in particular inside the occupied territories, is a source of intense violence, the impact of which is being felt far beyond the region of the Middle East.

155. The years of deepening conflict in the Middle East and the threat this poses to global peace call for full recognition of the imperatives of peace and security in the region. Foremost among these are the immutable conditions, repeatedly spelt out by the General Assembly, for a Palestinian settlement. These are: the withdrawal by Israel from Palestinian and Arab territories occupied by it since 1967 and respect for the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to establish their own independent State in Palestine. This is not a new demand. The General Assembly mandated the creation of a Palestinian State concomitantly with that of Israel as early as November 1947. Israel cannot hope for peace or enjoy security without meeting these conditions.

156. It must be recognized that a settlement of the Palestinian question cannot conceivably be negotiated without the active participation of the Palestinian people through their authentic representative, the PLO. No process for the determination of the fate and destiny of the people of Palestine can be a viable process without their full participation.

157. It must also be recognized that progress towards a settlement requires the co-operation of both the super-Powers whose interests are so deeply involved in the area. Negotiations excluding one of them from making its indispensable contribution would be sterile. The strong international support available to the Palestinian cause at the United Nations and other international forums needs to be combined with a concerted, determined, yet pragmatic, endeavour by the Palestinian and Arab leadership, with the sole objective of seeking redress for the injustice done to the Palestine people. We are heartened by the success of the recent meeting of the Palestine National Council at Amman which promises the return of solidarity within the PLO, so vital for the advancement of the Palestinian cause. We hope that the decisions taken by the Council will provide a much-needed impetus to international efforts for a just and speedy resolution of the Palestinian question.

158. Meanwhile, the United Nations must pursue its endeavours to provide relief to the Palestinians under Israeli occupation and to prevent violations of their human rights. Simultaneously, it must continue to explore and seize without loss of time the opportunities which exist for a negotiated peace in the Middle East. The United Nations bears a special responsibility for the realization of the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people. The failure of the international community to fulfil its commitment to the Palestinian people will have incalculable consequences for the United Nations and, indeed, for world peace and security.

159. I take this opportunity to reaffirm the abiding commitment of the Government and the people of Pakistan to the Palestine cause, a commitment which goes as far back as the beginnings of our own struggle for independence. Pakistan will continue to exert all efforts and extend all support for the deliverance of the people of Palestine from Israeli occupation.

160. Mr. ALAUKLI (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) (interpretation from Arabic): For over 37 years, the General Assembly has discussed the question of Palestine in both regular and extraordinary sessions. Each time, numerous resolutions are adopted reaffirming the right of the Palestinian people to return to their homes and their right to self-determination and the establishment of their own independent State. Each time also, all who harbour good intentions expect that a miracle will occur and hope that the recurrent call expressing the awakening of world conscience will be heard and that there will be a happy end to the tragedy of the Palestinian people, to their long sufferings and to the sacrifices they have made in their occupied land and in exile. Nevertheless, zionism and successive American administrations do not hesitate to place repeatedly coercive constraints on such hopes.

161. In the face of the separation and contradiction between international decisions and the likelihood of their implementation, we can see how those who, in haste and without difficulty, formulated the Charter of the United Nations in the aftermath of the Second World War, wrote the beautiful and optimistic Preamble to that Charter. It is clear that the founders were not sufficiently aware at the time that imperialist designs are even more dangerous for peace than fascism, that racism did not end with the fall of nazism and that threats to international peace and security persist in the absence of an international will and authority capable of protecting the causes of justice, right, freedom and peace.

162. The question of Palestine, in the past and at present, bears historic witness to the continuing prevalence of unjust rules in international relations, even with a United Nations presence in the matter. It also points to grave defects in the current form of the international Organization. Nearly 40 years after the establishment of the United Nations, equality between States remains for the majority a fantastic dream. In practice, it has been possible for one State, or a small group of States, to challenge the international will and consensus, in total disregard of the principles and provisions of the Charter and the principles of contemporary international law. Power in the world today is confined to the interests of the strong; he who possesses power has tremendous possibilities to transform wrong into right, the impossible into the possible. In such a situation, the legitimate aspirations of lesser peoples are stifled. A barrier is placed before their demands, however strong international sympathy may be. If, employing that logic, they do not offer even greater sacrifices in order to change the balance of power, they will never attain anything. The only other choice available to them is to surrender. That is exactly what zionism and imperialism have striven to impose upon the Palestinian people, and exactly what racism and imperialism wish to impose on the Namibian people. In spite of widespread international sympathy with those two causes, the two racist régimes in Palestine and South Africa continue to challenge the international will.

163. This deplorable fact, which illuminates the deep chasm between the principles and ideals enshrined in the Charter and the prevailing reality governing international relations, does not in any way detract from the value and importance of General Assembly resolutions and decisions to place the Palestinian question on its agenda at every session. In such a way, the General Assembly regularly unmasks the true face of Zionist policy and expresses deep international sympathy with the Palestinian people, at the same time revealing the dimensions of the threat to world peace as a result of the inadequacy of the existing international system and in spite of the lofty ideals of the authors of the Charter of the United Nations.

164. The United Nations bears a great part of the responsibility for the creation and development of the question of Palestine. The General Assembly resolution of 29 November 1947 [resolution 181 (II)], which partitioned Palestine into two States, signalled the first error committed by the United Nations in its history. This could have been due to the good intentions of one party, but the malevolence of the other was quite clear, for this was a step to realize its ambitions in the Arab homeland. Thus, the feelings generated by the set-backs of the Second World War and the memories of Fascist and Nazi injustices were exploited to implant an intruding entity into the Arab world to serve as a custodian for imperialist and colonialist interests in the region and a regional instrument to strike down the possibilities of evolution and unity in the Arab world. Under the slogan of "Justice for the Jews" after their plight in Nazi Germany, the worst case of injustice was inflicted on the Arab and Palestinian peoples. In this regard, the famous English historian Arnold Toynbee said that the Arabs have to pay for a crime they did not commit and the basic responsibility for which falls upon western societies.

165. The question of Palestine is the flagrant embodiment of the start of contemporary Western plots against the Arab nation. It is the bitter harvest reaped after Arab co-operation with Western colonial countries during the two world wars. The question of Palestine represents at the same time a moral crisis facing the Western colonial democracies which ascribe no value to anything save their selfish interests and ambitions. Great Britain, which had responsibility for the Mandate over Arab Palestine, entered into collusion with the world Zionist movement and conspired with it to apply policies aimed at changing the demographic nature of Palestine by forcing the Arab inhabitants to flee by various terrorist means and welcoming thousands of Jews brought over to Palestine by the Jewish Agency. After the conspiracy was revealed, all that remained to be done was to give it international legitimacy. Hence Great Britain referred the whole question to the United Nations, which, under Zionist and imperialist pressure, in November 1947 produced its resolution on the partition of Palestine. Some thought the matter had ended there, but the rejection by the Palestinian people and the Arab nation of this unjust decision, on the one hand, and the escalation of expansionist Zionist ambitions, on the other, has kept the question alive, and it now threatens peace and development not only in the Arab region but also in the rest of the world.

166. The question of Palestine is the responsibility of the United Nations. This fact cannot be changed by the current situation obtaining in this international Organization, the result of the policies of the super-Powers which, in keeping with their special responsibilities under the Charter, should support freedom and peace. The United Nations has a legal, political and moral responsibility towards the Palestinian people. The United Nations has contributed to the suffering of the Palestinian people, and it must allow them to regain their inalienable rights. Mere denunciations and a disregard of acts of force and of the facts of occupation and oppression will not only affect the credibility and reputation of the United Nations but also will encourage the aggressor to continue its machinations and plans—practices which in time might become difficult to change.

167. The situation in Palestine and the Arab region makes it necessary to reconsider the way the United Nations has dealt with the question during the past four decades, especially since it has become clear that all the resolutions adopted by the United Nations on the subject, although comprehensive, always lack the possibility of implementation and fall short of deterring the aggressor from pursuing its aggression. This reality calls for a fresh assessment aimed at finding new ways to deal with the problems. I believe this process should be linked to an in-depth study of the problems and their sources, as well as how to resolve them. Here we should refer to a number of important facts directly related to this question.

168. First, the Arab character of Palestine is steeped in history and has never been questioned. The inhabitants of Palestine—be they Muslims, Christians or Jews—are Arabs in origin, culture and civilization. Any allegation to the contrary is an error and does not confer any right to occupy Palestine and to expel its inhabitants, Muslims or Christians. Thus, any attempt to erase the Arab character of Palestine is null and void and cannot be accepted, even though it might produce certain effects lasting years or centuries.

169. Secondly, the Zionist movement, born in the cradle of imperialism and colonialism, is a colonialist and racist political movement, even though it may operate under the guise of religion. Its main features were shaped in that period of historic and social evolution when Europe was imbued with a spirit of adventure and distorted ideas of superiority and supremacy, thus reflecting a culture alien to the Arab region.

170. Thirdly, the Zionist movement is dependent on imperialism and colonialism, which encourage it to expand and give it more and more assistance and support. Hence, at an early stage zionism was the ally of the British and French empires and, later, the ally of American imperialism.

171. Fourthly, the establishment of a religiously segregated community in Arab Palestine, as well as the repercussions of this action, have brought the region to the brink of conflict and instability. Zionist ambitions did not stop with the adoption of the partition plan resolution; zionism has tried to extend the Jewish empire over the largest possible area of Arab territory. The Zionist system does not recognize that its political boundaries are marked by the partition resolution. Zionists believe that that resolution serves as the base and spring-board to implement the successive phases of the Zionist scheme.

172. Fifthly, Zionist plots have always run counter to the objectives of peace and prosperity in the Arab lands. For the Zionist movement, peace consists in imposing its terms on other countries or causing a situation of simple armistice as a prelude to more expansion.

173. These facts, coupled with the reality and nature of the Zionist movement and its links to imperialist, racist and colonial circles, clearly show that it is not a question of conflict over borders but of conflict between the original inhabitant and the intruder. It is not a question of refugees but a question of a people who struggle to regain its usurped rights and of the cause of a nation which struggles against an alien danger which threatens its home, its sacred shrines and its very existence.

174. The Zionist policy—based as it is on power and aggression in its relations with the Arabs, as well as its repressive practices in the occupied Palestinian and Arab territories in the form of expulsion, Judaization and the alteration of the demographic, cultural and geographic character of the occupied Arab territories—has unmasked the true nature of the Zionist plan. The Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People has in various respected international documents repeatedly revealed the plight of the Arabs in the occupied territories. The Zionists have not concealed their true intentions. They feel no shame in declaring such ambitions. Rabbi Cook of the Gush Emunim says that this is a period of work and that God will bless such work because He has enjoined all His people to go to Zion and raise the banner over the Holy Land. He says: "Here there is no Arab land; this is our land. The land defined by the Torah extends from the Nile to the Euphrates and it belongs to Israel." Another leader of the Zionist movement, Levinger, clarifies the matter further by saying: "When we deal with the Arabs through force they will surrender to us. If they object to Zionist sovereignty in Judea and Samaria"—he means the West Bank and the Gaza Strip—"we must expel them."

175. Amnon Rubenstein, the former dean of the Faculty of Law of Tel Aviv University, stated, in an article published in Ha'aretz, that the Zionist organizations continue to perpetrate their crimes, based on the Kach and Gush Emunim movements, and that: "The Arabs are an inferior race. They have no rights. They constitute a danger to Israel. They must be expelled from the country."

176. In the view of those two organizations, it is necessary to resort to arms to carry out that act of purification.

177. After the success of the terrorist Kahane, the leader of the Kach movement, in the latest Israeli elections, he was asked what his expectations were after five years. He answered, "I expect to be Prime Minister." This should not surprise us, especially when we remember that Menachem Begin, who perpetrated the massacres at Deir Yassin, himself became Prime Minister.

178. These are examples of the thinking and deeds of the Zionist leaders in occupied Arab Palestine. We refer all those who wish to know more to the memoirs of Ben-Gurion, Dayan and others, as well as to the articles published in spring of 1982 by the Zionist Research Institute in Jerusalem about Israeli strategy in the 1980s, which reveal the dimensions of the conspiracy aimed at dividing the Arab countries and imposing Zionist supremacy over them. We refer particularly to the declarations of the terrorist Sharon concerning the vital space of the Zionist entity, which stretches east to Pakistan, west to the Atlantic Ocean, north to Turkey and south to the Arab peninsula and the heart of the African continent.

179. Speaking about the question of Palestine always leads us to speak about United States policy in the Arab region and the special relationship between the Zionist entity and successive United States Administrations. It is a relationship that found its full dimensions following the tripartite aggression against Egypt in 1956 and the prominence of the United States as an influential Power in the affairs of the region. The American imperialists seek to maintain their economic and strategic interests and to oppose the trend of political and social change in the Arab world, and this has led them to exploit the Zionist base. The Zionist lobby, whose influence on the United States Congress is well known, has enhanced this relationship to the point where it has become a strategic alliance. That alliance, formalized in November 1983, codified the relations between the two parties in the military, political, economic and financial spheres. On the basis of that alliance, it can be said that the Zionist entity is treated as an American state. The share in American assistance of each Jew in occupied Palestine reached $1,250 in 1984, whereas the American citizen gets only half that figure.

180. President Reagan reaffirms at every opportunity his pride in the special relationship with the Zionist entity. On 6 September, he promised before a Jewish audience in the Sheraton Hotel in Washington to continue to support Israel, especially in the form of campaigns supporting Israel in the United Nations. He added that during the first three years of his Administration, Israel received more than $9.5 billion in aid and would this year receive $2.6 billion in grants.

181. These brief references reveal the nature of the relationship between the Zionists and the United States Government and the fact that, in adopting the Zionist programme, the United States has become a direct partner in the aggression against the Arab nation.

182. The widespread American-Zionist plot against the Arab world places on the United Nations the responsibility of going beyond the usual conciliatory resolutions and adopting practical measures that can lead to a just and lasting peace and put an end to the long suffering of the Palestinian people. Our delegation would like to recall certain facts and principles that should be the basis of efforts aimed at restoring peace and stability in the region. These include the following.

183. First, the question of Palestine and its various ramifications are the result of an organized foreign invasion the motives and objectives of which go beyond economic control to the expulsion of the Arab inhabitants. On this level, the question of Palestine is one of racism and colonialism. It is the responsibility of the international community to liquidate that. Aggressive Zionist racism cannot be reformed or modified, and this applies also to the Pretoria régime.

184. Secondly, in any just settlement of the question two principles of international relations must be fully applied. The first is the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force. That principle, which is indivisible, applies to all the Arab and Palestinian territories occupied before and since 1947. The second principle is that the Palestinian people must be enabled to exercise their inalienable right to return, to self-determination and to establish a democratic State on their national soil, a State that would embrace the Arabs of Palestine, be they Muslims, Christians or Jews.

185. Thirdly, any attempt to restore peace to the region must be comprehensive and just and address the various aspects of the question. In this regard, it is important to stress that the United Nations always continues to provide the only appropriate forum for the search for a just and lasting solution of the problem. Consequently, there is no possibility of accepting any partial or even complete arrangements outside the framework of the United Nations, because that would be tantamount to serving Zionist and imperialist schemes for hegemony. The proof of this is the Camp David accords and the Lebanese-Zionist agreement which fell dead under the feet of the heroes of the Lebanese national resistance.

186. Any attempt at settlement that does not take into account the above-mentioned realities and principles will be doomed to failure. The path of justice and equity may be full of obstacles and difficulties, but it is incumbent on the United Nations to assume its heavy responsibility by taking effective and decisive measures to settle a problem that can no longer wait. To be credible, it must do all in its power to put an end to the policies of pillage and aggression by taking the following steps.

187. First, there must be support for the legitimate struggle, including armed struggle, of the Palestinian people for the restoration of its usurped rights.

188. Secondly, the necessary measures must be taken to expel the Zionist entity from the United Nations and to impose mandatory comprehensive sanctions against it, now that the whole world has become aware of the danger which it presents to peace and its constant violation of its commitments under the Charter of the United Nations.

189. Thirdly, pressure must be put on the United States Government to sever its alliance with the Zionist régime and end its assistance to the Zionist entity, which allows the latter to persist in its defiance of the international will and to escalate its policy of aggression.

190. Fourthly, new ways and means must be found to enhance the possibilities of implementing international decisions when the arbitrary use of the veto by the United States prevents the Security Council from fulfilling its function of maintaining peace and security.

191. The question of Palestine did not result from the June 1967 act of aggression against the Arab world, as some believe or wish to believe. That and other acts of aggression that followed were the result of a problem that goes back more than two decades before that date. Therefore, to restrict consideration of this question to the 1967 act of aggression and its consequences is but a perpetuation of injustice and of the destabilization of the Arab region. The people of Palestine count on the United Nations to administer complete justice.

192. In conclusion, on behalf of our delegation, I should like to express to Mr. Massamba Sarré our thanks and our appreciation of the Committee's efforts in heightening the awareness of international public opinion of the reality of zionism and in winning international sympathy for this just international cause.

193. Mr. KASEMSRI (Thailand): Many times in this debate and in previous years the General Assembly has heard the historical facts and arguments and reaffirmed the inalienable rights of the Palestinians. This year, as well as on the other occasions, the question of Palestine is the core of the issue in the Middle East and holds the key to peace and security in the Middle East as a whole. Therefore, the position of the Government of the Kingdom of Thailand has been consistent and steadfast in support of the rights of the Palestinian people and in the earnest hope of achieving a peaceful and just solution to the problem.

194. Since 1967, Israeli forces have been illegally occupying Arab and Palestinian territories, including Jerusalem, which has resulted in countless numbers of displaced, homeless and deprived Palestinians. Various resolutions have been adopted by the General Assembly calling for the restoration of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and, inter alia, reaffirming their right to self-determination and statehood. Any comprehensive, just and durable settlement of the problem must therefore be based on the relevant United Nations resolutions, particularly Security Council resolution 242 (1967).

195. However, the situation not only is unchanged but has indeed worsened. My delegation would like therefore to reiterate Thailand's position, as follows.

196. First, Thailand firmly supports all relevant United Nations resolutions on the question of Palestine, particularly resolution 242 (1967). We believe that they constitute the proper foundation for solving the problem peacefully. We also appreciate and support the ongoing effort of the Secretary-General, especially his endeavour to lend his good offices in pursuit of a just and lasting solution.

197. Secondly, Thailand supports unequivocally the aspirations and the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to self-determination, the right to national independence and sovereignty, and the right to return safely to their homes and properties. However, we also believe that, while respecting Palestinian rights as being sacrosanct, the international community must be mindful of the legitimate rights of other States. Hence, while we reaffirm our support for the legitimate rights of the Palestinians, including the right to statehood, we also respect the legitimate right of all States in the region to exist within secure and recognized boundaries. We earnestly believe that this would contribute to a just and durable settlement of the problem.

198. Thirdly, Thailand views the PLO as the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. This was recently reaffirmed in my Prime Minister's message to the special meeting in commemoration of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, held here on 29 November 1984. We therefore support the right of the PLO, in conformity with relevant United Nations resolutions, to participate on an equal footing in all negotiations and conferences on the question of Palestine and the situation in the Middle East within and outside the framework of the United Nations.

199. Fourthly, Thailand upholds as one of the fundamental principles that any foreign military occupation of another State's territory is unacceptable. In this connection, we have continually called for the withdrawal of Israeli troops from all Arab territories occupied since 1967.

200. Fifthly, Thailand opposes any actions that are not in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations or not in conformity with the rules and norms of international law. That is why Thailand opposes Israel's de facto annexation of Jerusalem, its claimed status as Israel's capital, or any changes in the legal or demographic status of the Holy City. That is also why Thailand has never accepted Israel's de facto annexation of the Golan Heights or Israeli settlements in the West Bank or other occupied Arab territories; and that is why Thailand has consistently condemned the violations of the rights of the people in the occupied Arab territories, as well as the rights of refugees in the area. In this connection, we recall the tragic fate of the Palestinian refugees in the Sabra and Shatila camps.

201. Sixthly, Thailand firmly believes that all international problems could and should be solved in a peaceful manner. Therefore, we strongly support any attempt aimed at the attainment of a negotiated settlement. In this connection, we reaffirm our support of the plan adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference,[4] without prejudice to Security Council resolution 242 (1967) and other relevant United Nations resolutions. However, it is recognized that, in view of the long-standing injustices, there is no alternative to the continuation of the Palestinians' struggle for their legitimate rights by all available means.

202. My delegation would like to pay a warm tribute to the untiring efforts of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People under the chairmanship of Mr. Massamba Sarré, of Senegal. Apart from the intrinsic value of the Committee's report [A/39/35], the fact that that Committee continues to perform its functions with dedication demonstrates the need for the continued support of the international community.

203. My delegation sincerely believes that, in order to reach a negotiated solution, a climate of confidence and understanding between all parties is necessary. Such an atmosphere could be brought about only by means of two factors: one is the unequivocal recognition of Palestinian rights by all the parties and the other is the political will to compromise in the best interests of regional peace and the security of all States. Efforts in such directions will indeed be necessary and useful in creating an atmosphere conducive to a just and lasting solution.

204. Finally, my delegation would like to urge all parties concerned to exert every effort to revitalize the peace process in the region so that a comprehensive political settlement encompassing the legitimate rights and aspirations of all concerned parties could become a reality. Essentially, we demand the prompt withdrawal of all Israeli forces from the Arab territories occupied since 1967 and full Israeli compliance with and implementation of all relevant United Nations resolutions. When the inalienable and legitimate rights of the Palestinian people have been exercised, then the international community will have performed its duty in the interest of peace and justice for all mankind.

205. Mr. AL-QAYSI (Iraq) (interpretation from Arabic): I should like first of all to express my thanks and appreciation to Mr. Massamba Sarré, of Senegal, Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, and to the other members of the Committee for the great efforts they have made and the active role they have assumed in the search for a just solution of the question of Palestine and in defence of the rights of the Palestinian people, in accordance with the rules of international law and the principles of justice, right and peace.

206. The General Assembly is considering the question of Palestine at this session after having commemorated, a few days ago, the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People. On that occasion, a number of messages of solidarity were received from the Heads of State and Ministers for Foreign Affairs of many countries, including Mr. Saddam Hussein, President of the Republic of Iraq. In his message, the President referred to the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people and the need to make efforts in order to find a just and lasting solution to the question, which is vital for peace and security not only in the Arab region but also in the world. The participation of the international community, expressed through the messages of world leaders, in that commemoration strengthened the faith of the Arab nation in the cause of the Palestinian people and the confidence of that people in its future and in the inevitability of its victory over aggression and occupation when it will have regained its inalienable right to return to its country, to self-determination and to establish its own independent State, in accordance with the resolutions of the United Nations.

207. The fact that the United Nations continues to devote attention and time to considering the question of Palestine shows very clearly the depth of the concern and anxiety of the international community as a result of the aggression and occupation being inflicted on the Palestinian people, whose cause is the very core of the Arab-Zionist conflict.

208. Israel is continuing its aggression and occupation of the Arab lands. It is continuing the illegal establishment of settlements in the occupied Palestinian and Arab lands, disregarding General Assembly and Security Council resolutions. The West Bank, Gaza, Al-Quds, the Golan Heights and a large part of Lebanon are still under Israeli occupation, which is transforming the Arab region into one of the most explosive areas, thus endangering international peace and security.

209. The aggressive Israeli practices and the insistence of the Tel Aviv leaders on continuing their occupation and annexation of Palestinian lands are the main source of the plight and sufferings of the heroic people of Palestine. The Zionists are trying to crush the rights of the Palestinian people by subjecting them to the most horrendous forms of repression, deportation and genocide. It should be remembered that the Zionist occupation of Arab and Palestinian lands is intensifying and that the inhuman Israeli practices against the Palestinian people in the West Bank, Gaza and Lebanon are continuing openly and with unabated brutality, in complete disregard of international law and the principles of justice and morality and with no reference to the resolutions of the United Nations or to world public opinion.

210. Through its fight for freedom and its struggle to regain its inalienable right to return and to establish an independent State, the Palestinian people is giving us one of the finest examples of heroism. It is a miscalculation for the Israeli Zionists to believe that their policy of repression, genocide, conspiracy and treachery will silence the Palestinian people and force it to give up arms and abandon its struggle for liberation.

211. The aspiration of the Palestinian people to freedom and its continued determination to attain its noble objectives are closely linked with the PLO, which is the expression of the free will of the Palestinian people. In this connection, we are duty-bound to express once again, in the strongest possible terms, our support for and solidarity with the PLO and its legitimate leadership and for unity within the ranks of Palestinian resistance against all conspiracies and machinations, which are but part of Zionist schemes conceived to eliminate the question of Palestine and suppress the heroic Arab people of Palestine.

212. In our view, the fact that the United Nations persists in inscribing the question of Palestine on its agenda is of positive significance, for the international community hopes to achieve justice and refuses to accept facts based on aggression, brute force and expansionist designs. The international community also refuses to accept the unjust treatment meted out to the United Nations by the Zionist entity and its allies. Moreover, the United Nations has a confirmed responsibility in connection with all questions of liberation and especially the implementation of the right to self-determination, which has become a corner-stone of the international political order represented in the Charter of the United Nations.

213. For years the Palestinian people has been subjected to oppression and terror. It has been deprived of elementary human and political rights. This heroic people was obliged to resort to its legitimate right of self-defence to counter aggression against it by using all the means defined by the United Nations. The Palestinian people, through its long struggle, has made great material and moral sacrifices. In circumstances of a unique character, and in spite of exceptional circumstances and particularly difficult conditions, and in spite of conspiracies directed against it, this people has been able to uncover the misleading and tendentious character of the Zionist propaganda and prove to the world that the Zionist entity is the major and direct source of danger to peace in the Middle East.

214. For years, the Zionist entity has been resorting to practices designed to appropriate a Palestine without Palestinians. To that end, that entity has waged a systematic campaign of genocide against the Palestinians, using all methods of violence, terror and mass murder. Since its very inception, the Zionist entity has pursued a policy of racial discrimination against those Palestinians who did not leave their homeland. It considers them to be third-class citizens and has expropriated their property and trampled upon their rights. In 1967, Israel embarked on the policy of establishing settlements on the land of the expelled owners. It has demolished homes and closed down schools and universities. Moreover, it has permitted the establishment of armed Fascist, Zionist gangs which kill Palestinians in broad daylight.

215. These terrorist, repressive policies are designed to achieve one goal: the liquidation and depersonalization of the Palestinians, in order to force them to leave their homeland so that all of Palestine can be transformed into an exclusively Jewish area.

216. Continued aggression and violation of international law and conventions are characteristic of the aggressive Zionist policy against the Arab nation. Under the pretext of security considerations, Israel has annexed the Syrian Golan Heights and has changed the demographic character of the occupied territories, in order to erase their Arab identity. It profaned the Al-Aqsa mosque and declared Jerusalem its eternal capital, thus antagonizing millions of Muslims and Christians. Moreover, in 1981 Israel destroyed, with its military aircraft, the Iraqi nuclear research facility, which was devoted exclusively to peaceful purposes. The international community condemned this criminal act. The international community also rejected the annexation of Jerusalem and of the Syrian Golan Heights, which was in contravention of the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force. In addition to that series of aggressive acts, Israel invaded Lebanon and engaged in mass murder and terror against Palestinians and Lebanese. It is still occupying large parts of Lebanon, despite resolutions adopted by the Security Council calling for Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon, without any pre-conditions.

217. We believe that the Palestinian question is the core of the Middle East conflict. Therefore, peace cannot be achieved without the complete and unconditional withdrawal by Israel from all the occupied Arab territories, including Jerusalem, and without Israel's recognition of the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to return to its homeland and its right to self-determination and to sovereignty in its own independent State.

218. The Palestinian people has been waging a bitter struggle to regain its lawful rights. It is high time for the Palestinian people to be enabled to exercise its right to self-determination, to establish an independent State on its own land and to take its place among the other nations that, since the Second World War, have rid themselves of imperialism and become independent States. The Palestinian people, under the leadership of the PLO, has proved that its vitality and unity cannot be broken by conspiracies and that its voice cannot be silenced by Zionist military repression. It has proved that its struggle will be crowned with success. The recent meeting of the Palestine National Council at Amman and the resolutions it adopted have amply demonstrated the unity between the Palestinian people and its leadership, represented by the PLO.

219. When one reviews the events of the past year and the efforts that have been made to achieve peace, it is difficult to see on the political horizon any signs of a solution to this problem or the least possibility of the restoration of peace, security and stability to the region. I would emphasize that the major cause of this is the Zionist entity's refusal to abide by the resolutions of the United Nations and the will of the international community. In this regard, we must bear in mind that attempts to disregard the Palestinian reality, to deny the Palestinians' right of return and right to self-determination and independence and to frustrate participation by the Palestinian people, through its legitimate representative, the PLO, will not advance the search for a just and lasting solution to the Palestinian problem or the establishment of peace in the region. Hence, we call upon the Security Council to shoulder its responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations, especially those relating to the implementation of its resolutions and those of the General Assembly, as called for in the Geneva Declaration on Palestine,[3] adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983, and by world public opinion.

220. Iraq is determined to shoulder its responsibilities and to furnish all possible assistance to the Arab people of Palestine and the PLO. We call for a halt to the support given the Zionist aggressor by some international quarters, especially the United States, because such support encourages it to continue its aggressive policy against the Arab people in the occupied Arab territories and frustrates the efforts to achieve peace and to reach a just and lasting solution to the question of Palestine.

221. Mr. PAPAJORGJI (Albania) (interpretation from Spanish): The question of Palestine is the core of the prolonged conflict in the Middle East. If it is not solved, there can be no stability or tranquillity in that region. For years, the United Nations and its various organs have been addressing themselves to this problem. Meetings and debates have taken place, recommendations and resolutions have been adopted, but the situation remains unchanged: the Palestinian people is still under the occupation and oppression of Israeli zionism, and it still is denied its homeland.

222. As it has done on other occasions, the Albanian delegation reaffirms that the cause of the serious situation in the Middle East, and in particular the serious situation of the Palestinian people, is the aggressive attitude of Israeli zionism and the hegemonistic policy of the two super-Powers, the United States and the Soviet Union.

223. Israeli zionism is pursuing ever more fiercely its policy of genocide against the Palestinians in the occupied Arab territories, and this has become the main method of perpetuating its occupation. Everyone is aware of the crimes committed by the Israeli Zionists against the Palestinian people, which has been the victim of unprecedented terror. Assassination, detention and persecution have become daily practices by the Israeli occupiers. They have such blind hatred for the Palestinians that they have no hesitation about committing the most monstrous acts, such as the tragic massacres in the Palestinian camps of Sabra and Shatila. Fascist Zionist packs are in full cry, hunting Palestinian "game". The Tel Aviv gangsters accompany this ferocious terror by stepping up the policy of Judaizing the occupied territories. This is carried out by forcibly expelling the Palestinians from their lands and by gathering them together in camps encircled with barbed wire, camps absolutely indistinguishable from concentration camps. To replace the Palestinians on their land, Jews from the four corners of the world continue to settle, in furtherance of the old goal of zionism: to perpetuate the occupation of the Arab lands. In a word, the Israeli Zionists have mobilized their entire military and economic potential in their crusade against the Palestinian people. Israel's arrogant policy against the Palestinians and against the Arab peoples in the Middle East in general could not be pursued were it not for the overall tense situation in that region which is the result of the expansionist policy of the two super-Powers, the United States and the Soviet Union. Israeli zionism has used, and continues to use, that situation in its anti-Palestinian and anti-Arab activities.

224. It is from that viewpoint, too, that we must examine the plots being hatched against the just cause of the Palestinian people, served up in various guises by both Washington and Moscow. The din they make over their supposed desire for a peaceful solution of the question of the Palestinian people, in fact, is totally incompatible—as the facts have shown—with the basic aspirations of the Palestinian people: the restoration of all their legitimate rights, and a homeland in which they can live in freedom, sovereignty and independence.

225. The United States imperialists do not conceal their hostility towards the Palestinian people and its cause. Openly and arrogantly, they deny its legitimate rights. This hatred is manifested through their tool, Israel, which they have armed to the teeth, turning it into a military terrorist State.

226. It is clear to all that, without the weapons, assistance and financial and political support of the United States, Israel would be unable to do what it is doing against the Palestinian people and in the Middle East in general.

227. As to the Soviet social-imperialists, their acts and their noisy statements, supposedly in support of the Palestinian people and the Arab peoples in general, are nothing but pure demagogy. This so-called support has always been tactical, and it is in keeping with the Soviet Union's imperialist interest in the Middle East. Tens of thousands of Jews who have emigrated from the Soviet Union have moved as settlers into the occupied territories; this emigration is aimed against the Palestinian people. In short, the "peace" plans for the Middle East, whether American or Soviet, do not point to a just solution of the Palestinian question, but rather conceal anti-Palestinian and anti-Arab activities and are in accordance with the long-range objectives of those Powers to gain hegemony in the region.

228. Even faced with a ferocious, bloodthirsty occupier such as Israel and with the diabolical plots of the super-Powers, the Palestinian people has been neither demoralized nor brought to its knees. Quite the contrary: it has brought to bear on this difficult and complex situation its great will, its ardent aspirations and its unshakeable determination to gain its legitimate rights and to achieve what is most sacred to it: return to its homeland, which has been occupied by the Israeli Zionists. Nothing—neither the most sophisticated weaponry of the Israeli aggressor nor the plots of the imperialists—has succeeded or will succeed in crushing its struggle.

229. The Albanian people and its Government have always supported the just cause of the Palestinian people and the other Arab peoples; it supports and will always support them, unswervingly, in their struggle, for it is a struggle for the legitimate and inalienable right of a people to free its pillaged homeland. We wish to take this opportunity also to reiterate our condemnation of those who are inflicting suffering and privation on the Palestinian people: the Zionist occupiers and the two imperialist super-Powers, the United States and the Soviet Union.

230. We have said before, and we repeat now, that the Palestinian problem can be solved only when the Israeli aggressors are expelled from the occupied territories, when the ferocious genocide against the Palestinian people is ended, and when the intervention in the Middle East of the two super-Powers and other imperialist Powers is blocked.

231. Our consistent position in support of the just cause of the Palestinian people has been stated in detail by the leader of the Albanian people, Comrade Enver Hoxha, in his recently published book, Reflections on the Middle East,[8] in which he wrote:

> "Our people feels special sympathy for the Palestinian people, for it has waged and is waging a determined, heroic struggle. We have supported it, and we shall support it, though it find itself on a sea of solitude and betrayal. However betrayed and abandoned it may be at present, the Palestinian people will triumph. It will triumph because it is fighting for a just cause, for return to its homeland, usurped by the Israeli aggressors with the open support of the United States imperialists, the Soviet social-imperialists and reactionary forces from various Arab countries."

232. Mr. TOMASZEWSKI (Poland): The debate on the item which is again before the General Assembly—the question of Palestine—has once more revealed the complete unanimity of all delegations on the urgent need for a settlement of the Palestine problem.

233. There are two major reasons for this urgency. The first is that a nation of almost 5 million people, with a distinctive, historically developed national character, must no longer be denied the basic right to self-determination. The second is that any further delay in the settlement of the Palestinian problem will inevitably lead to the worsening of the already dangerous situation in that sensitive part of the world, jeopardizing peace and security in the region and in the world at large.

234. On numerous occasions, Poland has pointed out that the Middle East conflict, with the Palestinian problem at its core, is one of the main sources of tension in the world. For many years, it has been a source of the destabilization of peace and security in the region. The elimination of these threats is vital to all nations of that region and is in the interests of world peace.

235. My country has never been indifferent about the question of peace in the Middle East. A political manifestation of our stance has been Poland's active participation in United Nations peace-keeping efforts in the region, first in UNEF and now in UNDOF. The dedicated service of the Polish soldiers in the Middle East under the United Nations flag constitutes my country's direct contribution to the restoration of peace in the region.

236. In the opinion of the Polish Government, the main obstacle to the establishment of a lasting and just peace in the Middle East is the Israeli occupation of Arab territories in the wake of the 1967 war, the invasion of Lebanon in 1982 and, further, the total disregard of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people. Such a situation is the result of the expansionist Israeli policy.

237. That Israeli expansionism, manifesting itself in violations of principles of international law and disregard of the numerous relevant United Nations resolutions, found expression also in the annexation of the eastern part of Jerusalem and the extension of Israeli jurisdiction and administration to the Syrian Golan Heights.

238. The Government of the Polish People's Republic strongly condemns acts which are contrary to the Charter of the United Nations. We condemn the Israeli policy of colonizing the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, as well as all acts of repression and discrimination against the Palestinians, as actions contrary to international law. At the same time, Poland firmly supports the justified aspirations of the Palestinian people to enjoyment of its inalienable rights, including the right to self-determination and to the establishment of its own independent State, with guarantees for the peaceful existence and security of all nations and countries in the region.

239. This debate confirms once again that any just and lasting solution to the situation in the region should include, first and foremost, a solution to the question of Palestine. And the only possible framework for such a solution is the United Nations, with its existing resolutions pertaining to the question of Palestine. This solution should be reached through convening an international conference on peace in the Middle East, with the participation, on an equal footing, of all the parties—that is, all the States concerned and the PLO, and also the Soviet Union and the United States as co-chairmen of the 1973 conference on the Middle East. We have expressed this position many times, together with other socialist States, and we have also supported the initiative of the Secretary-General regarding the convening of such a conference. On 29 July 1984, the Government of the Soviet Union made detailed proposals concerning a Middle East settlement [see A/39/368]. There have already been numerous references to those proposals in this debate. I shall confine myself to stating my Government's position on the Soviet proposals, and I quote from a statement of the Polish Ministry for Foreign Affairs made in connection with the statement of the Soviet Union on the Middle East conflict on 29 July 1984:

> "These are highly concrete proposals. They clearly determine the goals of the conference, objectively justify its composition of participation and submit a series of constructive suggestions concerning the organization of the conference's work. The Polish People's Republic is of the opinion that the programme of action suggested in the statement has all the elements which are preconditions for the attainment of a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement of the Middle East conflict."

240. May I add that the Polish People's Republic fully supports the initiative of the Soviet Union and is ready to make a positive contribution to this process.

241. Mr. BIRIDO (Sudan) (interpretation from Arabic): The commemoration by the international community last week of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People and the dedication of the interest of the international community to the cause of that people is a reaffirmation of the consistent support given to the right of that people to establish a sovereign State of its own on its national territory and to exercise its right of self-determination. The commemoration was especially important this year in view of the situation in the region, as in the rest of the world. The situation reveals that the Palestinian problem is at the heart of the conflict in the Middle East and, like an erupting volcano, will continue to threaten peace and security throughout the world unless a just and lasting solution is found.

242. The struggle of the Palestinian people has taught us many lessons. The Palestinian problem will continue to fan the flames of conflict in the Middle East if the sufferings of the Palestinian people continue. Whereas the Palestinian people have constantly given new proof of the justice of their cause, Israel for its part obstinately refuses to comply with the resolutions of the United Nations and rejects all efforts towards peace, in the absence of a deterrent force that would finally compel it to comply with the will of the international community.

Mr. Oramas Oliva (Cuba), Vice-President, took the Chair.

243. Israel has chosen to wage a merciless war against the Arab people of Palestine. Expansionism, occupation and the annexation of land by force of arms have become the declared policy of the Tel Aviv leaders, with all its implications in acts of aggression; the bombing of civilian populations, including old people, women and children; the destruction of holy places, especially Islamic holy places; the Judaization of lands; the sacrifice of innocent human lives; the escalation of the tension; and the continuing conflict, with the destructive and tragic dimensions of which we are all aware.

244. We deplore the continuance of this inhuman situation, with the Palestinian people still prisoners in camps, despite the many United Nations resolutions on this question. Nothing seems able to stay the criminal arm of Israel, which is continuing through all its practices to challenge international resolutions and decisions. It is clear that the international community must shoulder its responsibilities in order to avert the dangers involved in Israel's practices.

245. Israel has obdurately rejected all peace initiatives, notably the resolutions of the United Nations, as well as the peace plan put forward at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference.[4] That plan expressed the desire of the Arab nations for a just peace, while Israel rejects all efforts to bring about peace, because it is an aggressive State that does not want peace.

246. In view of the general discouragement, in view of Israel's attempts to impose a peace based on the policy of force carried out by its political and military institutions, the International Conference on the Question of Palestine was held at Geneva in 1983, under United Nations auspices. That conference marked an important turning-point because it made it possible for the international community, represented by a number of very important participants, to reaffirm its principles for the solution of this problem in the framework of international legality. Thanks to this conference, the international community was able to affirm that there could be no just and lasting peace in the Middle East without complete and unconditional Israeli withdrawal from all the Palestinian and Arab territories occupied since 1967, including the Holy City of Jerusalem, and without permitting the Palestinian people to exercise its rights to self-determination, to return home, to recover its property and to establish a sovereign and independent State on its national land, under the leadership of the PLO, its sole legitimate representative. Those principles will remain solid foundations for a just and solid peace, not a peace imposed at gunpoint.

247. The PLO has demonstrated that it is a party with which serious discussions can be held in all efforts towards peace in the Middle East. The obstacles it has faced have not diminished its determination to pursue its struggle to obtain a just and comprehensive settlement. The Palestine National Council, meeting at Amman only a few days ago, expressed the protests of Arabs and Palestinians against the crimes committed by Israel. That Council made it possible to show how strongly the Palestinian people supports the PLO, its sole legitimate representative. The Council reaffirmed its complete confidence in the elected Palestinian leaders, under the chairmanship of Mr. Yasser Arafat. As Mr. Kaddoumi said yesterday in this forum [88th meeting], the recent meeting of the Palestine National Council was an important event which reaffirmed the existence of special relations between the Palestinian and Jordanian peoples and their unshakeable dedication to a concerted Arab approach to liberating Arab lands and enabling the Palestinian people to exercise its legitimate and inalienable rights.

248. We are all aware that the collaboration that has been established between the Tel Aviv and Pretoria régimes also constitutes a threat jeopardizing security in both the Arab and African regions and undermines the struggles being waged by the Arab and African peoples for freedom and independence. This alliance has been denounced many times in various regional and international forums, and we condemn it forcefully. The international community must redouble its efforts not to hamper the realization of the legitimate aims of the Arab and African peoples.

249. The Palestinian problem will remain the bench-mark whereby the United Nations can measure its ability to restore legitimate rights to peoples seeking them and can measure its credibility, and will enable us to see how far we can live up to the aspirations with which we have been entrusted.

250. To conclude, let me say that the efforts exerted by the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, under the effective guidance of its Chairman, Mr. Sarré, of Senegal, and of its Rapporteur, Mr. Gauci, of Malta, deserve a vote of thanks on behalf of the Sudan and the support of all of us. The Committee has played an important role in making the international community aware of the sufferings of the Palestinian people and the legitimacy of its struggle. The Committee also made praiseworthy efforts in preparing for the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva last year, and in drawing up the extremely valuable report that the Assembly has before it [A/39/35], a report which has our full support. We hope that these efforts will be continued so as to make it possible for the national aspirations of the Palestinian people to be realized.

251. Mr. NGONDA (Zambia): The Assembly once again is taking up the question of Palestine in the continuing quest for a comprehensive and lasting solution to this vexing problem.

252. The Palestinian people yearns for peace, freedom and independence in a State of its own. All peoples everywhere that cherish peace, freedom and justice are concerned that Israel, in violation of numerous resolutions and decisions of the United Nations, has continued to establish new settlements in the occupied Arab territories, thereby deepening tension in the area. Those who entertain the dangerous notion that peace in the Middle East can be guaranteed by increasing Israel's capacity to maintain its unwarranted occupation of Arab lands should by now have realized that their blind support for the Jewish State has had the negative effect of exacerbating tension in the region.

253. There can be no doubt that the question of Palestine is the core of the Middle East problem. The Palestinians are a dispossessed people because of Israel's expansionist policies. A permanent and lasting solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict will continue to elude us so long as Israel stubbornly refuses to withdraw from all the Arab territories it has occupied since 1967. Respect for the Palestinian people's inalienable right to self-determination and independence in a State of its own is certainly a sine qua non for peace in the region. There can be no peace in the Middle East if a comprehensive solution to the question of Palestine is not found. It is indeed the height of naïvety to assume or even imagine otherwise.

254. Zambia attaches the greatest importance to the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by the use of force. This is a cardinal principle enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations to which all States must scrupulously adhere. We have thus supported whole-heartedly Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) and other resolutions and decisions.

255. We believe that the Palestinian question can be resolved through negotiations between all parties to the conflict. To this end, we urge all parties to the conflict to heed the call of the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva last year, for the convening of an international conference on the Middle East, under the auspices of the United Nations, in which the two super-Powers would participate, together with all parties to the conflict, including the PLO, on an equal basis. Although there is a virtual consensus on the part of the international community on the imperative need to resolve the question of Palestine once and for all, the negative attitude of Israel and the United States, to which the Secretary-General refers in his report [see A/39/130/Add. 1], has made it impossible to translate that consensus into reality.

256. The Twelfth Arab Summit Conference, meeting at Fez on 9 September 1982, adopted an important document[4] containing principles that could help to bring about peace in the region. Continued tension in the area poses a serious threat to international peace and security.

257. My delegation wishes to reaffirm Zambia's support for and solidarity with the Palestinian people in their just and heroic struggle to achieve their inalienable right to self-determination and national independence. We reaffirm also our support for the PLO, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

258. Israel's peace and security lie in its readiness to co-operate with the United Nations in the implementation of the relevant resolutions.

259. I wish, in conclusion, to commend the Chairman and other members of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People for their tireless efforts in the fulfilment of the Committee's mandate.

260. Mr. DIACONU (Romania) (interpretation from French): The question of Palestine, one of the most serious that the United Nations has had to face since its earliest years, is being considered this year in an extremely complicated international situation which seriously jeopardizes peace and security in the Middle East and in the entire world.

261. The continuance of the conflict in the Middle East, the illegal occupation by Israel of Palestinian and Arab territories and the state of violence and confrontation that persists in the occupied territories and throughout the area are likely to engender new confrontations, causing the peoples of the region increasing loss of life and material damage and threatening international peace.

262. The evolution of the situation in the Middle East makes more clear than ever the truth that the Palestinian problem constitutes the central element in the Israeli-Arab conflict. Clearly, a comprehensive, lasting solution to this conflict and a climate of tranquillity and co-operation cannot be assured without a just settlement of this problem and the exercise by the Palestinian people of their legitimate right to determine their own destiny and to live in their own independent State.

263. The whole course of history, furthermore, has established the truth that a people cannot base its security and independence on the denial of the right of other peoples to exist and to independence or on the threat or use of force against other States and peoples. The truth is that peace and security can be achieved only through respect for the rights of other countries and for the principles and norms of international law.

264. Hence, recognition of and respect for the legitimate national rights of the Palestinian people, while guaranteeing the conditions in which they can fulfil their national aspiration to live in peace and tranquillity in their own independent State, is in the interest of all the peoples of the region and of peace and security throughout the world.

265. Taking as its point of departure the requirement that all conflicts and matters of dispute must be settled solely by peaceful means, through negotiations, Romania has always called firmly for a political solution to the problems of the Middle East that would guarantee the establishment of a comprehensive peace in the region, as well as the solution of the problem of the Palestinian people on the basis of its right to self-determination, including its right to set up an independent Palestinian State.

266. My country has consistently emphasized that the Palestinian people, like all other peoples, have an inalienable right to organize their life in accordance with their national aspirations and to exercise their right to self-determination, including the right to set up an independent State. We have frequently expressed our unshakeable conviction that, without the solution of the problem of the Palestinian people on the basis of their right to self-determination, no peace in the Middle East is possible. Faithful to its policy of principle, Romania has never failed to adhere to its position that the PLO, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, must participate on an equal footing in the process of settling the problem of the Palestinian people and the overall problem of the Middle East.

267. A comprehensive solution must lead to the achievement of a just and lasting peace and guarantee the independence and sovereignty of all the States of the region.

268. As everybody knows, a number of initiatives have been taken and efforts made, especially in recent years, by Member States and by the United Nations to settle by peaceful means, through negotiations, the many and varied aspects of the Israeli-Arab conflict, in particular the Palestinian problem.

269. In 1983, the General Assembly endorsed the proposal of the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva that year, to convene an international peace conference on the Middle East. A similar idea had been put forward in 1978 by the President of Romania, and since that time my country has never failed to take a very firm position in favour of such a conference, with the participation of all States concerned and of the PLO, as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

270. We feel that this initiative is just as valid today and that efforts are necessary by all States and by the international community in order that the conference may be convened as soon as possible.

271. We share the view expressed by the Secretary-General in his report on the situation in the Middle East [A/39/600] that such a conference might be conceived as a flexible framework for the necessary negotiations to settle all the questions involved in the Middle East conflict. Similarly, we agree with other delegations that the time has come for all the countries concerned and all political forces in the region to promote the organizing of such a conference, which would be a significant contribution to the search for the comprehensive and just solution so long awaited by the peoples of that region and of the entire world.

272. Romania and the Romanian people have consistently expressed their support for the just cause of the Palestinian people, for its legitimate aspirations to live in freedom in an independent State and for its inalienable right to self-determination. Romania was among the first countries of the world to recognize the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

273. In a telegram sent recently by President Nicolae Ceauşescu to the Chairman of the Executive Committee of the PLO, Mr. Yasser Arafat, to congratulate him on his re-election to that post, the conviction was expressed that relations of friendship and beneficial co-operation between the Romanian Communist Party and the PLO would continue to expand and be diversified, to the benefit of both peoples and in the cause of peace, independence and international co-operation.

274. We feel that the United Nations can and must play a more active role in efforts aimed at solving the Middle East conflict and settling the Palestinian problem and that under its auspices comprehensive negotiations can be embarked upon so as to bring about, in that very troubled region of the world, a just and lasting peace that would fully meet the hopes and expectations of the peoples of the region and of the entire world.

275. Undertaking measures and making efforts by political means to find a settlement for all aspects of the Middle East conflict—first and foremost, the Palestinian problem—is in full conformity with the principles and purposes of the Charter of the United Nations and the legitimate needs of its States Members and of the peoples of the region and of the entire world.

276. For its part, Romania is determined, now and in the future, to make its own contribution to finding a comprehensive and lasting solution to the problems of the Middle East, to the establishment of a just peace in the region and to the consolidation of peace, security and international co-operation.

277. Mr. ADENIJI (Nigeria): Only a few days ago, the United Nations observed the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, a day on which we all reflected on the plight of the Palestinians in their just and prolonged struggle for self-determination. The observance of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People in various capitals of the world, including mine, not only underscored the concern of the world over their tragic situation but also the need for concerted international action aimed at resolving the crisis with a great sense of urgency.

278. On that solemn occasion—the observance of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People—my Head of State, in his message, took the opportunity to:

> "reassure the people of Palestine that Nigeria will continue to exert the utmost efforts within the international community aimed at achieving a comprehensive, just and equitable solution of the Middle East problem, which will restore and guarantee their sovereign right".

279. The question of Palestine has occupied a prominent position in the agenda and deliberations of the United Nations since its inception. This demonstrates the crucial nature of the crisis in the Middle East, where human rights and justifiable claims to self-determination are consistently and flagrantly denied in spite of continuous international efforts to resolve the crisis.

280. My delegation has read with considerable interest the report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People [A/39/35]. We appreciate the Committee's efforts to assist in finding a solution to the prolonged crisis. We note with regret that Israel has continued to establish more settlements in the occupied territories, aimed at making its hold on those territories irreversible. Obviously, Israeli policies in those territories do have negative effects on the Palestinians. They include restrictions on their possession of cultivable land and water resources and, indeed, the wholesale expulsion and confiscation of their land. Those measures, we believe, exacerbate an already explosive situation and can only make solution much more difficult. The right to self-determination is one to which the Palestinians are entitled. It is a right recognized by the United Nations as being inalienable. Israel cannot therefore expect the international community to remain unconcerned and not support the struggle of the Palestinians.

281. Israel has persistently refused to accept that the resolve of the Palestinians to establish their own homeland—as the Israelis themselves have done—cannot be thwarted by military force. This is amply proved by the fact that, in spite of Israel's military aggression, demonstrated by the two invasions of Lebanon, the latter of which led to the horrifying massacre of innocent Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatila camps, Palestinians continue to fight for their inalienable rights without let-up.

282. Certainly, force has never provided a lasting solution to any problem. As the Nigerian Minister for External Affairs stated in the Assembly on 8 October:

> "The international community has in the recent past witnessed the futility of attempting to find a military solution or of imposing a lopsided super-Power solution to the Middle East problem. The invasion of Lebanon by Israel in 1982 and the tragic failure of the ill-advised mission of the so-called multinational force in Lebanon are both classic examples of the limits to the use of military power.
> "The solution lies in a negotiated peace, a peace that is just, equitable and fair, a peace that recognizes the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination, to return to their homeland and to establish their own independent State in Palestine." [25th meeting, paras. 122 and 123.]

283. Along these lines, my delegation would like to re-emphasize its support for General Assembly resolution 38/79 C, which demands that the Government of Israel desist from taking any action that would alter the legal status, geographical nature or demographic composition of the occupied territories. We call upon Israel to withdraw immediately all its troops from Arab territories. That would be a step in the right direction towards achieving lasting peace in the region.

284. After years of neglect of the indispensable role of the Palestinians in the Middle East equation, in recent years the United Nations has demonstrated, by the adoption of numerous General Assembly and Security Council resolutions, its determination to resolve the Palestinian question, which, we believe, is the core of the Middle East crisis. Indeed, it was in pursuance of this worthy objective that the International Conference on the Question of Palestine was convened, in 1983, at which the Geneva Declaration on Palestine was adopted.[3]

285. While I do not intend to go into the details of that Declaration, I feel obliged to emphasize a crucial point that must be taken into consideration in any attempt to resolve the situation, namely, the right of the PLO, the authentic representative of the Palestinians, to participate in all deliberations on the Middle East on an equal footing with other parties. We firmly believe that, to achieve a lasting solution, all the parties involved must demonstrate a willingness to negotiate with each other.

286. It is in this spirit that my delegation commends the Secretary-General's efforts to initiate preparations to convene an international peace conference on the Middle East in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 38/58 C. We regret that his efforts so far have not yielded positive results owing to the reluctance of two countries whose participation in such a conference is crucial. We believe that such a conference, with the participation of Israel, the United States, the Soviet Union, the PLO and other parties involved, would pave the way for a genuine effort to resolve the Middle East crisis peacefully. We therefore call on all Members of the United Nations to give serious thought to the recommendation of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People that international action should concentrate on preparations for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East. We urge all Members, including Israel and the United States, to lend their support to the efforts of the United Nations towards a just and durable solution of the Palestinian question and therefore of the Middle East question in general.

287. Mr. MIZERE (Malawi): The question of Palestine is characterized by considerable human suffering, deep-rooted political differences, complex and diverse approaches to the dispute, armed conflicts or wars and elements of tension likely to threaten peace and security in the region.

288. In practical terms, the question of Palestine has, in my delegation's view, assumed three major dimensions: namely, the existence and suffering of the Palestine refugees; the political dilemma, which has evaded solution for many years; and the military aspect, so that the States in the region in particular and other influential States in general have a direct interest in the outcome of any series of negotiations or consultations or armed conflicts.

289. It is my delegation's intention not to live in the past but to learn from history if we are to appreciate fully the current political predicament faced by all parties to the dispute, which is reflected in the prevailing bedevilled relations, suspicion and uncertainty.

290. A look at the history of armed conflicts demonstrates that human suffering and human consciousness must always be remembered by the world community if it is to promote peaceful coexistence and prevent human tragedies. There is history in the conduct and behaviour of human societies. Any observer who believes that some human beings have no history worth mentioning assumes that there is no humanity worth defending.

291. It is on this basis that my delegation wishes to refer to several wars that have left scars of bitterness and suspicion in the Middle East, such as the wars of 1948, 1967 and 1973, coupled with intermittent armed conflicts or raids, which resulted and continue to result in substantial human suffering, loss of human life and indescribable destruction of personal property and economic infrastructures.

292. In order to arrest this sad state of affairs and in an endeavour to find a peaceful settlement of the dispute, several Middle East initiatives have been undertaken, and I would like to mention some of the major ones.

293. The first of these initiatives was the negotiations leading to the Camp David accords, signed by Israel and Egypt, under the chairmanship of the former President of the United States, Mr. Carter. Under those accords, it will be recalled, Sinai was returned to Egypt but the West Bank of the Jordan, the Gaza Strip, a part of Jerusalem and the Golan Heights remained occupied by Israel.

294. The second initiative was announced on 1 September 1982 by President Reagan of the United States,[7] and its content is well known to members of the Assembly.

295. The third initiative was the plan adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference.[4]

296. The fourth initiative was taken by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983, when the Conference recognized, in the Geneva Declaration on Palestine, that the question of Palestine

> "requires a comprehensive, just and lasting political settlement. This settlement must be based on the implementation of the relevant United Nations resolutions concerning the question of Palestine and the attainment of the legitimate, inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to self-determination and the right to the establishment of its own independent State in Palestine, and should also be based on the provision by the Security Council of guarantees for peace and security among all States in the region, including the independent Palestinian State, within secure and internationally recognized boundaries."[9]

297. In his report on the situation in the Middle East [A/39/600], the Secretary-General has pointed out that a comprehensive settlement of the dispute would have to involve the withdrawal of the Israeli forces from occupied territories; respect for and acknowledgement of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of all States in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries, free from threats or acts of force; and a just settlement of the Palestinian problem based on recognition of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, including the right of self-determination. He also said that the question of Jerusalem remains of primary importance.

298. It is against this background that many resolutions have been adopted by the Security Council and the General Assembly in the past, coupled with other resolutions adopted in various international forums. Unfortunately, a political solution to this problem has not yet been achieved, largely because of practical difficulties and procedural reservations in regard to one key issue: namely, the need to reconcile self-determination and the establishment of an independent State for the Palestinians with recognition of Israel as a State within secure and internationally recognized borders. This is the kernel of the problem.

299. I should like at this stage to point out that my delegation's position with regard to the Arab-Israeli conflict is guided by several principles. First, Malawi believes that Israel has the right to exist as a sovereign State and to live within secure borders, and at the same time it supports the principle of self-determination for the Palestinian people. Secondly, Malawi opposes the use of force or violence to settle the problems pertaining to the question of Palestine. Thirdly, my delegation reiterates that the Government of the Republic of Malawi believes that a meaningful and lasting solution can be achieved only through the full participation of all the parties in the search for it.

300. In conclusion, my delegation wishes to take this opportunity to appeal to all parties involved for restraint where revenge is dictated, for compromise where peace and security are threatened, for forgiveness where human mistakes have inadvertently been made, for reconciliation where animosity rules, for contact and dialogue where isolation is the order of the day, and for constructive involvement where ideological differences separate the super-Powers.

301. Geographically, Malawi is separated from the Middle East, but distance in time or space will not be allowed to dim its burning desire for a peaceful settlement of the question of Palestine.

Programme of Work

302. The PRESIDENT: I should like to inform the Assembly that I have received two additional formal requests to extend the deadline for the submission to the Fifth Committee of all draft resolutions with programme budget implications. The Chairmen of the Special Political Committee and the Second Committee have requested an extension until 10 December in connection with agenda item 74, as well as items 12, 80 and 82 respectively.

303. May I take it that it is the wish of the Assembly to extend the deadlines accordingly?

It was so decided.

The meeting rose at 7 p.m.

92nd
PLENARY MEETING

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

AGENDA ITEM 33

Question of Palestine (continued)

(b) Report of the Secretary-General

1. Mr. ORAMAS OLIVA (Cuba) (interpretation from Spanish): The frustration which we feel at the fact that a further year has elapsed without our having been able to make any progress towards a solution of the Palestinian problem should serve as an incentive to all Member States of the United Nations to redouble our efforts to put an end to the untold sufferings of this heroic people.

2. Israel, whose sons themselves suffered physically the harsh and cruel misdeeds of fascism, has now itself become a causer of victims rather than a victim, driving the Palestinians from their land and depriving them of their most elementary rights.

3. Nevertheless, although the Palestinians are forced to live as wanderers, they have not been overcome. They maintain at the highest level their traditional spirit of combat, which will lead them to struggle to the last man for their liberty and independence.

4. The courage and tenacity that have been demonstrated in the decades-long struggle under the leadership of their spokesman, the Palestine Liberation Organization [PLO], against Zionist oppression have been combined by the Palestine people with a desire to seek a negotiated solution to the Palestinian question.

5. In this sense, it is worth recalling that any solution to the problems of the region will necessarily have to involve the restoration of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to establish their own State; the withdrawal of Israel from the occupied Arab territories, including the Holy City of Jerusalem; the cessation of all acts of hostility against Arab States and the Palestinian people; and mutual recognition of the right of all States in the region to exist in peace.

6. An appropriate negotiating framework would be provided by the convening of an international conference on the Middle East, with the participation of all the parties involved, naturally including the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, and of other States concerned, such as the Soviet Union and the United States.

7. Unfortunately, as is reflected in the report of the Secretary-General [A/39/130 and Add.1], the Governments of Israel and the United States have refused to participate in that conference.

8. In line with its aggressive, expansionist policy, the Government of Israel obstinately rejects any proposal for negotiations, irrespective of the form it may take. It also disregards the national identity and the rights of the Palestinian people and persists in repression, the settlements policy and its plans to annex the occupied Arab territories.

9. Furthermore, the intransigent attitude of Israel and its protective partner, the United States, has prevented compliance with the will of the international community as expressed in many resolutions of the United Nations.

10. This unconditional support of Israel by American imperialism, which includes the abuse of the privilege it enjoys under the Charter of the United Nations as a permanent member of the Security Council, is explained solely by the desire to defend its strategic interests in the region.

11. This brazen collusion was clearly seen in the strategic agreements concluded between Washington and Tel Aviv, which very soon resulted in the invasion and occupation of southern Lebanon.

12. In the mean time, both partners are bent on their policy aimed at the conclusion of separate agreements along the lines of the Camp David accords or of the agreement which patriotic resistance thwarted in Lebanon.

13. This type of agreement, which was condemned at the Meeting of Ministers and Heads of Delegation of Non-Aligned Countries to the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly, held in New York from 1 to 5 October 1984, does not resolve the fundamental problem of the Middle East conflict, namely, the question of Palestine; it ignores the role which the United Nations must play in the solution of that problem and is designed to destroy the unity and capacity for resistance of the Arab nation.

14. This shows how the imperialist policy in the Middle East subordinates the imperialists' alleged friendship with the Arabs to the interests of Israel. This betrayal, as more than one speaker has mentioned, shows once again that the present American Administration does not hesitate to disregard commitments entered into with its alleged allies and acts in defence of what best assures its strategic interests.

15. The international community must therefore bring all its influence to bear to make sure that Israel and the United States comply with their international obligations and are convinced that peace will not be obtained through separate agreements but, rather, through a comprehensive solution under the auspices of the United Nations.

16. In the message addressed to Mr. Massamba Sarré, Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, the President of the Council of State and Government of the Republic of Cuba, Fidel Castro, said:

> "In a situation characterized by the aggressive policy of imperialism, consisting in the continuous use of force and in intervention and interference in the internal affairs of other States and exacerbated by the danger posed by the extension of armed conflict, the international community, in particular the United Nations, must adopt effective measures aimed at reaching a settlement of existing crises and preventing the emergence of new ones. In this context, the Middle East crisis deserves priority attention, given the magnitude of the danger it poses to international peace and security."

17. Our country, which has always backed the heroic struggle of the Arab and Palestinian peoples against imperialism and zionism, will spare no efforts to bring about a comprehensive solution leading to the restoration of justice and peace in the region.

18. We would not wish to conclude without emphasizing the efforts made by the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and affirming our support for the recommendations in its report to the General Assembly [A/39/35] and for the draft resolutions which have been submitted on the item.

19. We reaffirm our whole-hearted support for the Palestinian combatants and their sole legitimate representative, the PLO.

20. The unity of all Arab forces in facing the true common enemy has never been more necessary.

21. Mr. AL-SHAALI (United Arab Emirates) (interpretation from Arabic): It gives me pleasure at the outset to convey our thanks to Mr. Massamba Sarré, Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, and to the other members of the Committee on their lucid, objective and positive report [ibid.]. We appreciate the efforts made to discharge the mandate of the Committee and to follow closely events and developments on the question of Palestine.

22. The report of the Committee has covered basic aspects of that question, in particular those pertaining to Israeli policies and practices which prevent the exercise of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people. The Committee has also reported on the efforts being made within the United Nations system to put an end to those Israeli policies and practices.

23. During the past weeks of this session of the General Assembly we have examined a great many matters relating to the question of the Middle East which are closely connected to the question of Palestine. One may observe that such connections are continuously increasing, and if that fact sheds light on anything, it is that the question of Palestine is the origin and crux of the Middle East conflict. It also makes it clear that failure to settle this problem must, as in the past, have a negative effect on other problems and thus lead to a continuation and an exacerbation of tension.

24. The ongoing tragedy gives expression to the injustice and oppression inflicted upon the Palestinian people, who are driven from their country and denied their basic inalienable rights to live in peace in an independent homeland, as do the rest of the peoples of the earth. It also gives expression to the unjust attacks led by some world Powers against the Arab nation, seeking to infringe its dignity and independence. However, the continuation of the tragedy also gives rise to two basic phenomena. The first phenomenon is the fact that the people of Palestine, as a matter of principle, stick to their land and refuse attempts to obliterate their national identity. They stick to their inalienable rights and continue to resist the fiercest war machine, supported by the greatest political and economic Power. The second phenomenon is the fact that the Palestinian Arab nation refuses to compromise its independence and adheres to its basic principle of rejecting injustice and aggression.

25. The question of Palestine has become an international criterion by which to categorize world Powers and distinguish the forces of justice, right and peace from those of injustice and aggression.

26. Experience teaches us that Israel is a State based on aggression and the logic of power and that it has rejected any peaceful solution because peace is diametrically opposed to the Zionist doctrine on which Israeli society is built, a militaristic society which receives the basics of its life from abroad. That is why Israel has rejected every peace initiative made, as well as all the resolutions and initiatives of the United Nations. This confirms that Israel has no desire for or need of peace. Its position is based on racist Zionist convictions and depends on its war machine, supported by the United States.

27. That is why, during the forty years that the conflict has lasted,, we have not once heard Israel state clearly that it accepts peace as a possible alternative. All that we hear is the traditional talk about the "security of Israel". What is security for Israel? What are the borders of that security?

28. Are they the borders defined by General Assembly resolution 181 (II) of 29 November 1947, which established the State of Israel? Israel has gone beyond those borders and seized territories that are many times bigger than the area allocated to it by that resolution. Or are the borders of Israeli security those defined by Zionist doctrine—from the Euphrates to the Nile?

29. Is there any delegation in this Hall that can explain to us what are the borders of the "security of Israel"?

30. The Arabs made their situation clear in the Arab peace plan adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference.[1]

31. The United States defined its position in the Reagan initiative of 1 September 1982.[2]

32. The Soviet Union defined its position in the initiative of former President Brezhnev on 15 September 1982,[3] as well as in its proposals of 29 July 1984 [see A/39/368].

33. The international community has also defined its position, through General Assembly resolution 38/58 C, which provides for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East. Israel has rejected all these initiatives. What, then, is Israel's alternative?

34. In the General Assembly we need someone to clarify to us what Israel wants, what its official position is, practically and realistically, with regard to the peace process in the Middle East.

35. In his book Thorns in Your Eyes, the Knesset member Meir Kahane expressed the Zionist opinion when he said: "The Jews have owned the land of Palestine. They gave it their name; therefore, it became Eretz Yisrael." He adds that the Palestinians have no right to that land because the land does not give its name to a people. Rather, it is the people that gives its name to the land—in Kahane's opinion. At the beginning of the session of the Knesset, the so-called Israeli Parliament, Kahane submitted two draft laws on citizenship which contained the principles set forth in his book, of which eight are the most important.

36. The first principle, according to Kahane, is that the Jewish people have the right to reside in Palestine as their State. Non-Jews, if they want to live in Israel, have to live as non-citizens with no political rights and in limited numbers.

37. The second basic principle concerns leaving Palestine: the Palestinians may, if they wish, emigrate to Arab States or to any other State. He believes that Arab States should give grants to Palestinians who choose to leave their land.

38. The third basic principle is that Palestinians who refuse to leave must declare in writing their loyalty to Israel, with a recognition of the fact that Palestine is the "land of the Jewish people". In addition, all Jews have an absolute right, in Kahane's eyes, to come to Palestine.

39. The fourth principle is that Arabs who refuse to leave or to accept the above-mentioned principles have, according to Kahane, to be forcibly expelled, without any compensation.

40. Kahane's fifth basic principle is that Arabs who take the oath of loyalty to the Jewish State can be expelled if ever a security charge is made against them. Kahane believes that imprisonment is not sufficient punishment: they must be expelled from the country.

41. Kahane's sixth basic principle is that all the Jews of the world are called upon to provide the necessary funds for Jews leaving their countries to go to Palestine.

42. The seventh principle is that "non-Jewish" inhabitants, on reaching the age of 18, must do compulsory work for three years, after which they must do compulsory work for one month a year. No Arab should be accepted by a university unless he takes an oath of loyalty to the Jewish State.

43. The eighth principle, according to Kahane, is that Arabs living in Palestine should pay all the taxes. It is abundantly clear that the ideas Kahane submitted to the Israeli Knesset are very similar to those on which the law on citizenship of the German Reich submitted by Hitler to the Reichstag in 1935 was based.

44. History has taught us that there have been many attempts to impede the long march towards progress, justice and equality. Among these we recall the Mogul invasion of western Asia and eastern Europe, the crusades against the Arab east, the racist Nazi movement and, finally, European colonization.

45. All these invasions, all these movements, all these theories went against the tide of history. That is why they were repelled. However, there are two political phenomena connected with the concepts of nazism and colonialism. These are the racist Zionist movement in Palestine and the apartheid movement in South Africa, which explains their attachment to each other and to their western origins.

46. On the basis of historical experience, we are confident that these movements and concepts will fade into oblivion.

47. We are confident that the media do not create civilization, that guns do not plant wheat and that racism is incompatible with human dignity. We are confident that the difficult conditions prevailing in the Middle East are merely transitory and that that region, which has given the world most of its civilized heritage, will recover its natural role in civilization.

48. The position of the United Arab Emirates is that any State that gives aid to Israel, either directly or indirectly, is a partner in Israel's crimes.

49. We believe that any initiatives, solutions or proposals that do not take into account the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people and lead to the exercise of those rights, which include the right to return to their homeland and to establish their own independent State on their national soil, under the leadership of their sole legitimate representative, the PLO, cannot provide a solid basis for a just and lasting solution to the question of Palestine.

50. Mr. MOUSHOUTAS (Cyprus): The tragedy of Palestine, the agony, the suffering and the unending injustice inflicted on the Palestinian people have been the subject of debate in the General Assembly for over three decades, ever since the inception of the United Nations. During this period, the membership of the United Nations has increased threefold and the principle of self-determination has been repeatedly vindicated and upheld, so that the process of decolonization is nearly completed. Yet, while so many of us have gained our independence and have been able to take our places here in the Assembly as sovereign independent States, the people of Palestine have yet to take their rightful place among us.

51. The stand of Cyprus on the question of Palestine is based on principle and is consistent. Our position stems from our firm belief in the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations; it is founded on an enduring commitment to the cause of oppressed peoples all over the world struggling to free themselves from the bondage of colonialism, aggression and exploitation.

52. The question of Palestine involves the life and the existence, the rights and the homeland of the Palestinian people.

53. Five million Palestinians remain deprived of the most elementary human rights. More than half of them live in other States of the world and some live as refugees in their own country.

54. The question of Palestine is a political problem. It concerns the struggle of the people for their inalienable national right to determine their own destiny. It is to be regretted that, despite the total and unflinching support extended by the majority of the international community, the aspirations of the Palestinian people have not yet been realized.

55. General Assembly resolution 3236 (XXIX) clearly spells out the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to self-determination, national independence and sovereignty and their right to return to the homes and property from which they have been forcibly evicted. That resolution also assures the right of the Palestinian people to present their own cause and participate in any peace negotiations through their sole, legitimate representative, the PLO.

56. At the outset of my statement today I referred to the fact that the question of Palestine was born after the establishment of the United Nations itself and has been a perennial item on its agenda since 1947. If we look at the negative side, we must say that the world Organization is unable to impose and implement its resolutions, achieve its objectives and fulfil the promises made to the peoples of the world. Looking at the positive side, one must emphasize the long period of time devoted by the United Nations to the discussion of the question of Palestine, a fact which clearly reflects the immense concern of the international community and its desire to bring to an end the suffering of the much-tormented Palestinian people. It also reflects the concern of the United Nations about the situation in the Middle East, where the question of Palestine forms the core of the conflict, a dangerous situation threatening the peace and security of the entire world. This persistence and this effort on the part of the international community and the United Nations to bring about a just solution of the question of Palestine deserve the greatest appreciation and interest.

57. We believe that any process intended to bring lasting peace to the Middle East which overlooks the Palestinian issue in its national aspect and its threefold claim of the right to return, the right to self-determination and the right to independence will not bring forth positive results but, on the contrary, will have pernicious consequences in both the short and long term. It is our duty to follow the Charter of the United Nations and the principles of right and justice with regard to the pressing question of Palestine and the rights of the Palestinian people. Any straying from these principles would lead to the further undermining of the precepts of the United Nations and would contribute to loss of hope that finally peace and security can be restored to the region and to the world.

58. We wish to remind the Assembly that justice and right offer the only road to permanent peace and that straying from the path of peace will only cause a deterioration of the situation and increase exposure to the greatest dangers.

59. The non-aligned countries, including my own, have been faithfully and resolutely supporting the Palestinian struggle. We maintain that the solution for the Palestinian question should be sought within the United Nations framework and on the basis of Security Council and General Assembly resolutions and decisions.

60. We feel that, in these trying days for the Palestinian people, it is necessary for the United Nations and the entire international community to intensify their efforts and take every measure to implement the decisions of the Security Council on the question of Palestine.

61. The Palestinian people, by their long struggle, have given a striking demonstration that a people seeking freedom, self-determination and independence will not remain alone and that those fighting for freedom are stronger than those imposing domination. It is hoped that at this late hour this cardinal truth will be realized by all and that peace and justice will finally be achieved for the friendly, neighbouring and much-tormented people of Palestine.

62. The PRESIDENT: I call on the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, Mr. Massamba Sarré, to introduce draft resolutions A/39/L.37 to L.40.

63. Mr. SARRÉ (Senegal), Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People (interpretation from French): In the light of the very responsible debate we have had here, on the one hand, and the reports of the Secretary-General and the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, on the other, the Committee would like to submit to the General Assembly for its consideration four draft resolutions [A/39/L.37 to L.40]. As representatives have noticed, the debate, like the accompanying reports, is both responsible and constructive. We have discerned a political will and an unreserved commitment to settle by peaceful means, as called for by the Charter of the United Nations, the Israeli-Arab conflict, which has been at the forefront of the international scene for some 40 years. On the basis of this rather encouraging sign, the draft resolutions before the Assembly emphasize the ways and means of achieving that noble objective, which should be the major concern of each and every State Member of the United Nations.

64. Draft resolution A/39/L.37 deals with the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. In renewing that Committee's mandate, the Assembly would also request it to continue its efforts to promote the implementation of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, which are the prerequisite for the restoration of peace and stability in the Middle East. The Committee is also requested to make suggestions and recommendations both to the General Assembly and to the Security Council within the context of a peaceful settlement of the Palestinian question. Furthermore, the Committee is called upon to co-operate with non-governmental organizations, which continue to play an important part in dealing with this crisis.

65. Draft resolution A/39/L.38 notes with appreciation the measures taken by the Secretary-General to enhance the effectiveness of the Division for Palestinian Rights of the Secretariat in conjunction with the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat. It invites Governments and organizations to lend their co-operation to the Committee, and it welcomes the action taken by Member States to observe annually, on 29 November, the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People.

66. Draft resolution A/39/L.39 deals with the Department of Public Information, which has done a remarkable piece of objective work to acquaint the world better with the rights of the Palestinian people. The Department is called upon to continue those efforts and intensify them, particularly by the organization of regional and national encounters for journalists.

67. Draft resolution A/39/L.40—which is the most important part of our work—deals with the international peace conference on the Middle East. As representatives know, after a number of years of thought and various approaches, the international community now realizes that the best way—indeed, the only way—to settle the question of the Middle East is to organize an international conference involving the participation of all the parties concerned, as well as the Security Council in its capacity as the guarantor of international peace and security. Nothing should stand in the way of the convening of such a conference, provided that the rights and concerns of all the interested parties are safeguarded. Nothing should stand in its way because the right to existence of all States in the region is already a principle acknowledged by us all, ever since the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva from 29 August to 7 September 1983.

68. It has been amply demonstrated in the case of the Israeli-Arab conflict, as in many similar cases, that the use of force was the worst possible way to try to settle a dispute; on the contrary, it tended to complicate it even further. Genuine peace can be found only around the negotiating table, and our duty is to encourage the parties to do this. Draft resolution A/39/L.40, while noting the report of the Secretary-General [A/39/130 and Add.1], reaffirms the idea of convening such a conference. While deploring the attitude of two Governments—the first as a directly concerned party and the second as a member of the Security Council—the draft resolution calls upon them to reconsider their position. It also requests the Secretary-General to continue his efforts and urges Governments to make additional constructive efforts to convene the conference.

69. Criticisms, recriminations and a spirit of confrontation are not found in these draft resolutions. The Committee wanted them to be constructive, while taking account of international realities. In adopting them, the Assembly will have taken an important and decisive step towards the consolidation of international peace and security. By assisting in their speedy implementation, the States Members of the United Nations will have remained faithful to the Charter, by promoting peace and understanding among States and peoples.

70. Peace is beckoning; together, let us heed this call by adopting these draft resolutions with the solemn commitment to implement them without delay.

71. Mr. MOHIUDDIN (Bangladesh): The Assembly is once again considering the question of Palestine. Another year has passed, but this crucial problem still remains unresolved. It has been over a year since the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva from 29 August to 7 September 1983, adopted the Geneva Declaration on Palestine[4] and the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights,[4] aimed at the successful resolution of the long-standing problem. It is with deep anguish and frustration that my delegation notes the apparent lack of progress during the preceding months. In fact, the situation has steadily deteriorated, and Israel during recent months has intensified its ruthless attempts to liquidate the Palestinian people and their sole and legitimate representative, the PLO. The Israeli policy of aggression, occupation and expansion has further aggravated an already explosive situation in the region, thereby threatening international peace and security. The question of Palestine, therefore, should be considered by this world body in its proper perspective as one of the utmost importance.

72. We have before us the latest report of the Secretary-General [ibid.] and the report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People [A/39/35]. The reports are, as usual, balanced and objective. My delegation would like to put on record its deep gratitude to the Secretary-General and to the Chairman and other members of the Committee for their sincere endeavours and untiring efforts in the cause of Palestine.

73. My delegation has always emphasized that the question of Palestine is at the core of the problem of the Middle East and that it is not possible to envisage a settlement of the problems in the Middle East unless the legitimate and inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people are fully restored. We are equally convinced that any international effort to bring peace to the region must be based on a comprehensive solution of the problem. It was in this context that the President of Bangladesh, Lieutenant-General Hossain Mohammad Ershad, in his message on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, on 29 November 1984, stated:

> "The Government and the people of Bangladesh once again join with the international community in reiterating full and unswerving support to our Palestinian brethren in their just struggle for independence and the realization of their inalienable and legitimate right to establish a State of their own in their homeland, under the leadership of the Palestine Liberation Organization, their sole and legitimate representative, with Jerusalem as their capital.
> "The question of Palestine is at the heart of the Middle East problem. It is a major challenge to the credibility of the international community in its efforts to uphold the principles and objectives enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations. No other problem has evoked so much thought and unleashed such a high degree of indignation in recent times as this issue—the tragedy of a dispossessed nation.
> "The political entity of the Palestinian people and their right to establish a State of their own in their homeland is an established fact under international law and jurisprudence. To ignore this fact would be to discount a reality recognized by an overwhelming majority of the world's nation-States. The recognition of the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and to the establishment of a State of their own must be the fundamental element of any durable and lasting peace in the Middle East. Bangladesh has always taken a keen interest in and endeavoured to uphold the just cause of the Palestinian people in all international forums, especially the United Nations. From the very outset, Bangladesh has actively advocated the establishment of the rights of the Palestinian people as a nation."

74. Preceding speakers have already given an elaborate and graphic account of the volatile and explosive situation prevailing in the Middle East region today. They have also dwelt at length on how Israel, since its creation, has been pursuing a policy of relentless expansion and occupation directed against its Arab neighbours with a view to changing the Arab and Palestinian character of the occupied territories. Thousands of innocent people—men, women and children—have been massacred, but the Palestinian people have once again demonstrated that they cannot be subjugated by violence and that their inalienable rights cannot be denied to them. It is a universally recognized fact that the question of Palestine is a political problem involving the right of people to national self-determination and their right to return to their homes and property from which they were forcibly evicted. The political entity of the Palestinian people and their right to establish a State of their own in their homeland is an established fact under international law and jurisprudence. The General Assembly, after a great deal of deliberation, accepted this fact a decade ago, and it has been repeatedly reaffirmed at all its succeeding sessions. The International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva last year, also recognized this reality and adopted a comprehensive Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights.

75. Bangladesh's position on the question of Palestine stems from our firm belief in the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and our deep commitment to the cause of oppressed peoples all over the world waging a just struggle to free themselves from the bondage of imperialism, colonialism and racism. We firmly adhere to General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), containing the historic Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Bangladesh has repeatedly reaffirmed the right of all people to self-determination, freedom and independence, and our position on the question of Palestine has been based on the following four points: first, the question of Palestine is at the core of the problem of the Middle East and, consequently, it is not possible to envisage a solution of that problem unless one takes into account the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people; secondly, the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to return to their homes and to achieve self-determination, independence and national sovereignty must be realized and there must be genuine and greater understanding of the just cause of the Palestinian people; thirdly, the participation of the PLO, the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, on an equal footing with all the other parties, on the basis of relevant General Assembly resolutions, is indispensable; and fourthly, the acquisition of territories by force is inadmissible, and Israel must totally withdraw from all occupied Arab and Palestinian territories.

76. In the recent past, the United Nations has undertaken various efforts to bring justice to the Palestinian and Arab peoples, but these have been arrogantly and deliberately rejected by Israel, which openly flouts the decisions of the international community. Despite the numerous resolutions adopted by the General Assembly and the Security Council, Israel has refused to vacate the occupied Arab and Palestinian territories. The developments in the Middle East during the past four decades have clearly emphasized the need for concerted international action, under the auspices of the United Nations, with a view to evolving a just, viable and lasting settlement of the problem. My delegation, therefore, attaches particular importance to the early convening of the proposed international conference on peace in the Middle East. We fully appreciate the Secretary-General's current initiative to that end and support his views, as stated in his report on the situation in the Middle East:

> "a comprehensive settlement will have to be reached, at least in its final stage, if not earlier, through a process of negotiation in which all the parties concerned will participate. In addition, it is generally recognized that the support of the major Powers, especially the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States of America, is essential for any lasting settlement in the Middle East. From a purely rational point of view, all these requirements could best and most readily be met if negotiations were undertaken under some form of United Nations auspices." [See A/39/600, para. 39.]

77. My delegation fully supports the Arab peace plan, adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference,[1] as a sound basis for a comprehensive solution of the problem, and other plans which have been submitted by various parties are already before the international community. A particularly heavy responsibility rests with the permanent members of the Security Council. It is our earnest hope that, on the eve of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations, a greater and more determined effort will be undertaken to resolve the question of Palestine, on the basis of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, with a view to restoring, finally, peace in the Middle East.

78. Mr. KABANDA (Rwanda) (interpretation from French): Today, 10 December, we commemorate the thirty-sixth anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. I ask the following question: What is the situation with respect to the rights of the Palestinian people? The reply is certainly disheartening, for, since 1956—that is, since the Palestinian resistance began to organize in order to press for its rights to self-determination, to sovereignty and to a homeland—things have not changed. On the contrary, as the years have gone by we have witnessed only a progressive hardening of the Israeli attitude, on the one hand, and a sort of plot to liquidate the Palestinian people's struggle, on the other.

79. The facts speak for themselves. In the land of Palestine, and the occupied territories in particular, in order to install its own citizens, Israel has deported Palestinians from their homes to inhospitable places, thereby splitting up families and destroying the remnants of their history and culture. Thus, the identity of the Palestinian people is being gradually threatened with annihilation because of this ongoing settlement operation, which has been of concern to the General Assembly and the very principle of which has been condemned by the international community.

80. The Palestinian refugee camps in the occupied territories are constantly harassed. Those Palestinian refugees who have found sanctuary in neighbouring Arab lands are pursued by the Israeli army or commandos, if they are not savagely massacred—and we all remember the horrible events in 1982 in the Sabra and Shatila camps in Lebanon, that other Arab country which is in part occupied by the Israeli army. The Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949,[5] must be respected by Israel in the occupied territories.

81. Without land and without respite even where it has found refuge, the Palestinian people is condemned to the status of virtual nomads. The memory is still fresh in our minds of the exodus from Lebanon of thousands of Palestinians, evacuated in order to remove them from the battlefield. It is indeed an unhappy fate that has been meted out to the Palestinian people, which is only seeking, like all other peoples of the world, to exercise its right to self-determination in its own land, Palestine, in order to be able to set up there the political institutions of its choice and to live in peace.

82. There appears to be a wide-reaching conspiracy to liquidate the Palestinian resistance, of which the PLO is the spearhead. The purpose of this conspiracy is perfectly clear: to make us forget the Palestine problem. Many methods are used for this purpose, including the sowing of internal dissension within the resistance, in accordance with the old saw of "divide and rule".

83. All the efforts to preserve solidarity within the Palestinian resistance should be supported, because if we were to allow ourselves to be outmanoeuvred by internal or external conspiracies against the resistance, we should be playing into the hands of those who fish in troubled waters, and the noble struggle of the Palestinians—noble because it is just—would simply cease because there would no longer be anyone to wage it. That would be tragic for a people that seeks only to enjoy its fundamental, sovereign rights on its own land, like all peoples of the world.

84. The struggle of the Palestinian people is also the struggle of all those who believe in the right of peoples to self-determination and sovereignty. Hence, it is our struggle. That is why I take this opportunity to express again the total support of the Government of Rwanda for the PLO, the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. In this connection, I wish to recall the statement made from this rostrum by Mr. François Ngarukiyintwali, Minister for Foreign Affairs and Co-operation of Rwanda, on 9 October last:

> "The rejection of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, the occupation of Arab territories, the annexation of the Holy City of Jerusalem, an aggressive policy in constant defiance of the principles of international law—these are some aspects of a continuing crisis which the United Nations constantly deplores, a crisis that is the responsibility of one State that has not drawn the lessons of its own history and has therefore become an implacable and unyielding enemy of a people fighting for the recognition of its most elementary and fundamental rights." [26th meeting, para. 45.]

85. But, after all, where can we find the solution? In the total and prompt implementation of United Nations resolutions on the Palestine problem, which is the core of the Middle East problem as a whole. Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) are the foundation on which a solution to the problem must be based. Unfortunately, we cannot close our eyes to the fact that the parties concerned have taken exception to this. But not a single step towards a solution can be taken if some minimum common ground of agreement is not reached. These resolutions do contain the essential elements for a just and equitable solution. Hence, my delegation appeals to all the parties concerned to abide by them, each in its own specific sphere.

86. An international peace conference on the Middle East, the principle of which was proposed by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva last year, and endorsed by the General Assembly, would provide an appropriate framework for the discussion of all these problems, with the participation of all the parties concerned: Israel, the PLO and the Arab countries of the region. All the members of the Security Council should also participate in the conference.

87. This comprehensive approach will, it is to be hoped, make it possible to untangle the problem of the Middle East in general and that of Palestine in particular, for, unless that is done, the Middle East will remain a region of confrontation and instability. That is why the international community, despite the failures of the past, must continue its efforts to ensure the triumph of the principles in which it believes: recognition of, and respect for, the fundamental rights of the Palestinian people, including > "the right to its own homeland, in which it may establish the institutional and governmental structures of its own choice, with respect for . . . international law, under the auspices of its legitimate and authentic representatives" [ibid., para. 46]—that is, the PLO.

88. The reports of the Secretary-General and the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People are clear; they reveal very disturbing incidents and facts. My delegation endorses the recommendations of those reports and gives its full support to the four draft resolutions on the question of Palestine. We congratulate the Committee, and particularly its Chairman, the dynamic Ambassador of Senegal, Mr. Massamba Sarré.

89. Since most of what needs to be said has already been said, and a number of appeals have been made, in particular, to those countries that hold the key to solving the problem of the Middle East, I shall conclude now by adding Rwanda's urgent appeal to those already made, convinced that one day justice will be done to all the peoples of the Middle East, and particularly the Palestinian people.

90. Mr. CHAMORRO MORA (Nicaragua) (interpretation from Spanish): In our recent statements at the current session of the Assembly during the debates on apartheid and Namibia, my delegation has spoken of the blame attaching to the United States for the suffering of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia, because of its direct support for, and links with, the racist régime of South Africa. Today, as we face a similar situation in considering the question of Palestine, we cannot but state once again that it is the United States, with its strategic alliance with Israel, that is really responsible for the sufferings of the Palestinian people, which continues to be denied the right to its own State on its own soil.

91. In the final analysis, the suffering of the Palestinian people, the denial of its fundamental rights, the massacres of which it has been the victim throughout its history, are consequences of policies of force, of imperialist policies of the United States in the Middle East. Those policies form part of a whole, an integrated global policy based on the interests that the United States shares with its allies throughout the world. Among those allies we should mention in particular Israel in the Middle East; the Pretoria régime in southern Africa; and El Salvador and Honduras in Central America.

92. In its edition of 2 December, the American newspaper Los Angeles Times published an interview with the United States representative to the United Nations. Asked about the lessons she had learned from her experience at the United Nations with regard to attitudes to Israel, she said:

> "With regard to Israel, I actually did not know until I came to the United Nations about the scope and intensity of hostility toward that nation. It is extraordinary. I frankly had no idea of the degree to which the so-called moderate Arabs are willing to say, for example, pejorative things about the honour and legitimacy of Israel. Analogies between the Nazis and the Israelis are practically a daily affair at the United Nations. It happens all the time: accusations against Israel of genocide, contempt for the idea that there is law in Israel, that there is honour in Israel, or that there is any legitimacy about Israel. There is a willingness to believe anything about Israel, no matter how atrocious."

93. Mrs. Kirkpatrick is thus trying to give American public opinion the impression that the United Nations is taking up subjective positions unrelated to reality, unrelated to the true nature and behaviour of Israel, a view we do not share and cannot accept. The truth is that, unlike the vast majority of Members of the United Nations, the United States turns its back on and disregards the factual information about Israel, because that information is incompatible with its predetermined and decided policy of unconditional support for the Zionist régime. Here it is worth looking at some examples. Let us recall the massacres of Sabra and Shatila. Let us speak about human rights, where there is every kind of evidence of Israeli violations. In that respect, the report of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories [A/39/591] is more than conclusive. Because Israel has not co-operated with that Committee, much of the information in the report is based on exposés appearing in reports in the newspapers of Israel itself.

94. As a corollary to that, with respect to human rights, we must point out that that attitude of the United States is consistent with its overall policy of concealing and denying abuses by its friends and protegés in various regions of the world.

95. On 14 May of this year, in reply to a letter of 9 March from the Secretary-General to all members of the Security Council, my Government reiterated its full support for the holding of a peace conference on the Middle East [see A/39/259].

96. We wish to reiterate today our support for holding the conference under the auspices of the United Nations, with the participation on an equal footing of the PLO, the United States, the Soviet Union and other interested States, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 38/58 C.

97. In supporting the holding of the conference, Nicaragua again expresses its firm conviction that political solutions and not the use of force are the only way in which to resolve international conflicts, and that the United States and those that implement its policies must show the international community their acknowledgement of and respect for the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

98. Unfortunately, the convening of this conference has met with a series of obstacles, among which the attitude of the United States is an important factor, reflecting as it does a complete lack of understanding of those problems and of the ways of solving them. The United States does not wish to understand that the question of Palestine is at the core of the Middle East situation and that there will be no peace in that region of the world until a just and lasting solution is found, a solution which must be centred on the establishment of a Palestinian State in Palestine.

99. The present United States Administration, in keeping with its warmongering policy of seeking military solutions to problems, persists—as it does in Central America and in southern Africa—in erecting obstacles to and restraining serious efforts in the search for peace in the region. If this is not so and if our analysis is wrong, why, then, has the United States provided Israel with approximately $17 billion in military assistance since 1965, almost $3 billion last year alone? Why does the United States, a permanent member of the Security Council, veto that important body's resolutions in order to hinder, with respect to Israel, implementation of the principles and purposes of the Charter of the United Nations?

100. When speaking of the Palestinian people, we could expand at length on the long list of atrocities, suffering and death that people has suffered at the hands of zionism. We could speak of illegal settlements, massacres, torture, collective punishment and many other things. But there is one element that stands out: the displacement of an entire nation from its own land and homes, and the subsequent complete withdrawal of national rights from people who are considered foreigners in their own land.

101. That is why the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and to establish its own State on its own land and the right of the Palestinians to return to their homes are essential elements in the consideration of this problem. The international community cannot and must not close its eyes to this massive violation of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people. The members of the Security Council, particularly, must act in accordance with international commitments and struggle actively for the maintenance of peace and security in that vitally important area.

102. My delegation, which participates as an observer in the work of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, wishes to express its full support for the Committee's recommendations in its report [A/39/35] and its gratitude to Mr. Massamba Sarré, of Senegal, for the fine work the Committee has been doing under his chairmanship.

103. I could not conclude without reiterating the militant solidarity of the people and Government of Nicaragua with the Palestinian people and its sole legitimate representative, the PLO, which sooner rather than later, as the unquestionable vanguard movement of that heroic people, will lead it to final liberation.

104. We wish also to reiterate what we have said during past consideration of this question: that it is important to maintain the unity of the Arab nation and of the Palestinian people and its vanguard movement, the PLO. Failure to do this will benefit only the enemy of the Arab nation and the Palestinian people, that is, the United States and its allies in the region.

105. Our revolution, which also waged a victorious war of liberation against the same enemy and its allies, knows how important it is to preserve, at any cost, the unity of revolutionary forces, for that element played a decisive role in our final victory.

106. Moreover, it is important that we should not forget the lessons of history and remember that it was division among the revolutionary forces that led to the United States intervention, in its so-called "Operation Rescue", against the small island of Grenada barely one year ago.

107. Mr. TAHINDRO (Madagascar) (interpretation from French): For several years, it has been clear to the majority of the international community that the enjoyment by the Palestinian people of its inalienable rights is the sine qua non for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East. The following facts—also a matter of agreement among the international community—follow from that conclusion.

108. First, the question of Palestine is at the core of the Middle East problem; thus, no solution can be found unless it takes into account the legitimate, inalienable rights of the Palestinian people.

109. Secondly, the attainment by the Palestinian people of their inalienable rights to return to their homeland and to self-determination, independence and national sovereignty will help resolve the crisis in that region.

110. Thirdly, it is indispensable that the PLO, the sole and unique representative of the Palestinian people, should participate in all efforts, deliberations and conferences on the Middle East, on an equal footing with all the other parties, in keeping with General Assembly resolutions 3236 (XXIX) and 3375 (XXX).

111. Fourthly, the acquisition of territory by force is impermissible. It is thus imperative that Israel must withdraw unconditionally from all occupied Palestinian Arab territories, including Jerusalem.

112. These views have been constantly stated by such intergovernmental organizations as the Assembly of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, the Organization of African Unity and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, as well as by the States Members of the United Nations.

113. We wish in this connection to recall the Final Communiqué adopted by the Meeting of Ministers and Heads of Delegation of the Non-Aligned Countries to the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly, held in New York from 1 to 5 October 1984 [see A/39/560]. The participants reaffirmed their total support for the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people and their determination to act for early achievement of those rights.

114. Similarly, the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity, at its twentieth ordinary session, held at Addis Ababa from 12 to 15 November 1984, adopted a resolution in which it vigorously condemned all initiatives, measures and agreements that did not take into account the aspirations of the Palestinian people and its sole authentic representative, the PLO, and considered that any agreement on the question of Palestine entered into without the participation of the PLO was null and void.[6]

115. Moreover, the Fourth Islamic Summit Conference, held at Casablanca from 16 to 19 January 1984, adopted several resolutions on the question of Palestine [see A/39/131 and Corr.1] in which it recognized that a just peace can be established in the region only with the total and unconditional withdrawal by Israel from all occupied Arab territories and with the restoration to the Palestinian people of its inalienable national rights.

116. To conclude this brief survey designed to illustrate the international consensus on the question of Palestine, we would draw attention to the fact that the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the ten States members of the European Economic Community, meeting at Brussels on 27 March 1984, emphasized in their declaration on the Middle East[7] that any settlement should take into account the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people.

117. It is disturbing to note, however, that despite this general consensus on the way in which the question of Palestine should be solved, Israel, in violation of numerous resolutions of the United Nations and of international treaties to which it is a party, continues to violate the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and to pursue its policy of occupying Palestinian and Arab territories, as well as its illegal establishment of Jewish settlements in occupied Palestinian territories, particularly by the confiscation of lands belonging to Arabs and by the systematic and repeated violation of the human rights of the populations in the occupied territories.

118. Thus, according to the most recent information from the occupied territories, the Israeli authorities, in an announcement dated 30 October 1984, are said to be planning to construct a further settlement in Halhul, after expelling 24 Palestinian families. On 28 October, Jewish terrorists attacked a bus transporting some Arabs, killing one passenger and wounding 11 others. In addition, we should note in passing the persistent harassment of the Left Bank universities, the imprisonment of Palestinians without warrant, the shooting on sight of Arab inhabitants by Jewish settlers and Israeli soldiers, the detention of nationalists, including the former Mayor of Nablus, and the profanation of mosques, including the Ibrahimi Mosque in Hebron.

119. Such Israeli practices are of course not only in flagrant violation of international law and of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949,[5] but also contrary to the spirit and the letter of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council. What is even more serious is that it appears that the Israeli Government intends to pursue its policy of establishing additional settlements in the occupied territories so that, according to forecasts, their population will reach the minimum figure of 100,000 Israeli settlers by 1987 and 190,000 by 2010.

120. In the face of these disturbing prospects, we feel it is the duty of States with any decisive influence on Israel to recall it to reason and make it understand that its present military superiority is no more than ephemeral and that, in addition, the peace of the tomb of which it is today the apostle cannot replace lasting peace based on justice in the Middle East.

121. On the strength of those principles, we are pleased to endorse the relevant provisions of General Assembly resolution 38/58 C, which welcomed the call for the convening of an international conference on peace in the Middle East in conformity with the following guidelines: first, the enjoyment by the Palestinian people of its legitimate and inalienable rights, including the right to return, the right to self-determination and the right to establish its own independent State in Palestine; secondly, recognition of the right of the PLO, the representative of the Palestinian people, to participate on an equal footing with other parties in all efforts, deliberations and conferences on the Middle East; thirdly, the need to put an end to Israel's occupation of the Arab territories, in accordance with the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force, and, consequently, the need to secure Israeli withdrawal from the territories occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem; fourthly, the need to oppose and reject all Israeli policies and practices in the occupied territories, including Jerusalem, and any de facto situation created by Israel which are contrary to international law and relevant United Nations resolutions—particularly the settlements policy—since these constitute major obstacles to the achievement of peace in the Middle East; fifthly, the need to declare null and void all legislative and administrative measures and actions taken by Israel, the occupying Power, which have altered or are intended to alter the character and status of the Holy City of Jerusalem, including the expropriation of land and property situated thereon, and in particular the so-called "Basic Law" on Jerusalem and the proclamation of Jerusalem as the capital of Israel; and, lastly, the right of all States in the region to exist within secure and internationally recognized boundaries, with justice and security for all, the sine qua non of which is the recognition and exercise of the inalienable, legitimate rights of the Palestinian people.

122. We also believe that all the parties to the Arab-Israeli conflict, including the PLO and the two great Powers and other States concerned, should participate in the international peace conference on an equal footing and with equal rights. To that end, we call upon certain States that are still against the convening of that conference to reconsider their position and thus make possible just and lasting peace in the region.

123. The commitment of the people of Madagascar to the Palestinian cause is a matter of public record. The Democratic Republic of Madagascar has always been convinced that the question of Palestine is the crux of the Middle East problem and that there can be no question of any kind of separate peace, any agreement that does not take due account of the legitimate aspirations of the Palestinian people, or any arrangement concluded without the participation of the PLO.

124. That is why we welcomed the meeting of the Palestine National Council at Amman last month. The very fact that that meeting was held demonstrated, if there were any need to do so, the vigour of that Palestinian legislative body, which, furthermore, reiterated its confidence in the present leadership of the PLO.

125. We cannot conclude this statement without reaffirming our support for the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, which, under the chairmanship of Mr. Massamba Sarré, of Senegal, has always discharged its mandate in a diligent and devoted manner. Lastly, we are once again convinced that the majority of the States represented in this forum share the feelings of the President of the Democratic Republic of Madagascar, Mr. Didier Ratsiraka, when he stated in his message of solidarity with and support for the Palestinian people on the occasion of the commemoration of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People: "What the PLO wants, we want as well, and Palestine will be victorious."

126. Mr. EL-FATTAL (Syrian Arab Republic) (interpretation from Arabic): In the course of the General Assembly's consideration of the question of Palestine, which lies at the heart of the conflict in the Middle East, it should be recalled that the question of Palestine was not born on 5 June 1967, when Israel attacked three Arab States and occupied all of Palestine, the Syrian Golan Heights and other parts of the Arab nation. Indeed, this question was created with the arrival of the first influx of settlers, in implementation of the Basel programme adopted at the first world Zionist Congress in 1897. Then the imperialist States gave their blessings to the scheme in their scramble to partition the Middle East, before, during and after the First World War.

Mr. Fajardo Maldonado (Guatemala), Vice-President, took the Chair.

127. The Basel programme, which is the definitive foundation of the colonization of Palestine, is based on two principles: first, the Judaization of the land, that is to say, the usurpation of the land of Arabs; and, secondly, the Judaization of labour, which means depriving the Arabs of the right to work in their own homeland, Palestine, and the creation of an exclusively Jewish society. As to the size of the land to be so colonized, it was determined on the basis of an admixture of secular colonialism and colonialism emanating from Jewish mythology. Then there was the Balfour Declaration of 1917 and the mandate system, which was invented by that genius of contemporary imperialism, Jan Smuts, of South Africa, and which opened the doors of Palestine to Jewish immigration. This indeed marked the beginning of the inevitable Arab struggle against aggression and for the defence of Arab rights, especially the rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination.

128. The history of Palestine since 1919 is the history of a people struggling, with all possible means, to restore its legitimate rights. The problem of Palestine has taken its present international shape since 1947, when Palestine was partitioned by a resolution contrary to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of contemporary international law. Then the Arab nation came to the rescue of the Palestinian people against Zionist aggression, which has been aimed since then at the occupation of the whole of Palestine by brute force and massacres, such as the massacre of Deir Yassin in 1948. Israel has always sought to justify its continued aggression. At times it invokes the will of God, at others it tries to rewrite history in order to obliterate the Arab Islamic and Christian history in Palestine. At still other times, it invokes considerations of absolute security, even though we know that in this world there is no absolute security for any State. As I have already stated, the core of the conflict is that aggression that is being committed against the Arab people of Palestine and that has now spread to other neighbouring Arab countries, in order to establish a colonial State.

129. We should recall the racist character of that State called "Israel", in order to understand the tragedy of the Arabs in Palestine. The Zionist ideology, which is the source of inspiration for the racist and expansionist Israeli practices, has no counterpart in contemporary history except in nazism, which has been overcome, and in apartheid, which will shortly be overcome. In resolution 3379 (XXX), entitled "Elimination of all forms of racial discrimination", the General Assembly determined that "zionism is a form of racism and racial discrimination". That resolution is a historic turning-point in the international community's understanding of Zionist racism. It is regrettable, however, that, under pressure by some imperialist circles, the General Assembly has not been able to translate that resolution into international action to eliminate racism all over the world, in order to deter Israel from persisting in its racist policies, which endanger international peace and security in a manner similar to the policies of apartheid in southern Africa and which also constitute a gross violation of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949.[5] In its 1979 report, the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories referred to the racist Israeli policies in the following terms:

> "Israel's policy in the occupied territories is based on the so-called 'homeland' doctrine which envisages a mono-religious (Jewish) State established on territory that includes those territories occupied by Israel in June 1967."[8]

130. The Special Committee concluded that:

> "to the extent that the inhabitants of the occupied territories do not form part of the religious group in whose name the Government of Israel claims the right to establish itself, these inhabitants have no rights vis-à-vis the governing authorities (in this case the Government of Israel as a military occupation authority) whenever the exercise of these rights happens to run counter to the 'homeland' policy."[9]

131. The Special Committee also concluded that such a doctrine could not but negate the right of the Arab citizen to return to his homeland and declared that:

> "Therefore, the Government of Israel, assisted by the judicial authorities, continues to deny the right to return to their homes to those inhabitants of the occupied territories who fled as a result of the hostilities and to those expelled by the Israeli military authorities from the occupied territories since June 1967."[9]

132. That doctrine, manifested in Israeli racist practices, negates the existence of the Arabs and makes Israel, like South Africa, an entity which endangers a world order based on values, principles and laws—values, principles and laws which neither Israel nor South Africa can respect because of an inherent natal defect common to both of them. Israel is based on a denial of the existence of the Arabs, on non-recognition of their rights and on contempt for anything that does not belong to zionism.

133. That contempt towards Arabs—even towards oriental Jews—was expressed by Ben-Gurion, when he said, as quoted in The Fate of the Jews, by Roberta Strauss Feuerlicht:[10]

> "We do not want Israelis to become Arabs. We are duty-bound to fight against the spirit of the Levant, which corrupts individuals and societies, and to preserve the authentic Jewish values as they are crystallized in the Diaspora."[*]

134. Abba Eban, the former Israeli Foreign Minister, who can now be seen on American television's Channel 13 in an attempt to sell the history of Judaism—a misleading matter—to the American society and who is called an intellectual, has said:

> "One of the great apprehensions that afflicts us when we contemplate our cultural scene is the fear that the predominance of immigrants of oriental origin may force Israel to equalize its cultural level with that of the neighbouring world."[*]

135. The conclusion to be drawn from all this is that the Israeli colonialist society is by its nature, inclination and goals based on a refusal to recognize the existence of the Arabs and on hatred of the people of Palestine. Consequently, it is a régime which is against a just peace. The General Assembly, which heard the statement of the Israeli representative during the debate on the Middle East [72nd meeting], must ask itself these questions. Who wants to eliminate whom? Who has eliminated the Arab existence? Who seeks a just peace? Who is profiting from aggression? The present Israeli Minister for Foreign Affairs and former head of the Stern Gang, Mr. Shamir, has said: "We want peace, but only in conditions which will enable us to continue to exist, and this means the Golan Heights, Judea and Samaria within the boundaries of the land of Israel."[*]

136. Moreover, Mordechai Zipori, the former Israeli Minister of Communications, has declared: "The Golan Heights is ours and anybody who regards himself as a Syrian should be allowed in a democratic fashion to move to Syria."[*]

137. I should like to draw the attention of those who claim that Israel is the representative of democracy in our region—and this includes the delegation of the United States—to those words: "anybody who regards himself as a Syrian should be allowed in a democratic fashion to move to Syria."[*]

138. This is the democracy in which they believe, the democracy of occupation.

139. We always insist, in the General Assembly, on one thing: that the Assembly should see the peace proclaimed by Israel in the light of the declarations of its leaders, for their peace is the peace of the graveyard. That is why we ask that Israel be evaluated on the basis of its aggression, its deep-seated racism, its policy of colonialism and expansionism that runs against the current of the peaceful international relations called for by the Charter of the United Nations and against the sanctity of human rights.

140. On the basis of these considerations, the General Assembly adopted in 1982, at its ninth emergency special session, resolution ES-9/1, concerning Israel's violation of its obligations and of the Charter, in which it declared—a declaration reaffirmed in successive resolutions of the Assembly—that:

> "Israel's record and actions confirm that it is not a peace-loving Member State and that it has carried out neither its obligations under the Charter nor its commitment under General Assembly resolution 273 (III) of 11 May 1949".

141. We believe that the General Assembly should once again reaffirm that declaration, the validity of which was proved this year when Israel and its partner, the United States, rejected the idea of an international peace conference on the Middle East, which was endorsed by the General Assembly in resolution 38/58 C. That shameful refusal is referred to in the Secretary-General's report to both the General Assembly and the Security Council [A/39/130/Add.1]. That report cites the response of the United States and Israel to the idea of convening an international peace conference on the Middle East: "it is clear from the replies of the Governments of Israel and the United States of America that they are not prepared to participate in the proposed conference."

142. The Israeli colonialist society, which is based on the ashes of the Palestinian people and the continuance of the settlements policy in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights, cannot, because of its racist, terrorist nature, accept the principle of a just peace based on resolutions of the United Nations, which recognize, affirm and guarantee the right of the Palestinian people to return to its homeland, to self-determination without foreign intervention and to establish its own independent State on its national soil and which call for unconditional Israeli withdrawal from all the territories occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem.

143. Israel has defied the General Assembly, the Security Council, the Secretary-General, and the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People when it rejected the idea of convening an international peace conference on the Middle East. Israel would like a new Camp David, because the Camp David accords were based on depriving the Palestinian people of its national rights. Those accords encouraged Israel to annex land by creating new faits accomplis. It promised the Palestinians administrative autonomy covering individuals but not their lands, their farms or their waters. This is what Israel wants from the Arabs.

144. Israel dictates what it wants to Washington, which in the same spirit rejects the idea of convening a peace conference in accordance with General Assembly resolution 38/58 C. It is continuing to worship the structure erected following the Camp David accords on the remains of Arab Palestine in order to deal with the Arabs individually and to force them to shameful surrender.

145. Israel would not have been able to defy the international community by refusing to participate in an international peace conference, and would not have been able to persist in its aggressive and expansionist practices, annexing the Golan Heights and Jerusalem, without the unlimited diplomatic, political, military and economic support it receives from the United States. The November 1981 strategic co-operation agreement between Washington and Tel Aviv has widened and become a strategic alliance in the full sense of the word, an alliance directed against the interests of the Arab nation and its right to live in peace. It is an alliance that endangers international peace and security in the region and beyond.

146. United States support for Israel has known no limits, including aiding Israel in its wars against the Arabs, especially the June 1967 war. In his book entitled Taking Sides: America's secret relations with a militant Israel,[11] Stephen Green states the following:

> "There were forms of material assistance required by Israel. On May 23, Johnson authorized an emergency air shipment of armoured personnel carriers, tank spare parts, spare parts for the Hawk missile air defense system, bomb fuses, artillery ammunition and gas masks, among many other items. These items were packed and sent just prior to the June 5 invasion, in preparation for it, at a time when President Johnson had publicly declared an arms embargo on all items going to the Middle East. One almost wonders whether there might not have been two Lyndon Johnsons in the White House in early June 1967."*

147. As to the collusion between Washington and Israel in the latest war against Lebanon, some facts have started to surface. In a book published by two Israeli writers, Ze'ev Schiff and Ehud Ya-ahir, entitled Israel's Lebanon War,[12] there is a reference to a message by the butcher Sharon to his friend Alexander Haig, in which he said:

> "I have just now returned from one of my visits to our troops in Lebanon. I want to tell you that in the 'Peace for Galilee' operation the IDF has brilliantly achieved all its missions, as instructed by the Government. We have succeeded in eliminating the huge PLO terrorist military infrastructure in southern Lebanon and we are now encircling the bases of terrorism and its headquarters in Beirut itself. In the course of the operation, faced with a Syrian decision to interfere in the air and on the ground, we also succeeded in breaking the strategic hold of the Syrian Army in Lebanon, which had provided a massive support to PLO terrorism.
> "On that background, I wish to express to you my deep appreciation for your understanding and your determined stand in the struggle against international terrorism . . . You are entitled, Mr. Secretary, to be proud of your achievements."*

148. Regarding the 1982 aggression against Lebanon, the two above-mentioned journalists compared the role of Washington in the previous Israeli wars against the Arabs and its role during the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, saying: "Neither in the Yom Kippur War nor in the Six-Day War before it had Israel enjoyed such heartening understanding from Washington."*

149. On previous occasions, my delegation has spoken in the General Assembly on the staggering amounts of assistance Israel receives from the American Administration in the form of grants, showing that each Israeli gets about $1,000 per year, a figure that is expected to reach $3,000 in 1986. At this very moment, there are joint American-Israeli committees working in complete secrecy to develop all aspects of the strategic alliance between the two countries. In addition, in the second part of its ninety-eighth session, the United States Congress enacted law No. 5377, which authorizes the President of the United States to conclude a commercial agreement with Israel granting it full customs exemption and exemption from restrictions on Israeli products. The Executive Director of the so-called American-Israel Public Affairs Committee, which is the expression of the Zionist lobby in the Congress, on 22 May 1984 produced written testimony to the Ways and Means Committee of the Congress, in which he explained the reason for calling for the creation of a free market between the United States and Israel.

150. I shall quote the following passage from that written testimony:

*Quoted in English by the speaker.

"Israel has great strategic importance for the United States and the West. Its important geographic location in the Mediterranean and in the heart of the Middle East, in addition to the fighting capability of its armed forces and its commitment against the Soviet Union, makes Israel a strategic ally of great importance to that sensitive region of the world. Israel's power helps achieve United States interests."

151. It can be concluded from that testimony that Israeli occupation and its wars against the Arabs would not have been possible without the unlimited support given by the United States to Israel in many areas. It is in the nature of things that the development of the strategic alliance between the two countries through pooling their two markets will make available to Israel all the financial and economic capabilities of the United States, enabling it to commit more acts of aggression and to seek to impose its hegemony over the Middle East.

152. The Zionist lobby was successful in imposing its will on the American economy, inducing that economy to serve its aggressive policies and help to continue its occupation of other parts of Arab land on the pretext of a bogus threat, which in fact does not exist, and causing the American people to overlook the brutal Israeli occupation which is undemocratic, colonialist and racist. In fact, the American taxpayer is bearing the cost of the Israeli occupation in the West Bank, Gaza, the Golan Heights and southern Lebanon. Yet, there are some in Arab and other circles that still believe it is possible to change the feelings of the United States towards them and their national causes.

153. We believe that the General Assembly should reaffirm its resolutions calling for the termination of dealings with Israel in the diplomatic, economic, financial and military fields, because such dealings—at a time when Israel defies the international community by rejecting General Assembly resolution 38/58 C, and even the idea of an international peace conference on the Middle East, in accordance with United Nations resolutions and under the auspices of the international Organization, to ensure Israel's withdrawal from all the Arab territories it has occupied since 1967 and recognition of the right of the Palestinian people to return to its homeland, to exercise self-determination and to establish an independent State on its national soil—such dealings encourage Israel to develop its capabilities aimed at establishing the "Greater Israel" which would extend from the Nile to the Euphrates. In fact, Israel's goals are contrary to those of the United Nations. As a result of the Camp David accords, Israel escalated its settlements policy by assuming control of 60 per cent of the land in the West Bank. Since 1967, it has established 160 settlements in the West Bank, 19 in the Gaza Strip and 41 in the Golan Heights. Israel is still working hard to settle 100,000 Jews in the occupied areas by 1985. At the same time, Israel continues to violate human rights in the occupied Arab territories. Those violations are serious, and very few deny that they are similar to Nazi practices. Israel practises terror, murder, arbitrary arrest, collective punishment, demolition of Arab houses, expulsion, deportation, and expropriation of lands and of water resources. Moreover, Israel undermines the economic and social infrastructures, closes universities and schools, punishes teachers and students. Such practices occur daily. The Palestinian child is killed or punished just for raising the Palestinian flag. Students are shot for demonstrating to express their true nationalist feelings and Arab identity. No other people in the world is subjected to such forms of terror and repression.

154. Moreover, the Israeli occupation authorities are undertaking excavations and other works in the holy places, including Jerusalem. The General Assembly should therefore take appropriate measures to deter Israel—deter that Israel which the United States has tried to project as an "island of democracy"—from these practices. In addition, the Assembly should enhance the work of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories. That committee's work is most important in order to increase the international community's awareness of the situation and make that community understand the actual practices taking place in the occupied territories. International justice, which punished the Nazi criminals, must also punish the criminals of the terrorist and colonialist "island of democracy".

155. We should like to repeat very clearly to the United States what my delegation has already said in the general debate, namely, that its insistence on finding a solution to the problem of the Middle East and the question of Palestine on the basis of the Camp David accords, or similar types of agreement based on partial and separate arrangements, can lead only to an exacerbation of tension in the region and will only make the situation more explosive. Also, such a stand has enabled Israel to intensify its settlements policy in the occupied Arab lands and has given it a free hand to strike in all directions. Thus it has declared the annexation of Jerusalem and the Golan Heights and it has occupied Lebanon and continues to occupy large areas of that country. All such practices undermine the role of the United Nations, which is based on international legality.

156. My delegation would like to quote from the message from the President of the Syrian Arab Republic to the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, as follows:

"For us in Syria, the cause of the Palestinian people is a fundamental cause and is at the heart of our struggle against aggression and occupation and for peace and justice.

"The Palestinian lands are part of the Arab nation; indeed, they are the very heart of the Arab nation. The people of Palestine are part of the Arab nation. Therefore, aggression against the Palestinian people is aggression against the Arab nation. It is the beginning of the Israeli expansionist scheme aimed at the establishment of a greater Israeli State extending from the Nile to the Euphrates."

157. The General Assembly, which has consistently shown that it understands the nature of the fight waged against us since our independence and has supported our people in Palestine, must fulfil at this session the great responsibility entrusted to it under the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations. Consequently, it must spare no effort to enable the Arab people of Palestine to recover its full rights in accordance with international law, of which the United Nations is the custodian.

158. In conclusion, I should like to express our appreciation to the Secretary-General and to the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and especially to Mr. Sarré, its Chairman. Its report [A/39/35] has met with the approval of all because of its frankness and objectivity and the completeness of its description of the activities of the Committee in carrying out its important task.

159. Mr. KULAWIEC (Czechoslovakia): This year my delegation is addressing the General Assembly almost at the end of its deliberations on a longstanding and extraordinarily dangerous international problem. This allows us to make a broader statistical survey of the development of the debate. Israel has been unambiguously marked as an aggressor carrying out an illegal occupation, seeking expansionist aims, ignoring the norms of international law and the decisions of the United Nations, pursuing a policy of annexation and disregarding fundamental human rights. The United States, because of its all-round assistance to Israel, has been declared Israel's accomplice. A particularly significant feature of the debate has been the unity of views on the rights of the Arab people of Palestine. This unity of the Members of the United Nations provides notable support for effective action by the Arab people of Palestine in their struggle for their legitimate rights.

160. The position of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic on this question is in full harmony with the attitude of the international community. This position was reaffirmed on 29 November 1984, on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, by the President of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic in his message of greeting to the PLO. The message states, among other things, that the Czechoslovak people resolutely condemn the expansionist policy of Israel, backed by United States imperialism, and fully support the Palestinian people, headed by their sole legitimate representative, the PLO, in their struggle for the realization of their inalienable right to self-determination and to the establishment of their own independent State.

161. The Czechoslovak delegation shares the serious concerns of many other delegations about the dangerous chauvinistic logic of the ruling circles of Israel. Although those rulers talk a great deal about the right of Israel to an independent and secure existence, they are not willing to recognize the same rights in respect of the Palestinian people. Israel uses the illegal occupation of the Arab territories for its predatory aims. It maintains and fans tensions in the Middle East region and persecutes the Arab people of Palestine in the territories of other States also, thus violating the sovereignty of those States.

162. What are the root causes of this state of affairs? The present crisis situation has been created as a result and component of an extensive attack on progressive development in the Arab world. Israel's ruling class plays in this attack the role of a striking force, while at the same time also pursuing its own selfish goals.

163. Therefore, the Middle East crisis is not only a clash between the Zionist forces at present ruling in Israel and the Arab people; it is a conflict between the Arab national liberation movement and one of the forms or branches of world imperialism, unreservedly supported by the anti-people imperialist circles in the United States. On analysing the developments in the Middle East, we have to state, much to our regret, that the approach of the United States Administration, representing these imperialist circles, has been developing in a more and more negative way. This has given Israel a free hand for the implementation of its Zionist plans directed against the legitimate rights of the Arab people of Palestine, and Israel is taking advantage of it. It is disregarding all norms of international law, ignoring the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council and trampling upon the ideals cherished by the United Nations, of which Israel is still a Member. Its policy has only one aim: the so-called final settlement of the Palestinian question as proposed by Herzl, the founding father of zionism.

164. An integral part of this concept is constituted by the massacres at Sabra and Shatila, which in their nature resemble the crimes committed by the Fascists at Coventry, Rotterdam, Warsaw and Lidice and in the Soviet Union, as well as those perpetrated later in My Lai. The world has not yet healed the wounds of Sabra and Shatila, and yet Israel is committing new crimes.

165. The greatest obstacle to the Israeli policy of annexation is the systematic resistance of the Palestinian people, headed by its only legitimate representative, the PLO. That is why the barbaric attack carried out by Israel against Lebanon in 1982 was directed primarily to the liquidation of that organization and the entire Palestinian resistance movement.

166. The number of acts committed by Israel which deserve condemnation is large. Much has been said about them in this forum. In the interest of the further stabilization of our efforts, I would like to mention here the statement by an Israeli lawyer, Felicia Langer, that she felt how weak and vague all words were when confronted with the tragic reality.

167. The international community and all its members must actively contribute to the establishment of an equitable position for the Arab people of Palestine. That is why we again express appreciation of the conclusions adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference,[1] which established prerequisites favourable for the solution of the Palestine question.

168. A compass for the establishment of lasting peace in the Middle East, including a just settlement of the Palestine question, is provided by the proposals put forward by the Soviet Union on 15 September 1982.[3] We fully support also the latest Soviet proposals [see A/39/368], which reflect the justified desires of the Arab people of Palestine to put an end to the Israeli occupation and to do away with its consequences in all the occupied Palestinian territories. They offer the Palestinians a possibility of implementing their right to self-determination and to the establishment of their own State, while demanding the effective safeguarding of the right of all States in the region to security and an independent existence and development, based on compliance with the principle of full reciprocity.

169. Historical experience teaches us to reject attempts to influence the developments in the Middle East such as the Kissinger step-by-step policy, the Camp David accords and the Reagan plan of 1 September 1982.[2]

170. It is only natural that the main decisions must be made by the Arab people of Palestine. We are confident that, in spite of the temporary weakening of the unity of the Palestinian nation caused by

Israel's aggression, the cohesion of its struggle for its legitimate rights will be restored.

171. Czechoslovakia regards the PLO as the representative of a sovereign and independent nation and gives full support to its just struggle. The Government of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic decided last year to grant the PLO agency in Prague the status of a diplomatic mission.

172. The PLO was founded 20 years ago. During the period of its existence, it has proved its viability in managing the affairs of the Arab people of Palestine. It is therefore impossible to separate the Palestinians from the PLO, as is done by Israel and the United States. Those who are interested in negotiating with the Palestinians have to negotiate with the PLO.

173. However, when there is not enough political will on the part of all parties concerned to achieve a just settlement, a long time may pass before the Arab people of Palestine can enjoy full freedom and before the dangerous hotbed of tension which exists in the Middle East, and which poses a serious threat to international peace and security, is eliminated. We are aware of the fact that extensive and resolute international efforts will be required in order to establish in the Middle East a lasting and equitable peace for all States and nations.

The meeting rose at 1.20 p.m.

United Nations
GENERAL ASSEMBLY
THIRTY-NINTH SESSION
Official Records

93rd PLENARY MEETING

Monday, 10 December 1984, at 3.30 p.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

AGENDA ITEM 99

Torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment: reports of the Secretary-General

1. Mr. POLOWCZYK (Poland), Rapporteur of the Third Committee: I have the honour to introduce the report of the Third Committee on agenda item 99 contained in document A/39/708. In paragraph 18 of its report, the Third Committee recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of a draft resolution which was adopted in the Committee without a vote. I take this opportunity of adding that, owing to a technical error, the names of the following sponsors were omitted: Italy and New Zealand. This will be rectified in the official records of the General Assembly.

I submit the recommendation of the Third Committee to the General Assembly for adoption.

Pursuant to rule 66 of the rules of procedure, it was decided not to discuss the report of the Third Committee.

2. The PRESIDENT: Statements will be limited to explanations of vote. The positions of delegations regarding the various recommendations of the Third Committee have been made clear in the Committee and are reflected in the relevant official records.

3. May I remind members that in paragraph 7 of its decision 34/401 the General Assembly decided that, when the same draft resolution is considered in a Main Committee and in plenary meeting, a delegation should, as far as possible, explain its vote only once, that is, either in the Committee or in plenary meeting, unless that delegation's vote in plenary meeting is different from its vote in the Committee. May I also remind members that, in accordance with decision 34/401, explanations of vote are limited to 10 minutes and should be made by delegations from their seats.

4. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment", recommended by the Third Committee in paragraph 18 of its report [A/39/708].

5. The Third Committee adopted that draft resolution without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/46).

6. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly has just taken an important decision in adopting this Convention, which crowns the success of seven years of hard work. I wish to congratulate all concerned, on the constructive and co-operative spirit in which they approached this task. The Convention represents a major step towards creating a more humane world and I am especially pleased that the Assembly has taken this decision on this day, the thirty-sixth anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

7. I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their position on this resolution.

8. Mr. HAMER (Netherlands): My delegation had asked to explain its position on the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. We have listened with attention to your words, Mr. President, and we concur. We are extremely pleased that this resolution has been adopted by consensus. I will not use the opportunity to say more or to explain our position.

9. Mr. FERM (Sweden): The Governments of the five Nordic countries, Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and my own country, Sweden, are highly gratified at the unanimous adoption of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

10. The fact that the Assembly has taken this important decision on Human Rights Day, the thirty-sixth anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, reminds us of the significant progress made by the United Nations in the standard-setting field. The Nordic countries hope that the unanimous adoption of this Convention will contribute to eliminating once and for all this scourge which has continued to plague mankind despite the international ban.

11. Ever since Sweden, in 1977, took the initiative to elaborate the Convention, the Nordic countries have been closely associated with this work. The road towards the Convention has been long and sometimes difficult. It is important now that the Convention enter into force as early as possible and that it be made effective by truly universal adherence.

12. I have the honour and pleasure to announce that the Nordic countries will sign the Convention as soon as it is opened for signature and take steps towards early ratification.

13. Mr. GÓMEZ-GÓMEZ (Colombia) (interpretation from Spanish): The effort made by the Third Committee to prepare, consider and agree on the text of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment must be applauded in the General Assembly. This has been given final approval today, for the benefit of all peoples, on a particularly important date, since it commemorates the adoption by the United Nations 36 years ago of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

14. It implies a triumph of the human being's victory over brutality and violence and no opportunity should be lost to reaffirm and reiterate the lofty values that should enjoy juridical protection and be the constant concern of States and of all leaders who bear the responsibility for guiding them politically. It must not be possible in the present era, when we evoke humanism as an element of Government programmes, the letters and the arts, for anyone to repeat Nietsche's cynical comment that "the State is the coldest of cold monsters".

15. Today we are not faced with a situation of peace or war—war which is the source of all evils for the individual. But there are various areas in the world where violence upsets the normal life of States and impairs the implementation of norms which would ensure the individual rights and social guarantees as provided for in national legislation. I am referring particularly to those countries with a juridical system that has been established in order to ensure that those individual rights and social prerogatives will be protected and where electoral legislation guarantees free and independent elections which are organized by independent institutions, thus ensuring no interference in the normal development of functions.

16. It is necessary to connect the internal situation, founded on a respectable and efficient juridical system aimed at protecting such important individual rights and social guarantees, to democratic political development and the protection of human rights.

17. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights is a noble document whose moral and political importance should be constantly emphasized because the struggle of mankind which is so widely represented in this world parliament, the universal Organization in which we are participating, must be an uninterrupted struggle and there must be constant vigilance. The task is to ensure that the dignity of man is respected and his rights protected so that he can express himself without fear or risk to his physical integrity, either orally or in writing. He should be able to express his own political convictions and he should be able to express what he basically needs and what his spiritual aspirations are within the framework of established law guaranteeing his rights.

18. Today, peace, which is the undeniable contribution that the United Nations has made, is a great force with tremendous power, and it must be used in order to ensure that peace and anti-violence will be given the importance that war and violence have been accorded in the past. In some parts of the world violence is causing grave suffering to peoples, destroying their wealth, paralysing productive activity, requiring the manufacture of subversive arms and controlling vast economic and financial resources which could be used to solve the crushing problems of peoples. These are solutions that mankind has needed since its beginning because man, either isolated individually or as part of society, has always had shortcomings, and this has meant that there are needs that require solutions. Since the most ancient times, we have seen that there must be an individual with his own aspirations but who is also part of the social nucleus. The success of these solutions will ensure that Governments are effective and that their prestige will be greater—because they must be Governments supported by public opinion which will make it possible to ensure respect for human rights. The greatest eras of mankind occurred at times when humanism governed. The United Nations is the most appropriate forum for leaders of States to yield in their dogmatism and pre-determined ideas, because they run contrary to tolerance as tolerance is tantamount to respect for the beliefs of the individual as long as the individual has recourse to the legal provisions protecting his rights.

19. Mankind has received much from the desire for peace and justice that has been indicated by wise Governments, and there are social systems which are designed to improve man's lot. This will for peace, anti-violence and justice has given mankind much more than calculating political cunning. Albert Einstein said that international political astuteness is what, in the final analysis, engenders universal distrust, and he said that Moses was a better reformer of mankind than Machiavelli ever was. Therefore, when violence tries to replace entrenched systems or totalitarian systems which do not admit any changes in order to improve man's condition, or in order to give each and every inhabitant a legal basis on which to call for his own justice or freedom, the first victim is truth. In conditions of violence, truth is seriously violated and there are occasions when well-intentioned investigations are destroyed because of de facto circumstances and because rights are held in check. When there is suffering in some sectors of the population, it is necessary to be extremely objective to act as judge rather than as a party to the conflict. We must ensure that one party does not prevail over another by means of violence, when there is an attempt to kill in order to achieve power rather than to conduct oneself in a civilized fashion in order to attain power by means of the majority in an electoral process.

20. In order to preserve and to contribute to the preservation of human rights in their entire range, it is necessary to take into consideration how national juridical systems guarantee them in the framework established for this purpose. We must encourage the reform of political and social institutions. They must be modernized, they must be broadened and they must be extended to various sectors which have different views so that there can be pluralism enabling the participation of minorities in political life, of opposing forces, since unanimity is not possible among human beings. Without freedom of political organization of parties, without trade union organizations and without State statutes guaranteeing participation and suffrage among all sectors, it will not be possible to consolidate the democratic structure of a nation. In view of the violence, we have to attack two sources, and this is the lofty purpose of the United Nations, its committees and its various representatives. Here they can continue to contribute to eliminate the various causes of violence in order to protect the human rights of all inhabitants of any given country. Mediation must be pursued in political action and in a productive dialogue which will narrow differences among men. Enough can never be done to ensure that the electoral process will prevail so that legality will prevail in resolving antagonism in society—and there will be antagonism as long as man lives on earth. We must evince these values so that we shall not be prisoners of our dogmatism and so that we shall be ready to accept having our conflicts settled by means of mediation.

21. A comparative study should be undertaken of the domestic legislation of States in whose territories there are cases of violence. This would make it possible to prepare a report on how human rights are being guaranteed. Human rights should be the privilege not only of the supporters of the Government in power but, rather, of the entire population.

22. The PRESIDENT: I remind the representative of Colombia that the 10-minute limit has been reached. I therefore ask him kindly to conclude his statement.

23. Mr. GÓMEZ-GÓMEZ (Colombia): We interpret the great desire of all peoples when we consider and advocate the elimination of all forms of religious intolerance, when we contribute to the study of a convention on the rights of the child and when we discuss cruel and inhuman or degrading treatment, all of which is implicit in the body of humanitarian law establishing effective human rights for every being on Earth.

24. If we refer to rights for human beings which are established in a given geographical region, the United Nations should now renew its faith in man and his place in society, and his moral, economic and juridical status as well.

25. Mr. SCHIFTER (United States of America): Thirty-six years ago today, the General Assembly proclaimed, in article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, that "No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment". This clear statement has since been repeated and amplified in numerous international documents, including the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment of 9 December 1975 [resolution 3452 (XXX), annex]. These international instruments have served an important function in the struggle against torture by establishing the standard against which we can measure the behaviour of Governments and their officials.

26. From a legal and historical perspective, the process of standard-setting in this field must be counted as a significant achievement. It is no longer acceptable, in the eyes of the international community, for a Government to claim that the way it treats its own citizens is solely an internal matter if the treatment in question violates the provisions of international instruments which set human rights standards. The States Members of the United Nations can be justly proud of this positive evolution in international opinion, launched so dramatically by the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. But the mere setting of standards, as we all know, is not enough.

27. There is ample evidence of a wide gulf between lofty words and the unacceptable practices which continue unabated in many parts of the world. One of the most flagrant continuing violations of human rights is torture, a crude violation of everything that we understand by the word "human". As long as it persists, further steps are needed to translate our words into action to eliminate this abhorrent practice.

28. Therefore, the United States was pleased to join the consensus on the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment which we have just adopted. The Convention is the product of seven years of arduous negotiations in a Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights, as well as informal consultations and final revisions agreed at the present session of the General Assembly. It is a compromise text which, to our sincere regret, limits the implementation mechanism of the Convention.

29. In the final analysis, however, it is the States members of the international community which are morally responsible for implementing the existing prohibition against torture and other forms of ill treatment.

30. We hope that the Convention just adopted will help to mobilize the political will of States to end the resort to torture as an accepted practice of law enforcement agencies.

31. Mr. YEDID (Israel): My delegation has been pleased to join the consensus on the draft resolution contained in document A/39/708 on the understanding that the Convention does not supersede the 1949 Geneva Conventions[1] regarding applicability to armed conflicts.

32. Mr. RUIZ CABAÑAS (Mexico) (interpretation from Spanish): Pursuant to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, just adopted by the General Assembly, it is a pleasure for me to inform the Assembly that the Secretary of Foreign Relations of Mexico, in the course of his appearance before the Senate on 27 November 1984, stated, in response to a specific question, that Mexico supports the Convention against torture ". . . not only because it appears in the text of our Constitution itself, but also because it signifies elemental respect for human rights and for the freedom, dignity and integrity of mankind". Moreover, he stated:

> "All of us consider that it is indispensable and necessary for harmonious coexistence of mankind for there to be complete respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. Mexico, which has been an energetic advocate of these causes of human rights and fundamental freedoms in international forums, does bear the commitment of ensuring that, both domestically and externally, elemental respect for fundamental freedoms and human rights must exist."

33. Mr. YAKOVLEV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (interpretation from Russian): On Human Rights Day, which we are celebrating today, the General Assembly has adopted the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. This Day is marked by the adoption of a Convention, as well as by the adoption, on the initiative of the Third Committee, of a number of important decisions guaranteeing the right of peoples and of each individual to life, the right to fight against a State policy of apartheid and racism, which has been declared an international crime, and expressing condemnation of dictatorial régimes and encouragement of the struggle against the neo-Nazi practices and ideologies.

34. In marking this day, the United Nations has undertaken new efforts to oppose the most intolerable, flagrant and massive violations of fundamental human rights and freedoms which are directly linked with the imperialist policy of enslavement, racism and lawlessness.

35. On the eve of the fortieth anniversary of the victory over Hitlerite fascism, the peoples of the world well remember the Nazi jails, gas chambers and death camps in Maidanek, Dachau, Auschwitz and Mauthausen, where millions upon millions of people were brutalized, tortured and burnt in ovens. The Convention against torture, like the important decisions I have mentioned, is designed to prevent and avert in the future any repetition of such atrocities. Today, the policies of racism and enslavement of peoples include the practice of terror, brutality and torture as a fundamental element. In the contemporary racist jails of apartheid and dictatorial and totalitarian régimes, the same methods and weapons of torture are used that were used by the Hitlerite butchers. The Nazi criminals, hiding from the retribution of the peoples with the help of their protectors, who are known to all, often take personal charge of the business of butchery and pass on their experience in destroying people.

36. True to our socialist ideals, the Soviet Union, like other socialist countries, is in favour of the total elimination of the shameful practice of torture and inhuman treatment, and supports the adoption by the United Nations of immediate measures to eliminate such practices and policies. In the work on the draft Convention against torture, in the course of its discussion in the Third Committee, the Soviet delegation consistently proposed intensifying and expanding the definition in the Convention of the concept of torture, so as to close any loopholes or any possibility of using torture on the pretext of various reservations.

37. The socialist countries have made great efforts to achieve constructive agreements, particularly with regard to the competence of the Committee against Torture, to be established in accordance with article 17 of the Convention, which should be consistent with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and contemporary international law. The inclusion in the draft Convention of changes put forward by the socialist and other countries makes it possible to bring the competence of this Committee into line with the provisions of the important human rights covenants and conventions in this field. This, in the final stages, ensured unanimous approval for the draft Convention. While supporting the adoption of this compromise document, the Soviet Union opposes, and will continue to oppose, the outrageous practice of torture and those criminal régimes which resort to that practice.

AGENDA ITEM 16

Elections to fill vacancies in subsidiary organs and other elections:

(a) Election of fifteen members of the Industrial Development Board;

(b) Election of twenty members of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme;

(c) Election of twelve members of the World Food Council;

(d) Election of seven members of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination;

(e) Election of the members of the Board of Governors of the United Nations Special Fund for Land-locked Developing Countries;

(f) Election of the Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme

38. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will proceed first to the election of 15 members of the Industrial Development Board to replace those members whose term of office expires on 31 December 1984.

39. The 15 outgoing members are: Australia, China, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iraq, Lesotho, Liberia, Malaysia, Mexico, Panama, Sierra Leone, Spain, Turkey, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and Venezuela. Those members are eligible for immediate re-election.

40. I should like to remind delegations that after 1 January 1985 the following States will still be members of the Industrial Development Board: Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Bulgaria, Chad, Chile, Democratic Yemen, Finland, France, Ghana, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Italy, Japan, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malawi, the Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, Peru, Romania, Rwanda, Sudan, Switzerland, Uganda, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Arab Emirates and the United States of America. Those 30 States are therefore not eligible for election.

41. Under rule 92 of the General Assembly rules of procedure, all elections must be held by secret ballot and there shall be no nominations. May I, however, recall paragraph 16 of General Assembly decision 34/401, whereby "The practice of dispensing with the secret ballot for elections to subsidiary organs when the number of candidates corresponds to the number of seats to be filled should become standard . . . unless a delegation specifically requests a vote on a given election."

42. In the absence of such a request, may I take it that the Assembly decides to proceed to the election on that basis?

It was so decided.

43. The PRESIDENT: I shall now read the names of the candidates which have been endorsed by their respective groups.

44. For six seats from list A: China, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Lesotho, the Philippines and Sierra Leone; for five seats from list B: Australia, the Federal Republic of Germany, Spain, Turkey and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland; for one seat from list D: Czechoslovakia.

45. Since the number of candidates endorsed by groups A, B and D corresponds to the number of seats to be filled in those groups, I declare those candidates elected members of the Industrial Development Board for a three-year term beginning on 1 January 1985.

46. I call on the representative of Suriname as Chairman of the Group of Latin American States.

47. Mr. GUDA (Suriname): I should like to inform the Assembly that Nicaragua has withdrawn and that the Latin American Group therefore endorses the candidacies of Ecuador, Mexico and Venezuela for election to the Industrial Development Board.

48. The PRESIDENT: Since the number of candidates in list C now also corresponds to the number of seats to be filled, I declare Ecuador, Mexico and Venezuela elected members of the Industrial Development Board for a three-year term beginning 1 January 1985.

Australia, China, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iraq, the Ivory Coast, Lesotho, Mexico, the Philippines, Sierra Leone, Spain, Turkey, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and Venezuela were elected members of the Industrial Development Board for a three-year term beginning on 1 January 1985 (decision 39/309).

49. The PRESIDENT: On behalf of the General Assembly, I congratulate the States which have been elected members of the Industrial Development Board.

50. The General Assembly will now proceed to the election of 20 members of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme to replace those members whose term of office expires on 31 December 1984.

51. The 20 outgoing members are: Afghanistan, Botswana, Burundi, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Colombia, Greece, Guinea, India, Jamaica, Mexico, Morocco, Oman, Poland, Senegal, Spain, Thailand, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the United Republic of Tanzania and Uruguay. Those members are eligible for immediate re-election.

52. I should like to remind members that after 1 January 1985 the following States will still be members of the Governing Council: Algeria, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Cameroon, Chile, China, Finland, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Haiti, Hungary, Indonesia, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Kuwait, Lesotho, Malaysia, Nepal, Nigeria, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Peru, the Philippines, Rwanda, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Togo, Uganda, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United States of America, Venezuela, Yugoslavia and Zaire. Therefore those 38 States are not eligible for election.

53. Under rule 92 of the rules of procedure, all elections must be held by secret ballot and there shall be no nominations. May I, however, recall paragraph 16 of General Assembly decision 34/401, which has been reproduced as annex VI to the rules of procedure, whereby "The practice of dispensing with the secret ballot for elections to subsidiary organs when the number of candidates corresponds to the number of seats to be filled should become standard . . . unless a delegation specifically requests a vote on a given election". In the absence of such a request, may I take it that the Assembly decides to proceed to the election on that basis?

It was so decided.

54. The PRESIDENT: I should like to announce that the Chairmen of the regional groups have informed me of the following candidatures which have been endorsed by their respective groups: for six seats from Africa: Botswana, Ghana, Kenya, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Niger and Tunisia; for four seats from Asia: India, Jordan, Oman and Sri Lanka; for two seats from Eastern Europe: Bulgaria and Poland; for four seats from Latin America: Colombia, Jamaica, Mexico and Panama; and for four seats from Western European and other States: Canada, Malta, Turkey and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

55. Since the number of candidates from each group corresponds to the number of seats to be filled in that group, I declare those candidates elected members of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme for a three-year term beginning on 1 January 1985.

Botswana, Bulgaria, Canada, Colombia, Ghana, India, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malta, Mexico, Niger, Oman, Panama, Poland, Sri Lanka, Tunisia, Turkey and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland were elected members of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme for a three-year term beginning on 1 January 1985 (decision 39/310).

56. The PRESIDENT: I congratulate all the States which have been elected members of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme.

57. The Assembly will now consider agenda item 16 (c), concerning the election of twelve members of the World Food Council. In this connection, the Assembly has before it a note by the Secretary-General [A/39/297], containing a list of the nominations by the Economic and Social Council.

58. The 12 retiring members are Botswana, Canada, China, Colombia, Gambia, Greece, India, Mexico, Thailand, the United Republic of Tanzania, the United States of America and Yugoslavia.

59. The following States have been nominated by the Economic and Social Council: three African States for three vacancies: the Ivory Coast, Kenya and Zambia; three Asian States for three vacancies: China, Sri Lanka and Thailand; three Latin American States for two vacancies: Brazil, Colombia and Mexico; one Socialist State of Eastern Europe for one vacancy—Bulgaria; three Western European or other States for three vacancies: Canada, Turkey and the United States of America.

60. I call on the representative of Colombia.

61. Mr. GÓMEZ-GÓMEZ (Colombia) (interpretation from Spanish): Two months ago we informed the Economic and Social Council of the withdrawal of Colombia's candidature in this election.

62. The PRESIDENT: I have to inform representatives that the Chairman of the Group of Latin American States, in a letter dated 22 October 1984, informed me that the candidatures of Brazil and Mexico have since been endorsed by that group for the two seats allocated to it on the World Food Council, and members have just heard the statement by the representative of Colombia.

63. In accordance with paragraph 16 of General Assembly decision 34/401, the Assembly may dispense with balloting when the number of States nominated from among the groups is equal to the number of seats allocated to each of those groups.

64. May I take it, therefore, that the Assembly wishes to declare those States elected members of the World Food Council for a three-year term beginning 1 January 1985?

Brazil, Bulgaria, Canada, China, Ivory Coast, Kenya, Mexico, Sri Lanka, Thailand, Turkey, the United States of America and Zambia were elected members of the World Food Council for a three-year term beginning on 1 January 1985 (decision 39/311).

65. The PRESIDENT: On behalf of the Assembly, I wish to congratulate all the States which have been elected members of the World Food Council.

66. We shall now turn to agenda item 16 (d), concerning the election of seven members of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination.

67. In this connection, the Assembly has before it a note by the Secretary-General [A/39/298], which contains a list of the nominations by the Economic and Social Council to fill the vacancies in the Committee which will occur as a result of the expiration on 31 December 1984 of the terms of office of the following States: Germany, Federal Republic of, the Netherlands, Pakistan, Romania, Trinidad and Tobago, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and Yugoslavia.

68. The following States have been nominated by the Economic and Social Council: three Asian States for one vacancy: Bangladesh, Iraq and Sri Lanka; two Latin American States for one vacancy: Bolivia and Trinidad and Tobago; two Socialist States of Eastern Europe for two vacancies: the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic and Yugoslavia; and three Western European or other States for three vacancies: Germany, Federal Republic of, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

69. Mr. ZIADA (Iraq): As part of the consensus package agreed upon earlier by the Group of Asian States, Iraq withdrew its candidature for the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination. We would like to confirm that withdrawal of our candidature.

70. Mr. WIJEWARDANE (Sri Lanka): Although the Economic and Social Council nominated Sri Lanka to the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination, as indicated in document A/39/298, my delegation decided in a spirit of co-operation and compromise to abide by the decision of the Group of Asian States to endorse Bangladesh's candidature to fill the Asian vacancy on the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination. Sri Lanka therefore wishes to withdraw its candidature.

71. The PRESIDENT: I should like to inform representatives that the Chairman of the Group of Asian States, in a letter dated 22 October 1984, informed me that Bangladesh was the candidate chosen by consensus for the one seat allocated to that group on the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination. In that regard, members of the Assembly have just heard statements by the representatives of Iraq and Sri Lanka.

72. I call on the representative of Suriname, in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Latin American States.

73. Mr. GUDA (Suriname): I have the honour to inform the Assembly that Bolivia has withdrawn as a candidate for the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination, and that therefore we have only one endorsed candidate, that is, Trinidad and Tobago.

74. Mrs. ASHTON (Bolivia) (interpretation from Spanish): My delegation simply wishes to confirm what the Chairman of the Latin American Group has said, that Bolivia, for the sake of the unity of the group, has decided to withdraw its candidature for the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination.

75. The PRESIDENT: The number of States nominated by the Group of Asian States, the Group of Socialist States of Eastern Europe, the Group of Western European and other States and the Group of Latin American States corresponds to the number of seats allocated to each of those Groups.

76. In accordance with paragraph 16 of General Assembly decision 34/401, I take it that the Assembly wishes to declare those States elected members of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination for a three-year term beginning on 1 January 1985.

Bangladesh, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, the Netherlands, Trinidad and Tobago, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and Yugoslavia were elected members of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination for a three-year term beginning on 1 January 1985 (decision 39/312).

77. The PRESIDENT: I congratulate the States which have been elected members of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination.

78. The Assembly will now turn its attention to agenda item 16 (e), which concerns the election of the members of the Board of Governors of the United Nations Special Fund for Land-locked Developing Countries.

79. Since no candidate has been put forward, I suggest that the General Assembly decide to defer until its fortieth session the election of the members of the Board of Governors of the United Nations Special Fund for Land-locked Developing Countries. If I hear no objection, I shall take it that such is the wish of the Assembly.

It was so decided (decision 39/313).

80. The PRESIDENT: I invite members to turn their attention to the note by the Secretary-General dealing with the election of the Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme [A/39/799]. In this note, the Secretary-General informs the General Assembly that he proposes to nominate Mr. Mostafa Kamal Tolba to be Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme for a further four-year term beginning on 1 January 1985.

81. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to elect Mr. Mostafa Kamal Tolba Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme for a four-year term beginning on 1 January 1985, as recommended by the Secretary-General?

It was so decided (decision 39/314).

AGENDA ITEM 17

Appointments to fill vacancies in subsidiary organs and other appointments (continued):*

(h) Confirmation of the appointment of the executive director of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization;

(k) Confirmation of the appointment of the Executive Director of the United Nations Special Fund for Land-locked Developing Countries

82. The PRESIDENT: I invite members of the Assembly to turn to the note by the Secretary-General on agenda item 17 (h) [A/39/800], in which he proposes to reappoint Mr. Abd-El Rahman Khane as Executive Director of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization for a further period of two years ending on 31 December 1986, or until the date on which the Director-General of the new United Nations Industrial Development Organization assumes office, whichever is the earlier. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to confirm that appointment?

*Resumed from the 3rd meeting.

It was so decided (decision 39/315).

83. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the United States, who wishes to explain its position.

84. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): My delegation simply wishes to state that we have acquiesced in the appointment proposed by the Secretary-General in his note in the interest of an expeditious transition of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization into a specialized agency, and we hope that this process of transition will proceed to a conclusion with the briefest possible delay. However, our acquiescence should in no way be taken as prejudicing our choice of the permanent Executive Director of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization once that transition is concluded.

85. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now turn its attention to agenda item 17 (k).

86. In his note relating to the confirmation of the appointment of the Executive Director of the United Nations Special Fund for Land-locked Developing Countries [A/39/798], the Secretary-General states that he is not submitting an appointment for confirmation by the General Assembly. May I take it that the General Assembly decides to take note of the information contained in the note by the Secretary-General?

It was so decided (decision 39/316).

AGENDA ITEM 30

Co-operation between the United Nations and the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee: report of the Secretary-General

87. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the Secretary-General of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee, Mr. B. Sen, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 35/2 of 13 October 1980.

88. Mr. SEN (Secretary-General of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee): Sir, please allow me, on behalf of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee, to offer our warmest felicitations to you on your election to the high office of President of the General Assembly. We are fully aware of the outstanding role of your country in the cause of Afro-Asian solidarity and the leadership you have yourself provided in the efforts of the United Nations in so many areas, particularly in the struggle against apartheid.

89. It is barely three years since the General Assembly, by its resolution 36/38, adopted on the occasion of the commemoration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee, requested the Secretary-General of the United Nations to carry out consultations with the Secretary-General of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee with a view to further strengthening the co-operation between the two organizations and widening the scope of such co-operation. The report [A/39/565] presented by the Secretary-General at the present session amply bears out the progress that we have already achieved within this short time span. This satisfactory outcome is no doubt due to the significance that our member Governments attach to the Committee's role in support of the work of the United Nations; but equally important has been the active interest that the Secretary-General of the United Nations has taken in promoting co-operation in wider areas between the United Nations and our organization.

90. The areas of co-operation between our organization and the United Nations and its various organs and agencies have over the years covered extensive fields, including law, economic relations, the environment, the problem of refugees, resources of the ocean and outer space. Some of the substantive issues included in our work programme, whether by way of reference from member Governments or that were taken up by the Committee as being matters of common concern, relate to items of ongoing work of the United Nations and thus contribute to better understanding and progress of the work of the United Nations in important areas. In addition, we have undertaken specific programmes and initiatives to assist our member Governments in their participation in the work of the United Nations, to promote wider acceptance of the treaties and conventions adopted under United Nations auspices and to enhance the role of the International Court of Justice.

91. One specific area of special interest to our organization has been the work of the Sixth Committee. At the suggestion of several of our member Governments, we have during the past three years undertaken the task of preparing notes and comments on the major agenda items of the General Assembly relative to the work of the Sixth Committee and have endeavoured to arrange for informal exchanges of views within our membership on such issues. In this process, we felt convinced that continued consultations between interested delegations on the complex and intricate issues that are dealt with in the Sixth Committee were necessary for the meaningful progress of work in that forum, and that time had to be found for in-depth discussion in the Sixth Committee of those items which were in the final stages of consideration and those that related to progressive development and codification. This, it was felt, might become feasible by a rationalization of the work schedule of the Sixth Committee.

92. At a meeting of legal advisers of our member States held in November last year, some collective thinking and reflection was focused on these questions, and an informal paper was prepared containing various suggestions that had been put forward in the meeting. The ideas contained in the paper were of a preliminary nature and were advanced simply to generate discussion among interested delegations. One of the objectives behind the suggestions contained in the paper was to find ways and means to avoid the almost automatic repetition of some of the agenda items and debates, which the Secretary-General of the United Nations in his report on the work of the Organization [A/39/1] had occasion to describe as expensive, time-consuming and ineffective in terms of practical results. The informal paper was circulated as a document of the Sixth Committee

[A/C.6/38/8] at the request of 64 delegations, in order to facilitate further consultations, which were carried out at an informal level in April this year, during the meeting of the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization, and also at the beginning of the present session of the General Assembly. It was felt that the ideas contained in the paper could be tried out gradually in the work of the Sixth Committee, and we were gratified to note the careful consideration the informal paper received from the Chairman and the other members of the Sixth Committee.

93. In our work in support of the United Nations we have attached a great deal of importance to the working out of the framework and modalities through which States could reap benefits in practical terms from the norms and practices recognized in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, particularly with regard to optimum utilization of the resources of the oceans, both living and non-living. Our organization was closely involved in the process of negotiations on the law of the sea for more than a decade, and we regard the conclusion of the Convention as an outstanding achievement of the United Nations in an area where principles of international law, economic interests of nations and political realities are so inextricably interwoven. Many nations had looked forward to the new order of the oceans to meet their goals and aspirations for betterment of the living conditions of their people through access to the vast resources of the oceans, and it is in this area that efforts may now need to be made to translate the norms into reality.

94. The work of the Preparatory Commission for the International Sea-Bed Authority, to be located in Jamaica, is of great significance in spelling out the principles of common heritage over the resources of the deep sea-bed. Our organization is participating in that work and has presented papers for consideration of the Special Commission on the Enterprise. At the same time, we feel that efforts are needed to assist developing countries to reap maximum benefits from the resources that have now been brought within national jurisdictions. Even before the adoption of the Convention, some of the United Nations agencies had already drawn up plans and programmes for conservation and management of the living resources and had also taken steps towards promoting better knowledge about non-living resources that could be exploited with advantage.

95. We have felt in the course of our study on the economic, scientific and technical co-operation in the use of the Indian Ocean, which we undertook at the initiative of the Government of Sri Lanka, that if the programmes undertaken or proposed to be undertaken by the various United Nations agencies could be properly co-ordinated with the needed support and inputs by Governments, a great deal of progress could be expected towards optimum utilization of such resources. There might still be some areas which would need to be tackled through regional co-operation or national efforts, but the areas where such efforts would be productive could best be identified after due appreciation of the plans and programmes undertaken by the United Nations agencies themselves. I am happy to be able to report that our process of thinking has already found some support, and we have had the benefit of consultations with the United Nations offices and agencies concerned at an informal meeting held here at the end of September this year.

96. I should perhaps mention that the concept of regional or subregional co-operation for reaping the benefits from the resources of the oceans in an orderly manner is rapidly gaining ground in our region. For example, a subregional grouping between a number of island States, including Mauritius, Seychelles and Reunion, has already come into existence, and the Government of Sri Lanka is actively pursuing the idea of convening a conference of a group of States bordering the Indian Ocean. But even in the field of regional co-operation, a great deal of assistance and advice will be needed from the United Nations agencies. To promote national capabilities and expertise, assistance may also be needed for preparation of legal instruments in consonance with the provisions of the Convention, and perhaps also in finding matching partners for joint venture projects. We on our part have now prepared a model of legislation relating to fishery resources in the Exclusive Economic Zone; this model has been widely distributed. We have also prepared a model of an agreement for fishing by foreign nationals, as well as two models of possible joint ventures; but much more still needs to be done in co-operation with the appropriate offices and agencies of the United Nations.

97. Our organization has also been engaged for some years towards assisting in the process of international economic co-operation for development. Soon after the eleventh special session of the General Assembly, which was held from 25 August to 15 September 1980, a Ministerial Meeting on Regional Co-operation in Industry, held in Kuala Lumpur on 8 and 9 December 1980, recommended that our organization should co-ordinate the formation of an open-ended informal group of technical experts in the legal and economic fields for rendering assistance to Governments on technical aspects of issues that could be the subject matter of global negotiations. We had looked forward to the launching of global negotiations, in the expectation that the two-phased approach, as worked out at the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi in March 1983, and at the Ministerial Meeting of the Group of 77 held at Buenos Aires in April 1983 would be a realistic move towards a breakthrough. We sincerely believe that negotiations on a wide range of interrelated issues at a global level would be the best means of ensuring long-term stability in the world economic system and accelerating the economic growth of developing nations. At the same time, taking into account that the process of economic co-operation is neither an abstract nor a static concept, reflecting as it must the growing interdependence of nations, we have felt it necessary to embark on certain areas of work that could promote, encourage and strengthen that ongoing process.

98. Recognizing the fact that any form of co-operation in the economic field must necessarily depend on the mutual interests of nations, whether developed or developing, we consider it important to bring about sufficient awareness of the need for adoption of new strategies for the 1980s which could promote a concept of partnership between the North and the South, as well as between the countries of the South inter se—a partnership that would be equitable and beneficial to both sides and that could relate to the traditional industrial sectors and to new areas such as economic wealth in the Exclusive Economic Zone. It would be unrealistic in the present context to conceive of trading and investments without some benefits being imparted to the country of investment in a tangible fashion. It would be equally unrealistic to expect a flow of investments without ensuring adequate protection, whether such investments emanate from a developed or developing country. To this end, we are continuing our efforts towards improvement of the climate for investments through model bilateral agreements for promotion and protection of investments, adoption of an integrated scheme for settlement of economic and commercial disputes and preparation of a framework and guidelines for joint ventures.

99. By way of another initiative, we have decided to sponsor an informal meeting in New York this week which will bring together a selected group of participants at the senior level, drawn from our member Governments, with representatives of trade, industry and banking, including specialized institutions and United Nations agencies. The purpose of the meeting would be to identify possible sectors of investments where the concept of partnership could be promoted, types of co-operative arrangements or joint ventures that might be appropriate, and the financing of investments; also to spell out the essential factors conducive to investments, such as the protection of investments, investment incentives and modalities for settlement of disputes. We hope to plan similar meetings in the future, and we look to the United Nations offices and agencies for their continued support.

100. As a supportive step to the United Nations programmes for development in Africa, our organization, in association with the Government of Egypt, wishes to sponsor a meeting in Cairo in March next year at the senior official level to discuss the framework for bilateral co-operation in economic development between the countries of the region through the harnessing of their resources. The meeting would also consider the concrete framework needed to attract a wider flow of investments in mining and development sectors.

101. The Secretary-General, in his report on the work of the Organization [ibid.], has drawn attention to the important work that was being done by the United Nations in the humanitarian field, including the problem of refugees. Our organization initiated a study on the subject in co-operation with UNHCR as early as 1964, which culminated in the adoption of a set of principles known as the Bangkok Principles, 1966. The Bangkok Principles largely contributed to the adoption of the Declaration on Territorial Asylum [resolution 2312 (XXII)] in 1967. Further work in this area was continued in subsequent years, which resulted in the preparation of an addendum to the Bangkok Principles as well as the adoption in 1969 of a resolution on Palestinian refugees. At our Tokyo session, held last year, we decided to take up the subject once again at the suggestion of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and a preliminary study on the principle of burden-sharing will be presented at our Katmandu session in February 1985. The main purpose of the study would be to assist the efforts of the High Commissioner in the humanitarian task of dealing with the problems of refugees by incorporation of the norms and practices that have gradually emerged into a set of legal principles for application in the practices of States. We may also examine in due course matters relating to "International co-operation to avert the flow of refugees" in the context of General Assembly resolution 37/121.

102. I have tried to give an account of the background of our thinking in respect of some of the important items mentioned in the Secretary-General's report on co-operation between the United Nations and the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee. It would be our endeavour to continue the process of active co-operation as called for by General Assembly resolution 36/38 so as to ensure that our potentials are at the disposal of the United Nations when it deals with major issues in the fields of law and economic relations, as well as other areas within our competence.

103. In a few days the new year will be ushered in, which will be the fortieth anniversary year of the United Nations—a time for reflection on what we have achieved and what more can be achieved in realizing the goals and ideals of the universal Organization. The year 1985 will also mark the thirtieth anniversary of the historic Conference of Afro-Asiatic Countries, held at Bandung in 1955, out of which our organization had emerged. That Conference had also given the impetus for the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, embracing as it does as many as 103 nations from all parts of the globe. The fortieth anniversary of the United Nations will call for the harnessing of our energies and resources in support of the United Nations, to set in motion an era of peace and economic co-operation among nations for development. In this endeavour, we will sadly miss the guiding hand of Mrs. Indira Gandhi, the late Prime Minister of India and the Chairperson of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries. We deeply mourn her loss and pay our humble homage to the memory of the departed soul.

104. The PRESIDENT: I call now on the representative of Japan to introduce draft resolution A/39/L.34 and Add.1.

105. Mr. KURODA (Japan): I should like first of all to thank Mr. Sen, the Secretary-General of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee, for his useful introductory statement which I listened to with great interest. I am also grateful to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for his informative report on co-operation between the United Nations and the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee [A/39/565].

106. As one of its founding members, Japan attaches great importance to the work of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee. Established in 1956 for the study of legal and technical questions common to Asia and Africa, the Committee has since become a major forum for Asian-African co-operation in legal matters. Gradually orienting its activities to complement the work of the United Nations at the regional level, the Committee was accorded observer status with the United Nations during the thirty-fifth session of the General Assembly [resolution 35/2]. Its membership has grown from the original seven States to 40 States from the two continents, reflecting both the expansion of its activities and the spirit of co-operation among the Committee's members, as well as the untiring efforts of the Secretariat.

107. I should like to pay particular tribute to Mr. Sen, who has faithfully served as the Committee's Secretary-General ever since it was created. Indeed, the steady development of the Committee is in large part traceable to his unflagging enthusiasm and purposeful leadership, which have been a source of encouragement to each of the Committee's members.

108. I wish to take this opportunity to pay tribute also to the late Mr. Soeleimar H. Tajibnapis, who was the Permanent Observer of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee to the United Nations. Until his untimely death last summer, Mr. Tajibnapis worked tirelessly for the Committee, particularly in advancing its co-operation with the United Nations. He will long be remembered for the valuable contribution he made to the work of the Committee.

109. In providing a forum for the free exchange of views and the discussion of common legal problems among experts from Asian and African countries having diverse economic and social systems, the Committee continues to contribute to the deepening of understanding and the promotion of friendly relations among countries in the two regions. But interest in the Committee extends beyond Asia and Africa, as evidenced by the increasing number of observers from countries on other continents which attend the regular sessions of the Committee. In fact, more than 30 such countries participated in the latest session, which was held in May 1983 at Tokyo.

110. Through its co-operation with the various bodies of the United Nations, the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee has clearly contributed to the promotion of peace and prosperity not only in the Asian-African region but throughout the international community as a whole. In addition to conducting regular consultations with the relevant United Nations bodies, during the past year the Committee organized joint seminars with the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law, as well as meetings between legal advisers and Sixth Committee representatives to discuss various matters falling within the competence of the Committee. The Committee has also been actively promoting wider acceptance and ratification of multilateral treaties concluded under the auspices of the United Nations. It is also undertaking studies for the promotion of a wider use of the International Court of Justice by Asian-African countries.

111. These are just some areas in which the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee and the United Nations are working together to pursue common goals and to strengthen co-operation on legal matters of common concern.

112. We are convinced that the ever-deepening relations of co-operation between the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee and the world Organization will greatly benefit the countries of Asia and Africa and, indeed, countries throughout the international community.

113. Accordingly, on behalf of all the sponsors, I have great pleasure in introducing draft resolution A/39/L.34 and Add.1, which I recommend that the General Assembly adopt by consensus.

114. Mr. PEMMARAJU (India): It is with great interest and appreciation that we read the report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Organization and heard the statement made by the Secretary-General of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee on the ongoing co-operation between the United Nations and the Committee. It is a matter of pleasure and pride for us members of the Committee to see and to contribute to the growing work and importance of the Committee in various areas of international law. Its work covers not only highly important and technical fields of international law, such as the law of treaties, commercial arbitration and judicial assistance, but also extends to such vital areas of interest to the international community as the environment, outer space, optimum utilization of ocean space and its resources, international trade and economic relations. Over the years, the Committee has also made, and continues to make, significant contributions to the humanitarian aspects of law, including the law of refugees.

115. Thanks to the imaginative leadership provided by Mr. Sen, Secretary-General of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee, and the dedicated efforts of a small but highly competent staff, the Committee has grown not only as a respectable body providing reports and analysis on contemporary issues, but also as a significant forum for the exchange of views and the articulation of common interests. The meetings sponsored by the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee—be they annual sessions or other inter-sessional meetings on specialized topics and seminars—are attended not only by members of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee, which now includes 40 States, but also by several other States from all parts and regions of the world, representatives of the United Nations, its specialized agencies, representatives of the International Court of Justice, the International Law Commission and the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law. Such wide and distinguished participation in the work of the Committee is indeed an indication of the measure of the value attached by the international community to the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee as a forum for exchange and harmonization of views. In this connection, we have no doubt that the next annual meeting of the Committee, scheduled to be held in Katmandu, will be a success, as was its session in Tokyo in 1983. The agenda for that meeting promises a rich fare on matters of current interest and of practical significance, not only to members of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee but also to the Members of the United Nations in general.

116. As the reports of the Secretaries-General of the United Nations and the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee have made very clear, the work and activities undertaken by the Committee are closely co-ordinated to promote objectives and matters of specific interest to the United Nations. The Committee effectively participates as an observer in the work of the United Nations, particularly during the sessions of the General Assembly. Its contribution to the work of the Sixth Committee, in particular, deserves special mention. In the last three years, since it has been admitted as an observer, the Committee has been able not only to help its member States with notes, memoranda and briefs on various agenda items before the Sixth Committee but was also able to recommend a number of ideas for rationalization of the procedures of the work of the Sixth Committee. In this connection, the informal meetings organized by the Committee involving legal advisers of the member States of the Committee and attended also by several other representatives as observers, last year proved very timely and yielded an excellent and frank exchange of views which were welcomed by the Sixth Committee.

117. This year the Committee has taken yet another positive and innovative initiative to promote the broader goals of the global negotiations in a concrete manner by organizing three-day informal consultations in New York between the representatives of the member Governments of the Committee and representatives of trade, industry and banking, which are also to be attended by United Nations specialized agencies and other institutions. The informal atmosphere expected at this meeting on global economic partnership, preceded by a careful preparation by the Committee, will help us consider various ideas on joint ventures, experience of foreign investment in traditional sectors as well as new areas, a framework for investment, conditions for investment and mode of financing, control, management, modalities for settlement of disputes, and of course, the most important problem of debt crisis.

118. We are confident that the mutually advantageous co-operation that exists between the United Nations and the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee will continue to expand to the benefit of the international community. Such co-operation is essential and will surely serve the cause of world peace and order, based on respect for international law and justice. Accordingly, as a sponsor of draft resolution A/39/L.34 and Add.1, and like the representative of Japan, we commend it to the General Assembly for adoption by consensus.

119. May I conclude my statement by paying our humble homage to Mr. Tajibnapis, in whose death we have lost a friend, a diplomat and a tireless worker for the cause of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee.

120. The PRESIDENT: I wish to inform Members that Senegal has also become a sponsor of the draft resolution.

121. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt draft resolution A/39/L.34 Add.1?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/47).

The meeting rose at 5.05 p.m.

United Nations

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

THIRTY-NINTH SESSION

Official Records

94th PLENARY MEETING

Tuesday, 11 December 1984, at 11.05 a.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia)

AGENDA ITEM 10

Report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Organization

1. The PRESIDENT: In previous years, the General Assembly has taken note of the report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Organization. This document has been referred to with great interest on several occasions in the course of this session. If I hear no objection, I shall take it that the Assembly wishes to take note of the report of the Secretary-General [A/39/1].

It was so decided (decision 39/413).

AGENDA ITEM 13

Report of the International Court of Justice

2. The PRESIDENT: May I take it that the General Assembly takes note of the report of the International Court of Justice covering the period from 1 August 1983 to 31 July 1984 [A/39/4]?

It was so decided (decision 39/414).

AGENDA ITEM 27

Question of the Comorian island of Mayotte: report of the Secretary-General

3. The PRESIDENT: I call on Mr. Said Kafe Madi Soilihi, Minister for Foreign Affairs and Co-operation of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros, to introduce draft resolution A/39/L.42.

4. Mr. Said Kafe MADI SOILIHI (Comoros) (interpretation from French): The Assembly is meeting here to discuss for the ninth consecutive year this painful problem which is a matter of concern not only to the people and Government of the Comoros but also to the international community as a whole. I refer to the question of the Comorian island of Mayotte.

5. Every time the Assembly has had to consider this question we have tried to show, by citing specific facts, how this problem, which arose because of an injustice and a flagrant violation of both international law and internal French law, had been trumped up by rather subtle procedures in order to destroy the unity of our country and preserve special interests.

6. I should like to describe the situation once again to the Assembly and provide it with some points of information to shed some light on this debate.

7. In this Assembly and in all other international and regional organizations in which this matter has been discussed, we have always stated that Mayotte is, and cannot but be, Comorian land. France, during its 130 years in the Comoros, never questioned or challenged the unity of the Comorian archipelago; in fact, it did the opposite.

8. Basing themselves on history, successive French Governments, on many occasions, emphasized the need to respect the territorial unity of a country whose homogeneous people share the same language, the same culture and the same religion—something which is quite rare. Thus, this unity is not, as some would try to claim, based on artificial grounds or administrative convenience. Rather, this unity derives from the common history of the sister islands that make up the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros: the islands of Anjouan, Grande-Comore, Mayotte and Mohéli.

9. It is therefore clear that all French laws and administrative arrangements adopted during the colonial period recognized the unity of the Comorian archipelago. The French law of 9 May 1946, to begin only with that one, states that the archipelago is "a territory enjoying administrative and financial autonomy"; and in its explanatory statement it indicates clearly: "it is the Muslim religion which gives the archipelago its strong unity, reinforced by a single language, Swahili".

10. The legislators would not have proceeded in such a way unless nature had bequeathed to us this unity, which was thus reaffirmed and consolidated by the law which granted internal autonomy to the Comorian archipelago on 3 January 1968.

11. When France was led to recognize the desire of the Comoros for independence, agreements were signed in Paris on 15 June 1973 between representatives of the French Government and representatives of the local government of the Comoros. Those agreements provided, among other things, that a referendum would be organized in the Comoros and that, if the majority of the population made a choice in favour of independence, the overall results, for all of the four islands as a whole, would have the effect that the Chamber of Deputies on that date would be granted the powers of a constituent assembly, and the President of the local Government Council would be granted the competence and prerogatives of Head of State.

12. That provision faithfully reflects the emphasis placed on the undeniable unity of our archipelago on the eve of its self-determination, and it was supported by solemn statements made by the highest French authorities at the time.

13. Thus, the Secretary of State for French Overseas Departments and Territories stated on 26 August 1974, in speaking about our self-determination, that the French Government had chosen in favour of a general referendum for three reasons:

> "first, for the legal reason that under the rules of international law a territory retains the frontiers that it had as a colony; secondly, a multiplicity of different statutes for the various islands of the archipelago is inconceivable; thirdly, it is not for France to set the Comorians against each other."

Mr. Olivier Stirn went on to state that France refuses to divide the Comoros, which have the same people, the same Islamic religion and the same economic interests.

14. Two months later, these points were confirmed by the President of the French Republic, Mr. Valéry Giscard d'Estaing, who stated at a press conference on 24 October 1974:

> " . . . Is it reasonable to imagine that one part of the archipelago should become independent and that one island, whatever feelings of sympathy we may have for the inhabitants, should maintain a different status?
> "I believe that we must accept contemporary reality. The Comoros are a unity, they have always been a unity, and it is natural that they should share the same fate . . .
> "On the occasion of the independence of a territory, we should not propose to break the unity of what has always been the single archipelago of the Comoros."

15. As can be seen from those statements, there was absolutely no confusion concerning the unity of our country, and that unity was not challenged. That is why the people of the Comoros went quite tranquilly to the ballot boxes to decide their future on 22 December 1974, in accordance with the agreements of 15 June 1973 and the law of 23 November 1974 concerning the organization of the referendum on self-determination. The Comorians pronounced themselves, by an overwhelming majority of 95 per cent, in favour of independence for their country.

16. On the basis of that clear and unambiguous response, it was incumbent upon the French Government and Parliament to endorse the results of the ballot and to act in accordance with the agreements of June 1973. Thus, a draft bill was submitted on 10 June 1975 to the National Assembly for ratification of the referendum on self-determination. That draft bill was in accordance with the procedure agreed upon in the 1973 accords, namely, overall independence for the archipelago on a date fixed by the two parties. Unfortunately, to the great surprise of everyone, something quite different occurred.

17. The French Government, completely rejecting its own commitments, adopted on 3 July 1975 another law, described in the Comoros as an iniquitous law, for it called into question the original bill and made the accession of the Comoros to independence subject to completely new and unacceptable conditions on the pretext that part of the population in Mayotte had pronounced itself against independence. The Comorian people were shocked, and international public opinion made known its indignation and disappointment. The French Government thus violated not only its own internal law but also international public law. Indeed, it violated the sacrosanct rule of the indivisibility of overseas territories and colonial entities, so dear to the French Constitution, and it also completely ignored the sacred principle of the inviolability of borders inherited from the colonial period.

18. Drawing the necessary conclusions from those new provisions adopted by the French authorities, President Ahmed Abdallah Abderemane, backed by the clearly expressed will of the Comorian people and with the approval of the local Chamber of Deputies, unilaterally proclaimed the independence of the Comoros on 6 July 1975.

19. Because of the justice of our cause, recognition by the international community of our independence was immediate and massive. Indeed, my country was admitted to the United Nations on 12 November 1975 as a sovereign State composed of four islands, including Mayotte, and that was done by the unanimous adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 3385 (XXX).

20. That resolution, in conformity with General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 2621 (XXV), concerning the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, thus proclaimed the sovereignty of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros over the whole of the territory that it inherited from the colonial period.

21. However, determined to pursue to the end its illegal plan to occupy part of our territory, despite the relevant resolutions of the United Nations, the French Government adopted, on 31 December 1975, a law recognizing the dismemberment of our country. That law recognized, admittedly, the independence of the Comorian State, but it was a State from which part of its territory, the island of Mayotte, had been cut off. This unjust and arbitrary action was immediately condemned by the international community, which regarded it as interference in the internal affairs of the young Comorian State. Thus, the French Government, seeking justification and legal pretext for its show of force, decided to organize two referendums on the island of Mayotte on 8 February and 11 April 1976.

22. The argument advanced was that the inhabitants of that island should have the opportunity to express their wishes concerning their future; but mention was deliberately omitted of the fact that this was not a case of giving up a territory or an addition or exchange as provided for in article 53 of the French Constitution. An attempt was made to present it in that way, incorrectly; but what was in fact involved was a secession from a single territory, the Comorian archipelago, for which the procedures and modalities had proceeded in proper form.

23. It is also deliberately forgotten that, as my country had already been admitted to membership of the United Nations on 12 November 1975, with full respect for the principle of territorial integrity, these two referendums were undeniably an infringement of the decolonization charter of the United Nations. In this context, I would recall that the response of the Organization was absolutely clear. In resolution 31/4, adopted on 21 October 1976, the General Assembly declared that France's occupation of Mayotte "constitutes a flagrant encroachment on the national unity of the Comorian State", and that the Assembly:

> "Condemns and considers null and void the referendums of 8 February and 11 April 1976 organized in the Comorian island of Mayotte by the Government of France, and rejects:

> "(a) Any other form of referendum or consultation which may hereafter be organized on Comorian territory in Mayotte by France."

24. Like the United Nations, most major international and regional organizations that regularly deal with this question have quite rightly expressed their disapproval.

25. Thus, the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi from 7 to 12 March 1983, reaffirmed in its Political Declaration the undeniable sovereignty of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros over the island of Mayotte. It stated:

> "With regard to the Comorian island of Mayotte, which is still under French occupation, the Heads of State or Government reaffirmed that it is an integral part of the sovereign territory of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros. They also expressed their active solidarity with the people of the Comoros in their legitimate efforts to recover that island and preserve the independence, unity and territorial integrity of the Comoros. The Heads of State or Government reaffirmed their support for the overall results of the referendum carried out on 22 December 1974 in the entire territory of the Comoros and rejected all proposals for a new referendum in Mayotte."[1]

26. Our cause is supported also by the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the Organization of African Unity [OAU], which, at each of their sessions, have called on France to return Mayotte to the Comorian State.

27. Let me recall here that at the time when our country was being subjected to this injustice, several voices were heard in France strongly condemning these actions and protesting against them. For example, the deputies of the French Socialist Party, in the opposition at the time, submitted to the Constitutional Council of their country on 13 December 1975 an application condemning the law relating to the consequences of self-determination for the Comorian islands. They quite rightly expressed the opinion that the French law recognizing the sovereignty of the Comorian State over only three islands of the archipelago, but not over the island of Mayotte, was unconstitutional. I shall quote a few arguments from that application in order to shed more light on this question. It stated:

> "We consider that this law is contrary to the Constitution for the following reasons: whenever the legislature or the executive has acted, it has done so on the basis that the archipelago of the Comoros was a single territory . . . Thus, it is quite clear that the French Republic has never called into question the territorial unity of the Comoros archipelago while international public opinion has constantly felt that the four Comorian islands were a single territory dependent on and administered by the French Republic under the conditions set forth in articles 72 et seq. of the Constitution."

That is a very clear, unequivocal position.

28. Even today, some statements made by the highest French authorities on similar problems or on the question of Mayotte recognize explicitly our unity and the good grounds for our position. Thus, speaking of Chad, the Head of State of France, Mr. François Mitterrand, stated:

> "We cannot accept this de facto situation becoming a recognized act of partition. The independence, sovereignty and integrity of any State recognized by international society is a fundamental principle of French policy . . . "

29. Looking at that important statement, one cannot fail to draw the parallel between the inviolability of the frontiers of Chad and those of the Comoros. Indeed, in one case as in the other, the international community has recognized this.

30. Only very recently, the French Minister of the Interior and Decentralization for Overseas Departments and Territories, Mr. Georges Lemoine, when questioned about the political future of Mayotte, stated to the newspaper Le Monde that:

> "We cannot just cover our eyes and say that all the problems relating to the question of Mayotte have been solved . . . After all, there are international forums and international rules, especially those that remind us that decolonization takes place within the perimeters of what had been colonized and that the Comorian entity was made up of four islands. The Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros is still justified in stating that decolonization was not complete and that, on the level of sovereignty, Mayotte is a dependency of the Comoros."

31. Hence, it can be quite easily appreciated that today we are entitled to be astonished when, such positions having been taken, there is still this effort to claim that yet another referendum on self-determination should be organized in one part of our national territory.

32. As we have already said, it is not a question of reversing the roles in this specific case of concern to us. We are not asking for the addition to our country of one part of French territory; rather, we are simply asking for the restitution of part of our national territory under the sacred law of the inviolability of frontiers inherited from the times of colonization.

33. As we have said time and again, the solution to this problem is not to be found in the repeated organization of referendums that have been condemned and rejected in advance and declared illegal by the international community as a whole. The solution can come only from honest and sincere dialogue and agreement between the two States, France and the Comoros, in accordance with the relevant recommendations and resolutions of international organizations.

34. As far as we are concerned, we have always expressed our willingness, in that spirit, to reach a just and swift solution to this problem. It is high time for our voice to be heeded. And we justifiably consider that the sooner this is done the better, if we wish to avoid tragic and regrettable situations such as those that we witness, alas, in other parts of the world. It is indeed imperative to prevent such situations in order to maintain the atmosphere of tranquillity which does prevail in our region.

35. The people and Government of the Comoros are aware of the rightness and justice of their claim. There is no argument whatsoever that could shake their determination that the struggle they are waging to regain their territorial integrity is a legitimate one. This year again, they will greatly appreciate the constant and unanimous support that will be evidenced by the United Nations in adopting the draft resolution now before the General Assembly, endorsing our position in this debate. We sincerely hope that the draft resolution will be adopted unanimously.

36. Mr. OYOUÉ (Gabon) (interpretation from French): The General Assembly is again considering the question of the Comorian island of Mayotte. A member of the OAU Ad Hoc Committee of Seven on the Comorian Island of Mayotte, the Gabon delegation is pleased to participate in this debate.

37. I should first like to recall that the Ad Hoc Committee of Seven, which was established in July 1976, under resolution CM/496, adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its twenty-seventh ordinary session, is to propose solutions for the problem we are considering today. I wish also to point out that the membership of this committee is made up mainly of African countries, including Algeria, Cameroon, the Comoros, Madagascar, Mozambique, Senegal and Gabon, which serves as Chairman.

38. In the course of the thirty-eighth session of the General Assembly, my delegation expressed its hope [65th meeting] that this question would be settled as speedily as possible. We were encouraged by the mutual understanding expressed by both parties, as well as by the fact that they seemed to be evincing good will in an effort to achieve a just and lasting solution to the problem by means of negotiation.

39. In the course of the current session, our country's position has not fundamentally changed, since there have been no new positive developments.

40. At any rate, my delegation is gratified at the fact that the two Governments—French and Comorian—have demonstrated their readiness to engage in dialogue. This has been demonstrated by the trip to Paris for a visit of friendship and work in June 1984 by President Abdallah, the Head of State of the Comoros. While it is unfortunate to note that the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee of Seven was not informed of the results of the talks, our country still considers that such a step is a good sign. Indeed, at a time when many States frequently settle their disputes by force, one must actively support those States that agree to settle their conflicts by peaceful means, in accordance with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations.

41. However, despite the climate of confidence and friendship between the two parties, it must be acknowledged that no significant progress has been made since the Assembly discussed the question at its thirty-eighth session [64th and 65th meetings]. The current situation, which is akin to a status quo, cannot go on indefinitely, since that would run the risk of impeding the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros from exercising its sovereignty over all of its national territory, in accordance with international law. In this regard, we shall continue to recall the fact that, in the colonial era, the Comorian archipelago formed a geographical whole. Moreover, the organization of a referendum on self-determination by the Administering Power in 1974 confirmed that reality, because that procedure was applied to all of the territory and not island by island. It is self-evident that the new independent State of the Comoros encompasses quite logically all of this former colonial territory, that is to say, the islands of Anjouan, Grande-Comore, Mayotte and Mohéli.

42. At the regional level, the OAU, which has considered this question, entirely endorses this approach to the problem. Within this context, Gabon, in its capacity as Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee of Seven of the OAU, took some initiatives with the French and Comorian authorities in order to reach a settlement to the dispute. In addition to the thirty-eighth, thirty-ninth and fortieth regular sessions of the Council of Ministers of the OAU, which were held in 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively, our country attempted to organize a meeting of that body so that we might define a programme of action regarding this problem. But given the lack of a quorum, and because of the crisis the OAU was experiencing at that time, those meetings could not take place.

43. However, quite recently, on the proposal of his Comorian colleague, Mr. Martin Bongo, Minister of State and Minister for Foreign Affairs and Co-operation of the Gabonese Republic, in a letter dated 25 May 1984, proposed to the French Minister for Foreign Affairs that he receive a mission from the Ad Hoc Committee of Seven during the first two weeks of July 1984. We are still awaiting a reaction from the French side to this request, a request that two months ago was again made through diplomatic channels by the Gabonese authorities.

44. With the unblocking of the situation after the last summit meeting of Heads of State and Government of the OAU, Gabon believes that the Ad Hoc Committee of Seven will be more dynamic and pursue its activities. In this connection, my delegation would like to emphasize the particular interest that El Hadj Omar Bongo, President of the Gabonese Republic and Head of State, attaches to a peaceful settlement of this dispute, as well as to the initiatives for a settlement.

45. In these circumstances, Gabon, in its capacity as the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee of Seven on the Comorian Island of Mayotte, would like once again urgently to appeal to the French Government to redouble its efforts and continue the dialogue with the Government of Moroni, so that it will be possible, together, to find the most suitable ways and means to reach a final settlement based on legitimate rights and safeguarding the interests of the parties, with full respect for the complete sovereignty of the Comorian State over the entire archipelago, including the Comorian island of Mayotte.

46. Mr. KRISHNAN (India): The question of the Comorian island of Mayotte has been before us for over eight years now. Each year, the Assembly has reaffirmed the sovereignty of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros over Mayotte and has called for the achievement of a just solution to the problem through negotiations between the Governments of France and Comoros.

47. In the statement he has just made, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and Co-operation of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros made a comprehensive and lucid presentation of the question.

48. The Movement of Non-Aligned Countries has consistently attached importance to a prompt settlement of the question of Mayotte. At the Meeting of Ministers and Heads of Delegation of the Non-Aligned Countries to the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly, held in New York from 1 to 5 October 1984, the Ministers and Heads of Delegation reaffirmed that Mayotte "is an integral part of the sovereign territory of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros and called upon the Government of France to promptly terminate its occupation over the island" [see A/39/560, para. 47].

49. Earlier, at their Seventh Conference, held at New Delhi from 7 to 12 March 1983, the Heads of State or Government of non-aligned countries had "reaffirmed their support for the overall results of the referendum carried out on 22 December 1974 in the entire territory of Comoros and rejected all proposals for a new referendum in Mayotte."[1]

50. While it is indeed a matter of disappointment that no progress has been made towards a solution of the question of the Comorian island of Mayotte, the continuing contacts between the parties concerned are a source of some encouragement. The stated commitment of the current French leadership actively to seek a just settlement of the question is another positive factor. Consideration by the Assembly of this question today provides us, the non-aligned countries, with an opportunity to urge that efforts to find a peaceful and negotiated solution to the question of Mayotte be intensified with a view to their early fruition. It is our sincere hope that the commitments given prior to the referendum on self-determination of December 1974 concerning respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Comoros will be honoured.

51. In this connection, we were encouraged to note the commitment of the Government of France, as reiterated most recently in the note verbale, dated 10 September 1984, which the Permanent Mission of France to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General and which is cited in the Secretary-General's report, as follows:

> "The atmosphere of trust which has been established between France and the Comoros is conducive to the continuation of a constructive dialogue between the two Governments with the aim of finding a solution to the problem of Mayotte that is acceptable to all, in conformity with international law and the Constitution of the French Republic." [See (A/39/518, para. 5.]

52. At the same time, I am also constrained to recall the point stressed in the note verbale, dated 1 September 1984, which the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Co-operation and External Trade of the Comoros addressed to the Secretary-General and which is also cited in the Secretary-General's report, as follows:

> "in spite of the willingness repeatedly proclaimed by the latter [the Head of State of France] to seek with the Comorian side without delay a just solution to the problem within the framework of Franco-Comorian friendship, no specific proposal has been put forward by the French authorities" [ibid., para. 4].

53. I venture to believe, on the basis of these assertions by the two sides, that the gap separating the two positions is not that wide and that, with the requisite good will and renewed effort, a peaceful negotiated solution will soon be found to this problem, which has unfortunately been left pending in the process of decolonization of the Comoros archipelago.

54. Mr. SARRÉ (Senegal) (interpretation from French): For almost nine years now the General Assembly has considered the question of the Comorian island of Mayotte. As everyone will recall, this question was first inscribed on the agenda of the General Assembly in 1976, at its thirty-first session [item 122]. Since that time, the international community has been following the matter with interest at the level of the United Nations, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the OAU. Thus, over the years, from one session to another of these different forums, it has followed carefully the tireless efforts of the parties involved, namely, France and the Comoros, and by the relevant organs of the bodies cited to bring about a just and lasting settlement of the question.

55. However, we must point out that for some time now there has been no major development in this matter. Since the meeting three years ago of the OAU Ad Hoc Committee of Seven, which deals with the question of the Comorian island of Mayotte and of which my country, Senegal, is a member, and since the Niamey session in August 1982 of the Organization of the Islamic Conference, no substantive progress has been made towards a negotiated solution.

56. It is regrettable that the constructive proposals made by the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the solemn commitment entered into by the parties directly concerned on the settlement of the question of Mayotte through negotiation have not brought about the desired results.

57. In his communication dated 8 June 1984 [see A/39/518, para. 3], the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity reported to the Secretary-General of the United Nations that the problem of Mayotte had not evolved at all, despite numerous contacts at the highest level between the Comorian and French Governments.

58. The Senegalese delegation is aware of the delicate nature of this problem. That is why it is convinced that only persistent efforts at dialogue by the parties can create the conditions required for a just solution that is acceptable to all. It is therefore glad that in their frank and cordial bilateral relations, the Comoros and France have shown the international community that they have a common desire to overcome the difficulties still facing them and to move towards a truly constructive dialogue.

59. The Minister for Foreign Affairs and Co-operation of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros, Mr. Said Kafe Madi Soilihi, and the representative of France have always said that their Governments are willing to continue negotiations in a spirit of mutual understanding.

60. This common desire to find an honourable solution to the question of the Comorian island of Mayotte strengthens our conviction that a peaceful, just and lasting settlement of the question of Mayotte is possible provided the parties to the dispute make more determined efforts to ensure the speedy resumption of their talks.

61. We therefore call earnestly for a swift resumption of the dialogue, which must be in the spirit of the Charter of the OAU and the relevant resolutions of the United Nations, particularly resolution 3385 (XXX), in which the General Assembly reaffirmed the necessity of respecting the unity and territorial integrity of the Comorian archipelago, composed, need I recall, of the islands of Anjouan, Grande-Comore, Mayotte and Mohéli.

62. It is essential that a just solution rapidly be found to the question of the Comorian island of Mayotte, for that question could, with time, threaten international peace and security.

63. The United Nations, one of whose main tasks is to promote peace and understanding between peoples and nations, must take the opportunity offered by the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly to issue an urgent appeal to the parties directly concerned to move resolutely towards a process leading to the drafting without further delay of an agreement that will provide a final solution to the problem of Mayotte.

64. My country, which has the advantage of having excellent relations with France and with the Comoros, will spare no effort to make its modest contribution to the attainment of an honourable solution to this problem. Provided that solution is a just and lasting one, it will, we believe, have the best possible effect on relations between France and the Comoros and between the French and the Comorian peoples, who, in addition to the historical and cultural ties that bind them, are both equally devoted to the ideals of international peace and solidarity.

65. Mr. AL-GHAFARY (Oman) (interpretation from Arabic): It is nine years since the United Nations first took up the question of the Comorian island of Mayotte. Despite the resolutions of the Organization and other international and regional bodies, such as the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and the OAU, all of them calling for a prompt, just solution to this question and for serious negotiations aimed at eliminating what is considered a legacy of colonialism, we have yet to see any visible progress in the matter. This question has been brought before the United Nations time and again without a just and comprehensive solution being found.

66. In keeping with the policy of my country based on respect for the independence, unity, national sovereignty and territorial integrity of all States and the inadmissibility of foreign intervention in their internal affairs, from this international rostrum we call upon the parties concerned to find a solution to this problem by peaceful means, with respect for the sovereignty and national independence of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros.

67. The Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros has shown full understanding of and responsiveness to the appeals made by various regional and international organizations for the speedy solution of this problem, but there has been no visible progress, especially with regard to the implementation of General Assembly resolution 37/65, which called for negotiations between the parties concerned, France and the Comoros, in order to hasten the return of Mayotte to the motherland. It is important to recall that when the General Assembly admitted the Comoros to membership of the United Nations in 1975, it also reaffirmed the necessity of respecting the unity and territorial integrity of that country, which consists, as is well known, of an archipelago of four islands—Anjouan, Grande-Comore, Mayotte and Mohéli—with a single people having a common history and heritage.

68. The United Nations, one of whose main functions, as described in the Preamble to its Charter, is the promotion of peace and understanding among nations and peoples, must encourage the adoption of initiatives and resolutions which will, it is hoped, lead to the prompt resumption of negotiations and the drafting of an agreement between France and the Comoros which would provide the final solution to this problem.

69. As a member State of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, Oman affirms the necessity of taking into consideration the Political Declaration of the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi from 7 to 12 March 1983, as it relates to the Comorian island of Mayotte. In that declaration, the Heads of State or Government reaffirmed that the Comorian island of Mayotte

> "is an integral part of the sovereign territory of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros. They also expressed their active solidarity with the people of the Comoros in their legitimate efforts to recover that island and preserve the independence, unity and territorial integrity of the Comoros. The Heads of State or Government reaffirmed their support for the overall results of the referendum carried out on 22 December 1974 in the entire territory of the Comoros and rejected all proposals for a new referendum in Mayotte."[1]

That appeal was made because that cause is just.

70. Oman's special interest in this question and its desire that an honourable solution to it be found is in keeping with the relations of friendship that link it to the two parties to the dispute. Our position on this question is very clear; it is one of full support for the sovereignty of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros over the island of Mayotte, which has been affirmed in resolutions of the General Assembly. We favour a fruitful dialogue between the two parties to the dispute so that understanding may prevail between them, bound together as they are by a long history of friendly and cordial relations.

71. In reading the report of the Secretary-General [A/39/518], we find that, regrettably, there appears to have been no progress on this question, judging by the correspondence between the parties concerned, the United Nations and the OAU. We call upon the United Nations to make further efforts to reactivate negotiations in order to bring about the settlement of this serious question without further delay.

72. The delegation of Oman is a sponsor—as it has been of similar draft resolutions in previous years—of the draft resolution regarding the Comorian island of Mayotte [A/39/L.42] now before the General Assembly. We therefore call upon the United Nations to promote negotiations and to urge the parties concerned to enter into them seriously in order to resolve the problem. Oman hopes that a prompt solution will be found, in the interest of the parties concerned and in implementation of the relevant international resolutions, with respect for the sovereignty and independence of the Comorian island of Mayotte. Thus peace and stability may prevail in that part of the world and a flame of peace may be lighted that will herald the beginning of the end of the pressing problems whose solution would be a service to the whole of mankind. This has always been the conviction that has guided the foreign policy of my country.

73. Mr. ZAIN (Malaysia): The policy of my Government in relation to the question of the Comorian island of Mayotte, which is now before the Assembly, is guided by the following factors: first and foremost, our conviction that the island of Mayotte is an integral and inseparable part of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros and that the unity, territorial integrity and sovereignty of the Comoros must be respected; secondly, our firm commitment to come out in defence of the independence, unity and territorial integrity of all States and, more specifically in this instance, our firm opposition to the dismemberment of a territory in the process of decolonization; thirdly, our ties of warm friendship and our co-operative relations with both France and the Comoros; fourthly, our deep admiration of and respect for the Government of the Comoros for the calm, reasoned, measured and open-minded manner in which it has pursued, and continues to pursue, through peaceful means, its just cause of reuniting the island of Mayotte with the rest of the Comorian archipelago, as well as for its continuing faith in and commitment to the United Nations to assist in the resolution of this problem; fifthly, our regret that France has not lived up to its best traditions to resolve this long outstanding issue; sixthly, our concern that the continued delay in the resolution of this issue may exacerbate the situation, complicate its resolution and be detrimental to peace and stability in that region of Africa; and seventhly, our distress that even on a matter such as this, in which the issues at hand are surely clear and unequivocal, the will of the international community, as expressed in the forums of the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the OAU, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and here at the United Nations itself, still awaits its full implementation.

74. For all these reasons, my delegation has asked to speak in order to express our full support for draft resolution A/39/L.42. We wish to appeal once more to the two parties concerned—in particular to France, whose historic tradition, at its best, should place it on the side of freedom and full independence and whose commitments concerning respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Comoros, given in December 1974, prior to the referendum on self-determination, are unequivocal—to negotiate in good faith so that the resolution of this problem may be pursued energetically and effectively. This issue has been before the Assembly for far too long, since its thirty-first session to be precise. We are encouraged by some developments, more specifically the continuing efforts by France and the Comoros to increase co-operation in many fields which, we trust, will facilitate the search for a peaceful solution to the outstanding question between them relating to the island of Mayotte. We are also encouraged by the statement of the representative of France, at the thirty-eighth session of the General Assembly, that: "The status of Mayotte is provisional . . . which does not close the door on any development" [65th meeting, para. 43].

75. We appeal to the Government of France to redouble its efforts and to continue its dialogue with the Government of the Comoros with a view to restoring the island of Mayotte to the Comoros, of which it is an integral part. It is Malaysia's earnest hope that, as a result, this item will not appear on the agenda of the fortieth session of the General Assembly, which can only redound to the credit of a great nation.

76. Mr. BHATIA (Pakistan): Pakistan enjoys close and friendly relations with both France and the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros, and it is for this reason that we desire to see a speedy solution of the question of Mayotte, which remains the outstanding issue between the two countries. Our interest in the speedy settlement of the issue also stems from the fact that this problem concerns the territorial integrity of a sister Islamic and non-aligned country. The continued separation of Mayotte from other islands of the Comorian archipelago, over which the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros exercises its sovereignty, is also hurting the economy of this newly independent State, as well as of the archipelago as a whole.

77. The international concern over the continuation of the Mayotte question is evident in the repeated resolutions which have been adopted by the General Assembly during the past eight years, as well as in other international forums, including the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the OAU. In addition to the unambiguous reaffirmation of the sovereignty of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros over the island of Mayotte, the decisions taken at all those forums have consistently emphasized the need for negotiations between France and the Comoros with a view to achieving an honourable and just agreement. It is disappointing that no significant progress has been achieved in the negotiations which have thus far been held intermittently between the two parties to discuss the issue.

78. In considering the question of Mayotte, we find the following factors to be relevant. First, on 13 December 1974, the General Assembly, by virtue of resolution 3291 (XXIX), reaffirmed the unity and territorial integrity of the Comoros and emphasized that the archipelago comprises the islands of Anjouan, Grande-Comore, Mayotte and Mohéli. Secondly, General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, clearly maintains that the principle of self-determination should apply to a colonial entity as a whole. Thirdly, the Government of France has declared its position, indicating its readiness to engage in a dialogue with the Government of the Comoros in a constructive spirit and to seek a just solution of the question of Mayotte. Fourthly, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the OAU have consistently emphasized the need for negotiations. The emphasis is found in the General Assembly resolutions which have been adopted since the Assembly considered this question for the first time at its thirty-first session.

Mr. Wasiuddin (Bangladesh), Vice-President, took the Chair.

79. Bearing in mind these factors, it is our hope that the Governments of France and the Comoros will intensify their efforts through negotiations to bring about a solution of the question of Mayotte consistent with the decisions of the United Nations. Draft resolution A/39/L.42 once again highlights the principled position maintained by the international community on this issue and urges the reopening of the dialogue between France and the Comoros. In supporting this draft resolution, we are motivated by an earnest desire to encourage an expeditious process of negotiations between the two countries, leading to an early solution of the problem on the basis of justice and recognized principles.

80. Mr. OSMAN (Somalia): My delegation has listened with attention to the comprehensive statement delivered this morning by the Minister for Foreign Affairs and Co-operation of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros on the question of the Comorian island of Mayotte. My delegation has also studied carefully the report of the Secretary-General [A/39/518]. It is evident from the notes verbales addressed to the Secretary-General by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Co-operation and External Trade of the Comoros and by the Permanent Mission of France to the United Nations [ibid., paras. 4 and 5], that the talks have yet to produce the solution needed to resolve the problem of Mayotte and that there is a need for a new impetus to get negotiations started on a more dynamic and positive basis. Given the facts of the situation, the continued separation of Mayotte cannot be justified on legal, political or moral grounds, and its political integration in the independent State of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros should be achieved without delay.

81. Throughout the centuries, the people of the Comorian archipelago have shared a common identity founded on the strongest ties of geography, history, culture and ethnic heritage. In more recent times, this common identity has been further emphasized by their aspirations to and demands for freedom and independence.

82. At the time when France agreed to allow the people of the Comoros to exercise their inalienable right to self-determination, my country, like many others, believed that the outcome would be in accord with the wishes of the majority of the people: that the unity and territorial integrity of the new State would be assured; and that independence would open up new vistas of co-operation between France and the Comoros on the basis of the historical friendship which had existed between them.

83. We have seen the remarkable process of decolonization which France set in train soon after the Second World War and the support which that country gave to the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). We had every reason to believe that the accession of the Comoros to nationhood would be brought about smoothly. Regrettably, however, the continued colonial status of Mayotte has disappointed the expectations of the people of the Comorian archipelago and, indeed, of the world community as a whole.

84. During the colonial era, the Comorian archipelago had always been administered by France as a single unit. Its inhabitants were free to move between the islands, and the political movement for independence found strong and popular support throughout the archipelago. Furthermore, in all other colonial situations where France has guided the people to independence, the verdict of the population as expressed at the polls has always been determined by the totality of the votes cast. In no case besides that of Mayotte has a constituent part of a State been allowed to be excluded from the verdict of the majority.

85. My delegation is encouraged by the greater degree of understanding shown by France in recent years towards the demand of the Comoros for the restitution of its rights with regard to Mayotte. The position of the Comorian Government has of course been upheld by the Security Council, the General Assembly, the OAU and the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries. It is our sincere hope that the talks which have been initiated between France and the Comoros will lead to a speedy solution to this long-standing problem—a solution based on respect for the sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros.

86. Mr. FOUM (United Republic of Tanzania): Ever since this issue was raised before the General Assembly, the international community has consistently pronounced itself in favour of the restoration of the island of Mayotte to the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros.

87. My delegation, like speakers before me, finds it regrettable that to date this just demand of the Government of the Comoros, endorsed by the international community, has not been met. Tanzania has consistently taken a stand in favour of respect for the territorial integrity and unity of States and, therefore, against the separation of the island of Mayotte from the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros. It is our considered opinion that the continuation of this situation only perpetuates a state of instability in the region. In this respect, we recall the unambiguous positions of the OAU, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and the United Nations in favour of the speedy and unconditional resolution of the issue in the interest of respect for the territorial integrity and unity of the Comoros and peace and stability in the area.

88. The fact that this issue remains before us reflects the reality that, despite statements to the contrary, no meaningful action has as yet been taken by the Government of France to resolve this long-standing problem. While welcoming the various statements made by France, we still call on the French Government to translate its verbal pronouncements into concrete and positive action, in concert with the Government of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros, towards the speedy resolution of the problem.

89. My delegation listened carefully to the statement made by the Minister for Foreign Affairs and Co-operation of the Comoros this morning. We consider this statement and the overall attitude of the Government of the Comoros to be a useful and positive contribution to the efforts to bring about the peaceful resolution of the problem. We thus hope that the General Assembly will give a resounding endorsement to the draft resolution before us, thus contributing not only to eliminating the last vestiges of colonialism in the area but, more specifically, to ensuring the unity and territorial integrity of the Comoros.

90. Mr. AMR (Egypt) (interpretation from Arabic): We had hoped that this year would bring a solution to the question of the Comorian island of Mayotte, as called for by numerous United Nations resolutions, the most recent being General Assembly resolution 38/13. Our hope was strengthened by the genuine desire demonstrated by the two parties to the problem to achieve a peaceful and just solution.

91. As the delegation of Egypt emphasized in its statement before the General Assembly [64th meeting], when this item was debated at the thirty-eighth session, Egypt has a special interest in this question, and its desire to see a just solution attained is strengthened by the relations of friendship and close co-operation which have always bound the two parties to the problem.

92. Egypt has always supported the sovereignty of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros over the island of Mayotte, which has been affirmed by numerous resolutions of the General Assembly, the OAU and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, which have called for respect for the unity and territorial integrity of the Comorian archipelago.

Mr. Lusaka (Zambia) resumed the Chair.

93. We fully appreciate the concern of the Government of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros at the lack of progress in seeking a solution to the problem and the fact that the situation has not changed since the admission of the Comoros to membership of the United Nations in 1975. This concern was reflected in the communication of the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, addressed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations [see A/39/518, para. 3]. That communication indicated that, despite the many high-level contacts between the Governments of the Comoros and France and the direct talks between the Heads of State of the two States, there has been no significant progress concerning the problem.

94. Nevertheless, in spite of this, we feel that there is room for optimism with regard to achieving a just, negotiated solution to the problem of the Comorian island of Mayotte. Our hope is based, first, on the genuine desire demonstrated by the two parties to the problem to continue the dialogue and to make efforts in order to achieve such a solution. That was evidenced in the notes verbales from the Government of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros and the French Government addressed to the Secretary-General [ibid., paras. 4 and 5]. Secondly, our optimism is based on the promise that France has already made in the wake of the referendum held on 22 December 1974 for self-determination of the Comorian archipelago. That promise is to respect the unity and territorial integrity of the Comoros, to which were added the statements by President Mitterrand in which he affirmed his attachment to the idea of the integration of the island of Mayotte with the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros.

95. The delegation of Egypt hopes that the sincere intentions and efforts of both parties will be translated into concrete results in the near future, results which will preserve the unity and territorial integrity of the Comoros by restoring its sovereignty over the island of Mayotte, so that the people of that country may devote their efforts to development and progress.

96. Mr. de La BARRE de NANTEUIL (France) (interpretation from French): My delegation regrets that, once again this year, the question of the island of Mayotte appears as an item on the agenda of the General Assembly session. France can only oppose the draft resolution that has been submitted, owing in particular to paragraph 1 of that text.

97. However, we hope that a just and lasting solution can be found to this question, and the draft resolution relating to it quite rightly recalls the expression of the will of France for there to be such a solution. My delegation also considers it essential to pursue a constructive dialogue with the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros. The bonds of friendship and co-operation that unite our two countries should help us in this endeavour.

98. France, for its part, intends to continue to develop all economic, social and cultural bonds between Mayotte and the Comoros in order to promote a rapprochement among the islands of the archipelago.

99. The status of Mayotte does not exclude any evolution in keeping with international law and the Constitution of the French Republic that takes place within the context of respect for the choice of the populations involved. French legislation cannot but take these requirements into consideration. Thus, my Government is endeavouring, and will continue to endeavour, to gear its actions towards ensuring an equitable and lasting solution to this question.

100. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now vote on draft resolution A/39/L.42. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guatemala, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

The draft resolution was adopted by 122 votes to 1, with 21 abstentions (resolution 39/48).[2]

Question of Palestine (continued):*

(a) Report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People;

(b) Report of the Secretary-General

101. Mr. NETANYAHU (Israel): I would like to ask the representatives here to do what for some may be a difficult task. I want them for a moment to put aside what all of us hear endlessly in this Hall: the slogans about the "Palestinian people" and their

---

*Resumed from the 92nd meeting.

"legitimate rights". Let us instead look at history and consider in turn the presumed grievances of the Arabs against Israel.

102. In May of 1967, Syria, Jordan and what was then a different Egypt prepared to attack my country. Arab States further afield also readied military forces to be sent to what many of them confidently assumed would be the final assault on Israel. True, they had failed to destroy Israel in 1948, but they had never lost hope that eventually they would succeed.

103. Arab leaders were not reticent in proclaiming their aims. "Our basic objective will be the destruction of Israel", President Nasser said on 27 May, eight days before the war. "Our goal is clear . . . to wipe Israel off the map", declared President Arif of Iraq on 31 May. "The Arab struggle must lead to the liquidation of Israel", explained Algerian President Boumédiene on 4 June. And on 5 June, the day the war broke out, Radio Damascus exhorted simply: "Throw them into the sea."

104. Israel asked the Jordanians to stay out, but King Hussein had his troops shell Jerusalem and, apparently putting faith in Nasser's assurances, attacked. On 8 June, Hussein broadcast this to his army: "Kill the Jews wherever you find them. Kill them with your arms, with your hands, with your nails and with your teeth." The result was that he lost control of all the territories his troops had forcibly seized in 1948: Judea, Samaria and eastern Jerusalem. Egypt lost the Sinai and Gaza.

105. The shock of the 1967 defeat led the Arab leaders to rethink their tactics. Having lost areas strategically vital to waging war against Israel, especially the commanding heights of Judea-Samaria, they realized that no military solution lay in view without first forcing Israel to retreat to the vulnerable pre-1967 lines. This would require the exertion of enormous political pressure. The Arab States would have to win over public opinion by a lengthy, sophisticated and comprehensive campaign. They would have to change the terms of the conflict so as to obscure its real nature and present it in a manner that would be plausible, even persuasive, to audiences outside the Middle East.

106. For one thing, the kind of open declaration of intent they had once indulged in so freely would have to be muted or even dispensed with completely. Obviously, it would not do to speak again of driving the Jews into the sea or continue to demand the annihilation of Israel. To much of the world this was simply unacceptable. New arguments would have to be marshalled to justify continued hostility against Israel. All the territories the Arabs had lost in 1967, territories which had been used by Arab leaders as staging areas for a war they themselves brought on, were now held up as examples of unbridled Israeli expansionism. The consequences of Arab aggression were thus presented as its causes.

107. The Arab leaders now demanded that these same territories be handed over to them. That they have managed to persuade some of the justice of their demand is at least curious. They present, after all, an entirely new theory in international relations. Never before have States which have lost territory in wars of aggression been able to assume so easily the mantle of the aggrieved party. Germany after the Second World War certainly did not; nor did the other aggressor States from that same war. In fact, there is hardly a case in which a repelled aggressor could demand anything, much less territory.

108. But what is even more amazing is that the Arab-inspired myth of "Israeli expansionism" persists, despite the fact that Israel, in the pursuit of peace, recently ceded, willingly, fully 92 per cent of the territory won in a war of self-defence, territory containing billions of dollars of investments and, what is more, a secure supply of oil. No victor in recorded history has behaved similarly. Clearly, however indignant some Arab leaders may be over their loss of territory in 1967, this cannot be the cause of a conflict which began long before.

109. If not the territories, are the Palestinian Arab refugees the cause of the conflict? Prior to 1967, in fact, it was the refugee problem that was the constant refrain of the Arab chorus. But there was no such thing as the refugee problem when the Arabs embarked upon their full-scale war against a fledgling Israel. On the day that five Arab armies invaded the new State of Israel, Azzam Pasha, Secretary-General of the Arab League, declared: "This will be a war of extermination and a momentous massacre which will be spoken of like the Mongolian massacres and the Crusades." Nor was there a single Arab refugee when Haj Amin al-Husseini, the former Grand Mufti of Jerusalem and Hitler's collaborator, said in 1948: "I declare a holy war! Murder the Jews, murder them all!"

110. Far from expelling the Arabs, the Jews of Israel pleaded with their Arab neighbours to stay, as in Haifa, in Tiberias and in other well-known examples documented by the British authorities and many Western correspondents on the scene at the time. And in the years immediately following the conflict there were many moments of candour. For example, the Jordanian newspaper Filastin wrote on 19 February 1949: "The Arab States encouraged the Palestine Arabs to leave their homes temporarily in order to be out of the way of the Arab invasion armies." Habib Issa wrote in the daily Al-Hoda on 8 June 1951: "Brotherly advice was given to the Arabs of Palestine to leave their land, homes and property and to stay temporarily in neighbouring fraternal States, lest the guns of the invading Arab armies mow them down." As late as 6 September 1954, the Jordanian daily Al-Difa'a quoted this telling comment by one of the refugees: "The Arab Governments told us: Get out so that we can get in. So we got out, but they did not get in."

111. The Arab leaders not only chose to forget this history; they created a new one, at once absolving themselves of any responsibility for the refugees and pinning the blame on Israel. Again, as with the territories lost in 1967, the consequence of the 1948 war—Arab refugees—was presented as its cause.

112. But to make this scheme work, the refugees had to be maintained as refugees, permanently wretched, perpetually unsettled. The consistent refusal of Arab leaders to solve this problem is particularly tragic because it would have been so easy to do. After all, since the Second World War there have been well over 100 million refugees from many countries, and almost all have been successfully resettled. Israel, too, with its tiny area and crushing economic burden, successfully absorbed 800,000 Jewish refugees from Arab lands, refugees that were brought into being by that same 1948 war. Perhaps this is why in 1955, well before the eldorado of Arab oil gushed forth, Mr.

Elfan Rees, the Adviser on Refugees to the World Council of Churches, noted: "The Arab refugee problem is by far the easiest post-war refugee problem. By faith, by language, by race and by social organization, they are indistinguishable from their fellows of their host countries."

113. Still, despite the deliberate Arab policy of keeping the problem alive, the reality noted by Mr. Rees proved even stronger than Arab intent, for, over the years, nearly all of the refugees have been absorbed into the economies and societies of the countries of their residence.

114. Indeed, most Palestinian Arabs have homes. Many of them, in fact, live as full citizens in eastern Palestine or Jordan. Similarly, most of the Arabs of Judea-Samaria are not homeless refugees; they hold Jordanian citizenship and live in the same homes they occupied before the establishment of Israel. Several hundred thousand work in the Gulf oil States, but are no more "homeless" than are, for example, the many hundreds of thousands of foreign workers who work in Saudi Arabia and the neighbouring States. That a few hundred thousand remain unintegrated is because the Arab States have kept them incarcerated in refugee camps for political reasons. And yet the theme of "homelessness" persists, having been repeated endlessly—not without success—as a powerful weapon in the Arab political arsenal against Israel.

115. Over the years, however, Arab propagandists discovered that their claims about "usurped territory" and "homeless refugees" do not withstand critical examination. Before knowledgeable audiences, the embarrassments of chronology and causality, such as we have just seen, could not be waved away. They were compelled to resort, therefore, to a third and final argument. Brandishing the ever-popular slogan of "self-determination", they asserted that the "Palestinian people" have been denied their "legitimate rights" and that one of those rights that has been denied—so it is claimed—is the right to a "homeland". Significantly, the slogans of "Palestinian self-determination" and "legitimate rights"—and, by the way, who could object to phrases like that?—were introduced into common currency only after the defeat of the Arab attempt to destroy Israel in 1967.

116. It is an uncontested fact that during the 19 years of the Hashemite occupation of Judea-Samaria, the Arab leaders, the Arab media and Arab propaganda said next to nothing about a "homeland" or "legitimate rights" in Judea-Samaria. When "Palestinian rights" were spoken of, it was always in reference to Israel behind its 1967 lines, and the message was crystal-clear: Israel was to be destroyed for those rights to be obtained.

117. It is noteworthy that, under the British Mandate, it was the Jews of the country who called themselves Palestinians. The Palestine Post, the Palestine Philharmonic and the Palestine Brigade which fought against the Nazis were all Jewish. There were thus Palestinian Jews and Palestinian Arabs, although in those days, as we might recall, the Arabs did not emphasize a distinct Palestinian nationhood but always stressed their being part of the larger Arab nation.

118. This deep-rooted identification with the Arab nation did not diminish over the years. Yasser Arafat, head of the PLO, has said: "The question of borders does not interest us. Palestine is only a small drop in the great Arab ocean. Our nation is the great Arab nation extending from the Atlantic to the Red Sea and beyond." And Zuhair Mohsin, a member of the PLO Executive Committee, in 1977 put it this way: "There are no differences between Jordanians, Palestinians, Syrians and Lebanese. We are one people."

119. The process of forming a separate nation is a complex one. The development of a separate "peoplehood" is always a long historical process, and its culmination is expressed by the emergence of several shared attributes—most often, a distinct language, culture, religion and history.

120. But let us grant that, through a miraculous telescoping of history, what took other peoples centuries was achieved by the Palestinian Arabs almost overnight, by dint of declaration, and that they are entitled to a national home. But who are the Palestinian Arabs and where is their homeland? Let us hear what the Arab leaders themselves say about this.

121. The PLO, supposedly committed to "Palestinian self-determination", asserted from its inception in 1964 that its designs encompassed the entirety of Palestine, both its western and its eastern parts, both Israel and Jordan. This was underscored time and again, as at the PNC's eighth conference, in February-March 1971:

> "In raising the slogan of the liberation of Palestine and presenting the problem of the Palestine revolution, it was not the intention of the Palestine revolution to separate the east of the river from the west; nor did it believe that the struggle of the Palestinian people can be separate from the struggle of the masses in Jordan."

122. Given the current embrace between the PLO and Jordan, PLO leaders are naturally reluctant to publicize this long-standing claim. But their candid statements in the past are, I suggest, revealing. Shafiq Al-Hout, the PLO's United Nations spokesman, for example, is quoted by Zeid Refai, in "Hussein of Jordan: My War with Israel", as saying this in 1967: "Jordan is an integral part of Palestine, just like Israel." And Arafat said in 1974: "Jordan is ours, Palestine is ours, and we shall build our national entity on the whole of this land."

123. Now, some would expect the Jordanians to contest this. Not at all. On 2 February 1970, Crown Prince Hassan, addressing the Jordanian National Assembly, said: "Palestine is Jordan, and Jordan is Palestine. There is one people and one land, with one history and one destiny." And King Hussein—also, significantly, before another Arab audience—said on Egyptian television on 10 October 1977: "The two peoples are actually one. This is a fact."

124. On 24 September 1980, it was Marwan al-Hamoud, former Jordanian Minister of Agriculture, who insisted:

> "Jordan is not just another Arab State with regard to Palestine but, rather, Jordan is Palestine and Palestine is Jordan in terms of territory and national identity . . . . Though we are all Arabs, our point of departure is that we are all members of the same people of the Palestinian Jordanian nation, which is one and unique, and different from those of other Arab States."

125. King Hussein, again, in an interview given to an Arab newspaper in Paris, said on 26 December

1981: "The truth is that Jordan is Palestine and Palestine is Jordan."

126. And in the scholarly American journal Foreign Affairs, Crown Prince Hassan, again, in the spring of 1982, noted: "As a leading Jordanian social scientist has written, 'The Jordanians and Palestinians are now one people, and no political loyalty, however strong, will separate them permanently'."

127. And finally, and most recently, on 6 November 1984, King Hussein told the Kuwait paper Al Anba, "Jordan in itself is Palestine."

128. The declarations of the Arab leaders themselves confirm what both history and logic tell us. The area of Palestine is indeed the territory of Mandated Palestine, decreed by the League of Nations and comprising the present-day States of Israel and Jordan. It is absurd to pretend that an Arab in eastern Palestine who shares the language, culture and religion with another Arab some 10 miles away in western Palestine, an Arab who is often his close relative, if not literally his brother, is a member of a different people. Indeed, as we have seen, the PLO's officials and Jordan's rulers are the first to admit this.

129. Those who accept the notion of a Palestinian people must therefore wonder: how many Palestinian Arab peoples are there? Is there a western Palestinian Arab people and, just across that narrow stream known as the Jordan River, an eastern Palestinian Arab people? How many Arab States in Palestine does Palestinian self-determination require? Clearly, in eastern and western Palestine there are only two peoples, the Arabs and the Jews; and, just as clearly, there are only two States in that area, Jordan and Israel. The Arab State of Jordan, containing some 3 million Arabs, does not allow a single Jew to live there. It contains four fifths of the territory originally allocated by the predecessor of the United Nations, the League of Nations, for the Jewish national home. The other State, Israel, has a population of a little over 4 million, of which one sixth is Arab. It contains less than one fifth of the territory originally allocated to the Jews under the Mandate.

130. The claim of self-determination, then, is misleading, for the inhabitants of Jordan—which, incidentally, Hussein's grandfather, King Abdullah, wanted originally to call the Hashemite Kingdom of Palestine—are largely Palestinian Arabs, and within that population, western Palestinian Arabs are the majority. It cannot be said, therefore, that the Arabs of Palestine are lacking a State of their own, the ultimate expression of self-determination. The demand for a second Palestinian Arab State in western Palestine, and the twenty-second Arab State in the world, is merely the latest attempt to push Israel back into the hopelessly vulnerable armistice lines of 1949.

131. Individuals and Governments have been swayed by the superficial plausibility of the PLO's well-financed propaganda campaign. And within this very body one should not underestimate the reluctance of some to challenge a received idea, especially when it is sponsored by the Arab and Soviet blocs. But the truth matters. It mattered in 1938 when Hitler's prating of self-determination for the Germans of the Sudetenland was echoed by much of the world's press and government. The resulting enormous pressure, it may be remembered, forced the Czechs to cede the Sudetenland, an area that was indeed largely German in population, but that was also vital for the Czech defences. We all know the results of that other famous campaign for "self-determination".

132. The Arab-Israeli conflict, therefore, is not rooted in the territories that changed hands in 1967, nor in the refugees that resulted from the Arab attack on Israel in 1948, nor in any claimed lack of self-determination for the Arabs of Palestine. These, as we have seen, have been useful devices in the campaign against Israel. If the Arab-Israeli conflict is to be resolved, the first task is to have all the Arab leaders recognize Israel by right and not on sufferance, and cease their support of terrorist groups that openly proclaim their commitment to destroy Israel. We can then proceed to the real issues that can and should be negotiated between the parties.

133. May I add that only direct bilateral negotiations have any meaning and, therefore, any real chance of success, as the record of Camp David clearly shows. The call by the Soviet Union, among others, for an international conference is simply a ploy to provide a forum—perhaps I should say a coliseum—in which Israel can be thrown to the lions and the PLO legitimized. The Government of Israel utterly rejects such an idea.

134. But in direct negotiations, the Jewish State of Israel and the Palestinian Arab State of Jordan should make every effort to settle the main issues between them. The main issue between them is basically a border dispute. The final drawing of that border, the cessation of the state of war, the achievement of a peace that will allow for free movement of people and goods in both directions—all this will follow.

135. But, in addition to the delineation of borders, there is a problem of determining the ultimate status of the residents of Judea-Samaria, both Arab and Jewish. This, too, is a matter for careful face-to-face negotiations, which we have repeatedly called for and would welcome. Israel wants to end the military administration currently in place in Judea-Samaria as soon as possible, and that day will be hastened when Jordan, without pre-conditions, will come to the negotiating table. But let me say that some of the comments I have heard about this subject are ludicrous beyond belief. This is the most benign military administration in history, in which the residents of the area have the full use of the law courts to press their claims against the authorities. Many have done so, and many have done so successfully. And the Camp David accords make ample provision for the transition from a military administration to a civil polity in which individual and community rights will be fully secured.

136. It is important to make one point clear. There is little doubt that, no matter how the borders are drawn, a significant number of Arabs will continue to live side by side with their Jewish neighbours in Israel. It has long been recognized that being a minority is not necessarily a tragedy. All nations have their minorities. The tragedy is to be everywhere a minority. This was precisely the Jewish situation before the creation of the State of Israel. The Jewish people did not possess 21 Jewish States; nor did they already possess one Jewish State in Palestine and were merely demanding yet another. As for the Arab rejectionists, they employ a reverse logic. For them, it is a tragedy that Arabs should be a minority anywhere in the Middle East. They find it intolerable that some Arabs may live as a minority in Israel just as other people have lived as minorities in their midst. The only difference is that the Arab citizens of Israel enjoy the civil liberties and the rule of law, despite calumnious claims to the contrary, that are denied to many non-Arab peoples living under various Arab régimes.

137. Nor can we conceive of a peace that can deny Jews the right to live in their ancient homeland, for what kind of peace could be based on Hitler's principle that an area had to be Judenrein?

138. Arabs live and will continue to live in Judea-Samaria. There is no reason why Jews cannot do the same.

139. I know the waste of war, the waste of both sides, Arab and Jewish. I think peace can be achieved, but it can be achieved only without ignoring history or, still worse, deliberately reshaping history to camouflage the origins of hostility.

140. Western Palestine and eastern Palestine, Israel and Jordan, must come to the negotiating table just as Israel and Egypt did. They must talk about land and they must talk about people, about how to establish, however imperfect, a modus vivendi that will endure. We cannot expect the millennium, but we do, all of us, have a right to hope that the terrible waste of the past will not be repeated.

141. Mr. SINCLAIR (Guyana): One of the grimmest legacies of the Second World War has been that conflict of cultures and interests which we commonly refer to as the Middle East question; the core and centre-piece of that is, of course, the question of Palestine. Few issues have taxed the strength and the resourcefulness of the United Nations as an institution more than that one has done. Few problems have called into question more than that one the capacity of the Organization to defuse potential conflict situations.

142. Our consideration of the question of Palestine this year takes place against a background with which we are all too familiar, a background of brutal acts of oppression and deprivation which are continuously being inflicted on the Palestinian people. The horrors of Beirut in 1982 are still fresh in our minds. These tragedies underscore the urgency of the question of Palestine and the need to find a solution without delay.

143. The old League of Nations, the precursor of the United Nations, foundered on the question of global security. In our day, we are enjoined by the dictates of history and of precedent to reflect on the causes of that failure and, from such reflection, to derive the will and the clarity of vision to focus our energies effectively. Many have been the hours of debate, whether in plenary meetings, in the Special Political Committee or in the Security Council, on the various intertwined aspects of the enduring Middle East situation. What emerges with crystal clarity from these deliberations is that any search for a solution that seeks to bypass the United Nations system loses legitimacy, credibility and the stamp of universal consensus. It makes little sense to fashion an institution for the organized expression of world opinion if that opinion is to be flouted with impunity, through the brazen assertion that the advantages derived from the unlawful but successful use of violence are non-negotiable and that regional aggrandizement is international virtue.

144. For this reason, therefore, my delegation reaffirms its support for the decisions of the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva from 29 August to 7 September 1983. We likewise reiterate our support for the early convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East which would include the participation, on an equal footing, of the Palestinian people through its representative, the PLO.

145. The report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People [A/39/35] properly focuses the attention of the General Assembly on the plight of the Palestinian people and on the intransigence of the occupiers of its homeland. My delegation congratulates the Chairman of that Committee, Mr. Massamba Sarré, of Senegal, for this valuable contribution and for the excellent manner of its presentation.

146. The recommendations contained in the report provide a positive programme of action, the implementation of which would greatly enhance the prospects for a comprehensive settlement. Those recommendations reaffirm the necessary role and responsibility of the United Nations in the search for a just and lasting solution. They afford an opportunity of breaking out of the current stagnation and taking the initiative to pave the way for a final overall settlement.

147. My delegation reiterates its view that the prospects for a lasting peace in the Middle East begin and end with the satisfaction of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people. It is unacceptable that the proud Palestinian nation, with its own particular identity, should be condemned to the indignity of refugee camps and to be objects of global compassion. The Palestinian people must have its own independent State.

148. The struggle of the Palestinian people is an integral part of the world-wide liberation struggle. Its physical focus is a geographical area noted throughout history as a hotbed of contending cultures. It is a struggle complicated by a number of factors, among them the imposition upon it of the dynamics of an East-West ideological struggle, the false global defence perceptions of others who live quite far away from the region and an unrelenting preoccupation with the control of global communications and with the vital destiny of energy resources. Meanwhile, it is the Palestinian people, of course, which continues to suffer.

149. It was the United Nations that created the State of Israel. It is surely the responsibility of the Organization to ensure that this creation does not abrogate the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people or allow any schemes of fortuitous selectivity permanently to dispossess, deprive and disadvantage those whose claims merely reflect rights which we jealously protect for our own selves.

150. Apart from the principle on which I have just expounded, there are two others which Guyana considers to be essential in any overall solution of the entire Middle East problem. Israel must withdraw from all Arab territory occupied since 5 June 1967, including East Jerusalem, and do so quickly. Guyana can never condone the occupation by force of territory belonging to other States, whatever the pretext, the fiction or the spurious military justification. Security in the Middle East must be mutual—Israel's security cannot be constructed on the insecurity of its neighbours, nor can that security be found in the unlawful retention of permanent symbols of injustice, constant and enduring injuries to contiguous nationalisms.

151. Another principle is that all States in the area, including the State of Israel, have the right to exist and to do so within boundaries that are secure and universally recognized. History has not accorded to all States the convenience of frontiers that suit the military defence requirements of modern warfare. Nevertheless, this fact should not be made an excuse for covetous expansionism and the digestion of wrongfully retained land by the intrusion of alien settlements, strategically and economically conceived to perpetuate original injustice.

152. While the Palestinian experience since the creation of the State of Israel has been one of dispersal and dispossession, it has also been one of faith, hope and resolve. The Palestinians have shown an enduring and admirable faith in the United Nations. Their authentic representative, the PLO, has participated diligently and constructively in the work of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. They have placed their faith in positive responses by the Security Council and the General Assembly to a programme of action such as that included in the current report. The PLO was the first to respond to the Secretary-General, indicating support for the holding of an international peace conference on the Middle East, which is testimony to the seriousness and the statesmanlike approach of that organization to the solution of the problems of the region.

153. The PLO has mobilized a continuing struggle for the recovery by the Palestinian people of their homeland. In this endeavour, it is supported by the overwhelming majority of the international community. My delegation wishes to make special mention of the role of the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat in reaching out, in difficult circumstances, to the conscience of the world on behalf of the people of Palestine. My delegation would also like to express special appreciation of the role played by the non-governmental organizations in support of the struggle of the Palestinian people.

154. The Government of Guyana, for its part, is most pleased to make a special contribution to the effort to maximize international support for the Palestinian cause, through the hosting in 1985 of a United Nations seminar on the question of Palestine.

155. What is called for now more than anything else is an end to Israeli intransigence and the practical commitment by that State to action consistent with the interests of peace and security in the region. Let us not allow ourselves to be deceived by words or by selective and distorted uses of history. Likewise, it serves little purpose for us to cling to outmoded slogans of the PLO being a terrorist organization. As the Secretary-General correctly and wisely said in his report on the work of the Organization [A/39/1], one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter. The Palestinian people have a cause and that cause is the recovery of their inalienable rights. We must come to terms with Palestinian nationalism and with their desire to recover their freedom in their own independent State.

156. Let us, by the decisions we take in this debate, render the most vigorous support to the Palestinian people and so bring closer the day when, with their participation in all processes, the long-desired peace in the Middle East is finally secured.

The meeting rose at 1.15 p.m.

United Nations
GENERAL ASSEMBLY
THIRTY-NINTH SESSION
Official Records

95th
PLENARY MEETING
Tuesday, 11 December 1984,
at 3.20 p.m.
NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

In the absence of the President, Mr. Helgason (Iceland), Vice-President, took the Chair.

AGENDA ITEM 33

Question of Palestine (concluded):

(a) Report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People;

(b) Report of the Secretary-General

1. Mr. FOUM (United Republic of Tanzania): My delegation considers the issue before the Assembly to be one of the most crucial issues confronting the international community, for, by virtue of the strategic importance of the Middle East and the fact that peace, security and stability cannot be established in the area without resolving the root cause of the conflict, the question of Palestine is central to international peace and security; but, above all else, it is a question of human freedom and dignity and the quest of a people, the people of Palestine, for recognition of their inalienable right to self-determination.

2. Thirty-six years after the partition of their land, the Palestinian people continue to be denied their most fundamental human, political and national rights, in flagrant violation of the basic norms of international law, the Charter of the United Nations and its resolutions and decisions. Israel has, to date, in a diabolical combination of force and arbitrary legislative and administrative measures, only paralleled by those of apartheid in South Africa, embarked on a campaign to entrench its domination in Palestine. Measures under way to change the demographic composition, geographical character and administrative status of the occupied Palestinian territories and to separate the Palestinian people from their historical and cultural homes, undermine their identity and question their national existence—and even physical annihilation—have formed part of this scheme. As a consequence, the Palestinian people not only have become second-class citizens in their own country, but also continue to be subjected to incessant humiliation, harrassment and all forms of violence, including murder. Assassination of Palestinian leaders has also become an integral part of the Israeli lawlessness visited upon the Palestine people by the Israeli occupiers.

3. The international community cannot afford to be indifferent when an entire people is systematically being annihilated in the Middle East. It should stand against Israeli aggression and for the Palestinian rights. Together with the recognition of those rights, the international community should embark on a process to put into effect concrete measures for their exercise without external interference. Those rights, as originally envisaged in General Assembly resolution 181 (II), adopted on 29 November 1947, and the right to return, the right to compensation, and so on, must be reiterated.

4. It is the United Nations which has a historical responsibility for the problem. It is the Organization which must continue to play the central role in its resolution, on the basis of the numerous resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council.

5. The adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 3236 (XXIX), embodying the fundamental rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to self-determination without external interference, the right to national independence and sovereignty, the right to return, the right to regain all their rights by all means possible and the right to recognition as a principal party in the search for a lasting peace in the Middle East, underscored the continued commitment of the United Nations to the restoration of Palestinian rights. It is in this context that despite numerous set-backs, all precipitated by the recalcitrancy and obstinacy of Israel, the international community has not been deterred from its principal objective of restoring peace in the Middle East.

6. It is in recognition of this fundamental consideration that the efforts of the international community have converged on the need for collective action under the auspices of the United Nations. The adoption by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva from 29 August to 7 September 1983, of the Geneva Declaration on Palestine[1] and the elaboration of the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights,[1] to work towards the realization by the Palestinian people of their right to self-determination, independence, freedom and free national and social development, underscores this position.

7. Furthermore, the adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 38/58 C was essentially a recognition of the need to harmonize international efforts to find a just and lasting solution to the Palestinian question. In that resolution, the Assembly endorsed the call for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East. That resolution embodies an international consensus on a framework for peace comprising the key elements of any process leading to such eventuality.

8. Consistent with this position, therefore, my delegation wishes to reiterate its strong support for the conference proposal, on the basis of six basic principles: first, the strong opposition to and categorical rejection of Israeli policies and practices in the occupied territories, particularly the establishment of settlements; secondly, ending the Israeli occupation of Arab territories, in accordance with the principle of the inadmissibility of acquisition of territory by force; thirdly, the nullification and voidance of all legislative and administrative measures adopted by the occupying Power which have modified or attempted to modify the character and status of the City of Jerusalem; fourthly, the recognition of the right of the Palestine Liberation Organization [PLO], the sole and authentic representative of the Palestinian people, to participate on an equal footing with other parties in all efforts to bring about peace in the region; fifthly, the realization by the Palestinian people of the inalienable right to self-determination, including the right to an independent homeland; and, lastly, the recognition of the right of all States in the region to an independent existence within secure and internationally recognized borders. These key elements, as embodied in the Geneva Declaration on Palestine, remain the firm basis for any possible settlement of this question.

9. Since the thirty-eighth session of the General Assembly, the international community has continued its consideration of the question of Palestine. Both the Meeting of Ministers and Heads of Delegation of the Non-Aligned Countries to the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly, held in New York from 1 to 5 October 1984, and the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity, at its session held at Addis Ababa from 12 to 15 November 1984, have reaffirmed their support for the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people and reiterated their conviction that the question of Palestine is at the core of the Middle East problem and the root cause of the Arab-Israeli conflict, a conflict whose solution must be comprehensive, just and lasting, based on the fundamental principles of the Charter of the United Nations and taking into account the interrelated character of the elements that constitute the problem.

10. In particular, the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity, as well as condemning

> "all manoeuvres and formulae aimed at preventing the people of Palestine from exercising their rights to self-determination, to achieve their national aspirations to return to their homeland and exercise their freedom and complete sovereignty",[2] reiterated its firm support for the Arab peace plan, adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference,[3] as > "an important contribution to the search for a just, comprehensive and lasting settlement of the Middle East conflict; and [called] for the implementation of General Assembly resolution 38/58 C on the holding of an international peace conference on the Middle East".[2]

11. If the period of the past 36 years of dealing with the question has brought to light any reality it is that the challenge before the international community is an enormous one. It has also demonstrated that the solution to the Palestine problem will come about only if all aspects of the problem are taken into account, if the unity of those directly involved is restored and consolidated and if the close co-operation of those sincerely supporting the just cause of the Palestinian people is further strengthened. It is this challenge that we call upon the international community to face.

12. Mr. AL-OSTA (Yemen) (interpretation from Arabic): Now that we are speaking once again in the General Assembly on the question of Palestine we know that all are aware that this question has already been discussed in all its aspects. All that one might say on the subject today has already been stated and restated tens if not hundreds of times over the past 37 years.

13. All delegations present are familiar with the actual situation in Palestine. Those delegations have been disappointed over the years and no longer believe in the ability of the United Nations to resolve international political problems, beginning with the question of Palestine.

14. My delegation deplores the unfortunate and serious situation in which the United Nations finds itself. We believe that responsibility lies squarely and primarily on the shoulders of the permanent members of the Security Council, who, up to the present, have been acting in a way that limits the Organization's ability to solve international problems. They defy the opinion of the majority of States Members of the United Nations and abuse the right of veto in the Security Council.

15. However, the delegation of Yemen would like to reaffirm its support for the recommendations of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, as we also support the recommendations of the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva from 29 August to 7 September 1983, and the Arab peace plan adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference.[3]

16. My delegation would like to reaffirm its clear and unwavering position regarding the question of Palestine. We believe that any just and equitable solution requires the total and unconditional withdrawal of all Israeli forces from occupied Arab territory, including Jerusalem, and the recognition of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to return, the right to self-determination and the right to the establishment of an independent State on its national soil, under the leadership of the PLO, its sole legitimate representative. Any solution which fails to take those elements into consideration is doomed to failure.

17. We repeat our support for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East, with the participation of all parties involved on an equal footing, including the PLO, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, in order to achieve a just, lasting and comprehensive solution to the problem.

18. It is high time for the international community to commit itself to putting an end to the arrogance and aggression of Israel. The time is ripe also for restoring to the Palestinian people its legitimate rights. It is the duty of those countries which support Israel, in particular the United States, which is supplying it with arms, funds and political, diplomatic and military support, to reconsider their position regarding Israel and its policy of aggression in the Middle East. We hope that the recent agreement concluded between the United States and the Soviet Union regarding the opening of negotiations without pre-condition will make it possible to achieve solutions to all kinds of problems, not only those relating to disarmament; we are thinking first and foremost of the question of Palestine, the solution of which should be founded on a peaceful and just basis, in accordance with international law.

19. For Israel has never ceased to falsify historical facts and to justify its aggression and expansionism on the pretext of legitimate self-defence. The world today knows that the claims of Israel have no basis. We know that Israel, arrogantly and obstinately, defies the entire world.

20. We hope most sincerely to see the day when right will prevail and the Palestinian people will regain all of its legitimate rights, and we intend to work to that end. We hope to see the State of Palestine take its place among us as a full-fledged member of the United Nations.

21. Mr. SALAH (Jordan) (interpretation from Arabic): The position of Jordan with regard to the Palestinian problem is based on two fundamental elements: first, the continuance of the Israeli occupation of the West Bank, including Jerusalem, and the Gaza Strip, which is preventing the Arab Palestinian people from exercising its right to self-determination, and Israel's occupation and subsequent annexation of the Golan, which is a cause of continued tension and conflicts in the Middle East; and secondly, the reduction of tension and, in consequence, the attainment of peace in the Middle East, that most sensitive and vital region, which is today more than ever an international responsibility.

22. The history of the Israeli occupation of the Arab territories is well known to all. During the past 17 years, the true aggressive and expansionist intentions of Israel with regard to the Palestinian people and the West Bank and Gaza have become clear, in particular to the United Nations. In fact, no Israeli propaganda, whether about Israel's "desire" for peace or the "rejection" of peace by the Arabs, can any longer conceal the existence of a well-established Israeli plan and a co-ordinated policy for the Judaization of the West Bank and Gaza, just as occurred formerly in the case of Jerusalem and the Golan. Proof of this is that Israel is trying feverishly to create faits accomplis in the occupied territories, hoping thus to ensure the eventual transformation of the existence of Israel, at present based on force and aggression in these territories, into a "legitimate" existence in the future. That is why Israel is always using delaying tactics in order to gain time and resist all efforts to bring about peace. This is a reality that everybody must remember when the Palestinian question is being considered. The most dangerous thing of all is that Israel is a perpetual cause of tension and violence, so that it is impossible—and I mean quite impossible—to accept in any way this policy of fait accompli which Israel is trying to impose in the region. Peace at any price is an invitation to war—that has proved to be the lesson of the two world wars, from which humanity suffered so severely. I need not recall that Israel, basically, is now practising the philosophy of "peace at any price". Representatives will understand the seriousness of this attitude for world stability and security. Regardless of Israeli attempts to change the demographic and geographical character of these territories, the West Bank, including Jerusalem, with Gaza and the Golan, must be returned to Arab sovereignty. The more Israel steps up its establishment of settlements in these territories and its repressive practices against the Palestinian people, the more it increases the tension, violence and extremism in the region and, hence, the possibility of a world confrontation, which at present we could avert.

23. Israel's action in the occupied Arab territories and in the region reflects continued defiance of the principles of international law and is a source of violence and extremism. Its attitude in the United Nations and with regard to the efforts made within its framework, particularly by the Secretary-General, for the convening of an international conference on peace in the Middle East is just as dangerous.

24. This is a brief summary of developments concerning the Palestinian problem since it was considered last year by the General Assembly. They culminated, on the one hand, in a renewal of Israeli efforts to entrench its occupation and try to transform it into a "legitimate" fact, and on the other, its disregard and rejection of peace efforts and its defiance of legitimacy and of the international consensus. There is no need to reaffirm the gravity of this situation for international peace and security.

25. In the light of all this, the position of Jordan has always been based on the fact that it is necessary to respect scrupulously the fundamental principles which govern the Arab-Israeli dispute and which international legitimacy has given concrete form in many serious situations and circumstances, and, in particular, in Security Council resolution 242 (1967). If we have accepted that resolution and called for its implementation, it is not because the resolution was based on a Jordanian demand but because it represents the basis for international unanimity and gives effect to principles accepted by the international community and by the Security Council, the international authority entrusted with the maintenance of international peace and security, and because it represents the basis for a lasting and just political solution in the Middle East, that is, "land in exchange for peace". The events that have taken place since the adoption of that resolution, particularly in 1973, have proved that the resolution continues to be the basis of the international consensus in favour of a political settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict. The effect of this resolution can be seen in all the peace initiatives, whether from the Arab or any other side. These peace initiatives, all of which propose negotiations between the parties and have been rejected by Israel, have another political meaning. In addition to expressing the international will to find a political solution which could lead to a comprehensive, just and, consequently, lasting peace in the Middle East, these initiatives demonstrate the good will and desire for peace of the Arab side, which have accepted them in one form or another. They also show that the Arab side, including the Palestinian people and its representatives, take as their point of departure the principle of international legitimacy and what the international community has accepted as the basis for a settlement in the Middle East.

26. This means that the United Nations has the direct responsibility to take action, to go beyond the stage of the mere presentation of ideas and principles and to embark on the stage of the implementation of these principles. It is, moreover, the duty of us all to facilitate the task of the United Nations in this matter. For that reason, we in Jordan, together with the Palestinian people in the occupied territories, have sought to keep open all possibilities for achieving peace. In this regard, we stress the positive role played by our people living under occupation in maintaining an objective and balanced context for the Arab political initiative, of which Jordanian co-ordination with the PLO constitutes the essence and vanguard. Although they have been subjected to the most brutal forms of repression and terrorism designed to force them to abandon their land, our people have risen above their suffering and have placed themselves in an objective, well-balanced context that is given concrete form in the safeguarding of the national territory and of the Arab identity. In that framework, the Palestinian people has resisted the occupation and rejected all exhortations to extremism and all attempts to divide it, no matter what methods have been used for this purpose. We in Jordan have committed ourselves to respecting the conscience of our people and of our Arab Palestinian people living under occupation. We feel that this is the criterion for action on our part. We think that that is self-evident. There are some, however, who have acted as though the Palestinian people represented only a small group or a small number of individuals that could be used as a bargaining chip in the game of nations, within the context of an extremist and illogical approach, for which Israel is responsible and which has become the most effective means for implementing its expansionist and aggressive plans directed against the Arab nation. The will of our people under occupation has been the point of departure for and the fundamental criterion of our political action. In addition, the international community has agreed on a basis for a political solution, in accordance with the relevant Security Council resolutions, which are binding in nature. Hence, we have done everything in our power and everything necessary to maintain the attachment of our Arab Palestinian people to its land. We have sought also to put that people's will and aspirations into concrete form. That is the reason for our co-ordination with the PLO in seeking an objective and shared notion in regard to the safeguarding of our territory. In fact, the Palestinian people has repeatedly reaffirmed both its Arab identity and its national identity. It has given concrete form to its Arab identity by firmly maintaining Jordanian-Palestinian unity, based on a single glorious history and on suffering shared today, and on their belief in a future of unity which, no matter how long it takes to achieve, will constitute an outstanding page in its history. Its national identity is reflected in an indestructible will and in independent decision-making. We in Jordan are very much aware of this; we experience it every day. The children of the Palestinian people demonstrated their dedication to unity in 1950, despite the manoeuvres engaged in by several enemies of Arab unity to undermine it. That is why the Arab Palestinian people under occupation has proposed an approach for international political action that can put an end to its tragic situation. It has proved to the international community that it is faithful to its heritage and its identity, and it has sought objective action based on the international consensus for the attainment of peace between the Arabs and Israel. It has also reaffirmed that sincere action on the Palestinian question requires an appeal for Arab unanimity and unity, not division. That was the framework for the Jordanian dialogue with the PLO, which gave concrete form to the agreement by both sides on the need to put an end to occupation and to regain the Arab territories, beginning with Jerusalem, as well as to co-ordinate the efforts of the Palestinian people to preserve its national future.

27. What I have just said constitutes only a part of the basic elements of our political existence, of the experience of unity of the Jordanian people that lives under occupation, just as does its ally, the Palestinian people, in a spirit of a sacred united destiny. The Palestinian people has shown its dedication to unity as a national value and objective and as an essential and effective guarantee of the restoration of its national rights in Palestine. We in Jordan cannot but share the suffering of the Palestinian people under the yoke of occupation. I say this only to point out that in undertaking our political initiative we had in mind, above all, the suffering of the Arab Palestinian people and our responsibility towards them. The Jordanians are a proud people. They are defending and will defend their nation, no matter what sacrifices must be made. We want our people to be liberated; we want to safeguard them, not to increase their suffering. We do not want this suffering to be handed down to future generations. We want our children to inherit, at least, the results of our objective action, healthy and rational concepts, if we are not able to hand down to them peace, hope and development.

28. That is the context of Jordan's political action, as reflected in the peace efforts and initiatives, as well as in the call for an international conference in which all the parties involved in the Arab-Israeli conflict would participate and which would make it possible for the Palestinian people to choose its representatives in all freedom. That was the commitment we in Jordan undertook when we declared our acceptance of the resolution adopted by the seventh Conference of Arab Heads of State or Government, held at Rabat in 1974, and when we began a dialogue with the PLO. We did this because it was the wish of our people in the West Bank and Gaza, a wish reiterated very clearly this year and quite recently again during the meeting of the Palestine National Council, at Amman. The unity of the Jordanian and Palestinian peoples is a sacred historical fact, and Jordan's co-operation with the PLO must serve to crystallize a common political concept whose point of departure is an irrefutable and non-negotiable principle: Israel's withdrawal from all the occupied Arab territories, in exchange for recognition and the security of all the States of the region and their peoples. That is why we regard this co-operation as the means for crystallizing the freely expressed will of the Palestinian people, as well as the basis for political action. Hence, we have given full latitude to the PLO to decide the position it wishes to take, a position dictated by its national obligations and by the suffering that has been endured by the Palestinian people. King Hussein announced in his opening statement to the seventeenth session of the Palestine National Council, at Amman, that Jordan would accept the decision taken by the PLO in this regard. The Palestinian people, having reaffirmed its freely expressed will and its desire for national unity, expects reciprocity from us. It expects that we will be sincere and will shoulder our responsibilities.

29. We in Jordan have always believed in these ideals. We have always implemented them, and we have no doubt that they will be a major factor in any political action by the PLO, the representative of that people. Similarly, under the yoke of occupation the Palestinian people has expressed Jordanian-Palestinian unity—past, present and future. In presenting its liberation as a national imperative, it appealed to the Arab nation to close ranks so as to achieve its salvation. Our Arab Palestinian people launched the same appeal to the international community in order to awaken the world's conscience to seek action based on justice, objectivity and even-handedness. The Palestinians have sought peace; they are resisting occupation by all the modest means at their disposal. The moderation they have shown, together with their legitimate resistance and the pursuit of their struggle, can form the basis for an honourable way out of the current deadlock. While the Palestinian people's moderation and its acceptance of the international community's verdict enhance United Nations efforts for the establishment of a comprehensive, lasting and just peace in the Middle East, the just struggle of the people and its insistence on justice will not allow the world to forget its suffering and, later, to fall into the trap of a guilt complex. Quite frankly, today we can see that the Arab Palestinian people is providing the international community, through its struggle and its moderation, with an opportunity to avoid what could bring us all to fall into that trap in future.

30. Furthermore, I wish to stress that Jordanian-Palestinian political action is encountering many difficulties and obstacles, in particular from Israel, which did not even allow representatives of the West Bank members of the Palestine National Council to participate in that Council's meeting in order to take their own decision with regard to establishing and maintaining peace. Israel's attitude has also been negative with regard to the proposed peace conference endorsed by the General Assembly and to the Secretary-General's efforts towards its realization. That conference, which has been called a "peace conference", provides an opportunity to uphold the legitimate requirements of the two parties to the conflict: Israel's withdrawal from the occupied territories and the implementation of the right to self-determination of the Palestinian people, on the one hand, and security for and recognition of Israel, on the other.

31. I shall not speak of the inhuman and illegal Israeli practices against the Arab Palestinian people in the occupied Arab territories. The file on such acts perpetrated by Israel led to the General Assembly declaring, in 1982, that Israel is not a peace-loving State. If Israel truly wished peace, it could today take the initiative so as to demonstrate its good will. It could stop the process of Judaization of the occupied Arab territories, recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, put an end to its expansionist acts of sabotage in the region and stop its policy of hegemony and resort to force, including the total militarization of Israeli society and the creation of a dangerous situation of international polarization. Should Israel refuse to take the initiative and create a climate of détente, the United Nations and, in particular, the members of the Security Council have a special responsibility vis-à-vis the Palestinian people and the establishment of peace and the maintenance of security and stability. If Israel continues to resist the establishment of peace, the United Nations should then seek to impose it, otherwise the Organization—the hope of mankind—could fall victim to intransigence, extremism and aggression.

32. The United Nations has not been able up to now to play its role as it should. Since those who have tried on their own to contribute to the achievement of a comprehensive and lasting peace in the Middle East have not succeeded, it might prove more productive for them to make their contribution through the United Nations in order to ensure the timely achievement of this noble, and necessary, goal. As a super-Power, the United States has a special responsibility with regard to peace, and it must hasten to shoulder that responsibility. That its bilateral efforts have not been fruitful is perhaps because it has chosen to stand at the side of one of the parties to the conflict instead of playing the role of neutral mediator. Israel has exploited its special and privileged relationship with the United States for its own ends. Hence, it has become clear—and this is not a source of satisfaction to any of us—that the United States has lost on both sides, while Israel has benefited to the extent of the United States loss. The United States, which has invested considerably in Israel under the pretext that such action could make Israel more forthcoming and less intransigent and extremist, has lost not only its investments but also its political influence in its relations with the Israeli leadership. This unlimited material and political support given to Israel by the United States has undermined the reputation and credibility of the United States throughout the Arab world and internationally, whereas it could have been placed at the service of a constructive and even-handed American role in the region. I do not intend to go into details and give data on the unbalanced relationship between the United States and Israel. However, it is clear that it not only runs counter to United States interests but also undermines regional peace and stability. If it is true that the United States believes its support for Israel—which remains intransigent, irreducible and expansionist—has priority over its international responsibilities, we are indeed faced with an extremely difficult situation. If the United States believes that Israel's security must be at the basis of its policy in the Middle East and takes the necessary steps to implement such a policy, the Arabs are then constrained to look to the defence of their very existence and to safeguard their legitimate rights.

33. It is not at all satisfactory for the United Nations to be brought to the point of having to beg a super-Power to respond to the efforts for the convening of an international conference and to support the request made to Israel in this connection. The United States is a super-Power and quite capable of defending its own legitimate interests both within and outside the United Nations. Hence, I do not believe that its participation, together with the international community, in the establishment of a comprehensive and lasting peace in the Middle East could be less important and less effective in the long term than its unilateral achievement of that goal.

34. We are aware of the difficulties inherent in the mission the General Assembly has conferred upon the Secretary-General to pursue his efforts for the convening of an international peace conference which could serve as the framework for negotiations to arrive at agreements ensuring the peace and security of all States and peoples in the region and recognizing their existence. Israel has demonstrated its intransigence and inflexibility; furthermore, there is a lack of enthusiasm on the part of a great Power and inability to act on the part of the Security Council and other international bodies. Proceeding to take action can come about only from our own will and our faith in the future, and I believe that we must have recourse to these two primary factors in these difficult times, when we must mobilize our efforts and demonstrate our firm resolve to achieve peace between the Arabs and Israel based on justice and international legitimacy.

35. Today, the Assembly heard a statement by the representative of Israel [94th meeting]: the least that can be said about it is that it failed on two counts: first, because it was not in keeping with the objectives of peace and security that the United Nations is seeking to achieve in the Middle East; and, secondly, because it was essentially based on a set of falsifications and inexactitudes well known to all. It seems that the new Israeli representative wanted to outdo his predecessor in falsifying facts and in advancing new theories. But it is obvious that he cannot do better than his predecessor in the field of international law. Hence, he chose another field, a more general field—that of international relations—and attempted to advance new theories on war and peace, on the history of the United Nations, on peoples and national ethnic groups.

36. I really do not feel obliged to respond to all the inexactitudes in the statement of the Israeli representative; his affirmations speak for themselves. I shall confine myself to making a few general observations. Israel's responsibility with regard to the 1967 war is now clearly established and well documented. The Arab States did not take the initiative of attacking Israel. Indeed, it was Israel which, before the war had begun, declared that it would attack Syria and occupy Damascus in order to overthrow the Government. Many historians, politicians and jurists have stated that it was Israel which put forward war plans so as to create an explosive situation in the region, as The Observer reported on 5 June 1967.

37. I shall not elaborate on the theory of Israel's security, based on sudden and preventive strikes and invasion under the pretext of legitimate defence. The principle of legitimate defence has been distorted, just as the principles of international law have been trampled upon, principles which Israel made nothing more than a "clearing-house" to justify its aggression against the Palestinian people and the Arab nation. In his statement, the Israeli representative spoke of the 1967 war and other wars unleashed by Israel against its Arab neighbours, as well as claims calling for the West Bank from now on to be called Judea and Samaria. If Israel considers that the West Bank represents only Judea and Samaria, it should not be surprised if Arabs resort to war to liberate their territory. I believe that the explanation of the 1967 war and the Israeli threats that preceded it show Israel's determination to hold on to the West Bank, Jerusalem, Gaza and the Golan Heights. Of course, the justifications of the Talmud and the weak pretext of security still continue.

38. The Israeli representative would have the victorious take everything, with the vanquished having no other choice but surrender. If that is Israel's approach with regard to the question of Palestine, and in dealing with the United Nations in particular, I do not believe that it would be useful to hear the Israeli representative speak in this body where justice is done to the oppressed and where peace and justice throughout the world are sought.

39. The Israeli representative denied the existence of the problem of the occupied Arab territories and the existence of the refugee problem, placing responsibility for the problem on Arab leaders. If Israel is not responsible for the refugee problem, even though it was Israel which perpetrated the Deir Yassin and Qibya massacres, followed in 1948 by a propaganda campaign against the inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza, threatening them with the same fate as that of the massacred inhabitants of those two villages; if Israel is not responsible for the exodus of two million Palestinian refugees since 1948 and if that exodus was not an Israeli aim, then let Israel simply allow them to return. Since their return would pose no problem to Israel, would it not be logical for Israel to authorize this return?

40. Why does Israel ask the Arabs to take care of the refugees while Israel itself bears the political and moral consequences of the destruction of the Palestinian people's national identity, instead of accepting them and accepting their return to their homeland, from which they were expelled?

41. As I have already said, in the statement made this morning by the Israeli representative, there were numerous inexactitudes and half-truths. Proof of that can be seen in his attempt to distort not only history but also geography and the existence and national identity of the Arab nation. For him, the Palestinian people does not exist; Jordan is Palestine and Palestine is Jordan; the Jordanian people does not exist in the Israeli representative's vocabulary. It is inadmissible that the Israeli representative should seek to impose on the Arab nation his own definition of its national identity and of the relationships among the Arab peoples themselves, forgetting that Israel is made up of colonizers that have come from the four corners of the world—the followers of the racist philosophy or ideology of zionism—to chase away the entire Arab people and attempt to establish hegemony over the entire region.

42. Finally, the Israeli representative this morning tried very hard but wasted the valuable time of members by citing various statements made by Arab leaders requesting what he called the "destruction of Israel". Indeed, that is a game Israeli spokesmen love to play, because it serves Israel's goals in struggling against peace. However, the Israeli representative made sure not to refer to Arab appeals for peace, in particular those made by Jordan and by King Hussein. That illustrates just how much credibility can be ascribed to the Israeli representative's statement, and this credibility vanishes when we consider that he was not even accurate in his references. In mentioning the radio message addressed by King Hussein to the Arab army defending the City of Jerusalem during the June war, he distorted that message in such a way as to serve his interests, to give rise to anti-religious, fanatic and extremist feelings. The Israeli representative quoted the message as follows: "Kill the Jews wherever you find them. Kill them with your arms, with your hands, with your nails and with your teeth."*

43. In fact, what King Hussein said was "Fight them", that is to say, "Fight the enemy", and not "Kill them", as distorted by the Israeli representative. King Hussein quoted the text of a verse of the Koran prohibiting war on civilians—women, children and the elderly—those whom Israel did not spare in its siege of Beirut.

44. As for the old song "Jordan is Palestine and Palestine is part of Jordan", I do not know how the Israeli representative dares to mention it while endeavouring to prove Israel's innocence and its lack of responsibility with regard to the Palestinian problem. The Israeli representative is perfectly aware that there are geographical and historical hard facts outside the expansionist and false notions of the Israelis.

45. Jordan belongs to the Jordanians and Palestine to the Palestinians, and no one has the right to decide the identity and the homeland of a people whose roots go back thousands of years in the land of its ancestors, as is the case for the two brother peoples, Palestinians and Jordanians. The Palestinian people does not seek to establish its homeland where it happens to be living. That is characteristic of colonialists, which is in fact in keeping with the universal Zionist philosophy on which Israel is based and which seeks unscrupulously for space, even if that space belongs to others.

46. Mr. FARAH DIRIR (Djibouti): The Palestinian question is one of the biggest challenges the international community is facing today. It has already triggered five devastating conflicts and still continues to be a threat to international peace and security. The Palestinian tragedy began when the General Assembly decided to give the best part of Palestine, against the will of the people who had inhabited the land since time immemorial, to Jewish immigrants coming from every culture and clime. The world community was still under the shock of Nazi horrors when it decided to establish in Palestine a homeland for the victims of the holocaust, without prejudice, as it was believed, to the interests of Palestinian Arabs.

47. Unfortunately, however, the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine to be a haven for Jews in the Diaspora entailed the dispossession and dispersion of the Palestinian people. As the Zionists were campaigning before the creation of Israel, they wanted to give credibility to the preposterous assumption that Palestine was not inhabited. The terrorism and the massacre that heralded the establishment of Israel drove the Palestinians into exile, a process which, sadly, has continued until today. The United Nations was not indifferent to the Palestinian plight. The General Assembly, in adopting resolution 194 (III), affirmed the right of the dispersed Palestinians to return to their homeland and recover their usurped properties. Israel refused then, and continues to defy any attempt by the international community, to redress the injustice it perpetrates against the Palestinian people.

48. Today, the overwhelming majority of the international community has recognized the centrality of the Palestinian question to the conflicts and persistent tension in the Middle East. No one in his or her right mind will deny the legitimacy of the struggle undertaken by the Palestinian people, under the leadership of the PLO, to assert its right to return to its homeland, its right to self-determination, to independence and to establish its sovereign State on its national soil. These are the inalienable rights to which every people in the world is entitled. The Palestinians are not asking for more or for less: they are asking for their rightful place in the sun.

49. But, throughout its existence, Israel has negated not only the national rights of the Palestinian people but its very existence. As is well known, Israel's main preoccupation all along has been the evacuation of Palestinian inhabitants from the occupied territories for eventual annexation. The most effective tactic that the occupation authorities are resorting to in their endeavour to expel the inhabitants from their ancestral homeland is the programme of settlement and colonization. The malignant proliferation of settlements in the occupied territories is deeply affecting the economic and social life of the population. Every colonial settlement that is established near a Palestinian village or township is always intended to strangle the latter by diverting water resources and energy. The process of settlement continues at an accelerated pace to meet the quota of 100,000 Jewish settlers by 1985, thus modifying the demographic composition of the occupied territories. While these settlements put heavy strains on the living conditions of the Arab population, the settlers, armed by the occupation authorities, commit outright acts of aggression against them. As we all know, educational institutions are subjected to armed attacks by State-sponsored terrorism; public transport is bombed; houses are demolished; and even the sanctity of places of worship is violated, as in the case of the attempt to blow up the Al-Aqsa and Omar Mosques, setting fire to the Saaddin Mosque in Nablus and the assault on the Ibrahimi Mosque in Hebron.

50. While the Palestinian Arabs are subjected to daily harassments, any protest on their part will be met by harsh measures. Collective punishment, curfews, arbitrary detention and expulsion, torture and even murder are the order of the day in the occupied Arab and Palestinian territories. All these tactics are meant to make life so insecure and unbearable for the Palestinian and Arab inhabitants that they prefer to emigrate rather than live in Palestine.

51. Every Israeli attempt to obliterate the Palestinian national identity has ended in failure. The Palestinian nation is one of the oldest in the world, and history testifies to the continuity of Palestinians in Palestine since time immemorial, during which they have produced a particular national, artistic and legislative system that determines the existence of a specific national community which in turn is part of a larger Arab national community. It was a vindication of this historical continuity of the Palestinians when the League of Nations, in 1921, years before Israel was established, recognized the Palestinian national community.

52. Israel can massacre the Palestinians, expel them, confiscate their properties, usurp the cultural patrimony, desecrate their places of worship and cultural landmarks, and deny them their fundamental human rights, but it will never be able to destroy their spirit of resistance, their aspirations and their national will, which are the continuity of their history. Israel knows this better than any other. Ever since the Palestinians chose the PLO as their sole representative, the Zionist authorities have been haunted by the spectre of ever-growing Palestinian nationalism.

53. The unwarranted invasion of Lebanon in 1982 and the carnage and destruction it brought about were perpetrated with the sole purpose of physically liquidating the PLO and burying with it the hopes and national aspirations of the Palestinian people under the rubble of Beirut. The PLO survived the test more determined than ever to continue the struggle for national independence.

54. The Palestinian leadership has once more demonstrated its political and diplomatic acumen at the beginning of this year when it was faced with a critical situation. The meeting of the Palestine National Council at Amman removed any doubts that might have been entertained in some quarters. The Amman meeting demonstrated to the world that the PLO represents not only the Palestinians in exile but also the Palestinians living in Palestine.

55. The primary responsibility of the United Nations is to find peaceful solutions for conflicts that might threaten international peace and security. The Palestinian question could trigger another conflagration at any moment. Today, the overwhelming majority of the Members of the United Nations believe that the convening of an international conference on the Middle East would provide the most appropriate avenue leading towards the establishment of a just and lasting peace in the region.

56. Next year, the United Nations is to mark its fortieth anniversary. It will be an occasion for celebration, but it will also be a moment of retrospection and assessment of the achievements and failures of the Organization. The United Nations could have no better present for the world on that occasion than a just and lasting solution to the question of Palestine.

57. Finally, I would like to pay tribute and express my appreciation to the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, which, under the competent and able leadership of Mr. Massamba Sarré, of Senegal, has spared no effort in enhancing international awareness of and support for the struggle of the Palestinian people to exercise their inalienable right to self-determination and to establish an independent and sovereign Palestinian State. I commend the Committee's excellent report [A/39/35], which it has diligently prepared to highlight the legitimacy of the struggle of the Palestinian people, with which my delegation fully concurs. In this regard, my delegation hopes that the Committee's findings and recommendations enjoy the full support of the international community.

58. Mr. OCHIENGHS-WELLBORN (Uganda): My delegation has read attentively the report of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People [ibid.] and the report of the Secretary-General [A/39/130 and Add.1]. I wish to pay a well-deserved tribute to Mr. Sarré, of Senegal, and the members of the Committee for their untiring efforts to fulfil the mandate entrusted to them by the General Assembly. Our appreciation goes equally to the Secretary-General, who over the past year has exerted considerable efforts to find a peaceful solution to the conflict in the Middle East.

59. The problem of Palestine has been one of the most urgent recurrent concerns of the United Nations ever since its inception. The item has remained prominent on the agenda of successive sessions of the General Assembly and other international forums. This is only right, because the failure to resolve it is the main cause of the conflict in the Middle East, which constitutes a grave threat to international peace and security.

60. When the General Assembly grappled with this issue in 1947, it recognized the necessity of establishing a Palestinian Arab State. General Assembly resolution 181 (II), of 29 November 1947, from which Israel derives it existence, required the establishment of a Palestinian State. By that resolution, the international community undertook the obligation to ensure the establishment of a Palestinian State. Accordingly, contingent upon the admission of Israel to the United Nations was the requirement that it would abide by the United Nations partition plan. It was not the intention of the United Nations that the establishment of an Israeli State should result in injustice for the Palestinian people. They are now unfortunately being denied their inalienable rights. They are being forced to live in perpetual exile or suffer oppression under foreign occupation.

61. The main obstacle to the realization of a Palestinian State and a peaceful resolution of the Middle East conflict has been and remains Israeli intransigence. The Israeli objectives have been obvious for many years, though they have been masked under various guises. These objectives are: to integrate the occupied Arab territories within Israel, while finding a way of reducing the Arab population; to disperse the scattered Palestinian refugees and crush any manifestation of Palestinian nationalism or culture; and to gain control over southern Lebanon.

62. They have consistently rejected any political settlement that accommodates the inalienable rights of the indigenous population. Israel has sought to achieve its objectives through repression and State terrorism and to hoodwink the international community by a massive propaganda campaign which has long distorted the true nature of the question of Palestine.

63. Right from its establishment, Israel embarked on policies and actions aimed at preventing the full implementation of General Assembly resolution 181 (II); it immediately set out to expand beyond the boundaries allocated to it under the United Nations partition plan. Through aggressive actions and wars, Israel has been swallowing up more Palestinian and other Arab lands with the clear aim of preventing the Palestinian people from regaining their inalienable rights. Since 1967, the Israeli goal has been to consolidate its hold on the occupied lands. The implanting of numerous massive settlements is the main technique of converting conquest to annexation.

64. Annexation, expansion and the creation of settlements are contrary to international law. Article 47 of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, expressly proscribes the annexation of occupied territory. Article 49 prohibits the forcible deportation or transfer of the inhabitants of the occupied area. It also forbids the transfer by an occupying Power of any of its population into the occupied areas. Yet, in spite of the condemnation of the United Nations and its injunctions, Israel has continued to violate these provisions and has refused to rescind its actions.

65. Despite attempts to misrepresent the facts, many Israeli leaders have never hidden their real objectives. In a lecture at Hebrew University in May 1980, a former Israeli intelligence officer, General Gazit, warned against evacuating any part of historic Eretz Yisrael, which must remain entirely under Jewish control and basically a Jewish State. Referring to the Arab indigenous inhabitants of those territories, he said: "The solution for them must be found outside historic Israel."

66. The report of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories [A/39/591] gives the most recent examples of how Israel is altering the legal status, geographic nature and demographic character of the Arab territories occupied since 1967. It has adamantly refused to recognize the applicability of the 1949 Geneva Convention to the occupied territories. Viewed against the background of the annexation of the Syrian Golan Heights, the annexation of Jerusalem, the barbaric invasion and subsequent occupation of southern Lebanon, the avowed aim of which was to destroy the PLO, it becomes clear that Israel intends to annex the West Bank and Gaza in its quest for a greater Israel. It appears that the only kind of peace Israel desires, and is intent on imposing on the region, is one that denies the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people and rules out the possibility of any comprehensive and just solution to the Middle East conflict.

67. Israel has always sought to put an end to the Palestinian national identity; but the history of the past four decades shows that the Palestinians are capable of making splendid sacrifices in order to maintain their national Palestinian identity and achieve the restoration of their inalienable rights. This was aptly demonstrated by the failure of the Israeli onslaught on Palestinians in the recent invasion of Lebanon to extinguish the spirit of freedom that inspires their liberation struggle. In spite of vicious attacks against them and their dispersal from Beirut, their struggle continues unabated and is supported by the overwhelming majority of the international community.

68. The PLO has proved beyond any shadow of doubt that it is the sole authentic representative of the Palestinian people. It emerged from the Israeli onslaught with its stature and political influence enhanced. It remains the true representative of the Palestinian people.

69. The West Bank population rejected the village leagues which the Israeli authorities were attempting to foist on them. It is clear that those who seek a peaceful resolution to the Middle East conflict must be prepared to talk to and negotiate with the PLO. It is unfortunate that Israel and one reputable Member of the United Nations still refuse to accept this reality. We believe that an acceptance of this truth by all would contribute positively to the peace process. It would discourage Israeli intransigence.

70. In our view, Israeli opposition to the PLO and Israel's adamant refusal to allow it a place at the peace negotiating table are not because of any provision in the PLO covenant. Israel opposes the PLO because it is the living expression of Palestinian nationalism and champions their inalienable rights, which Israel seeks to destroy.

71. David Krivine, in a letter to The Economist of 10 July 1982, gave the real reason why Israel objects to any discussion with the PLO. He said:

> "The one group we won't talk with, it is true, is the PLO—but not because they are nasty people. The obstacle is the subject on the agenda. It can only be the creation of a Palestinian State on the West Bank, and that we can't agree to."

72. We ask those who refuse to talk to the PLO on the basis of this erroneous reason to challenge Israel as to whether it would be prepared to accept a Palestinian State, as called for in United Nations resolutions, if that condition were met.

73. The Israeli response to all peace proposals from any quarter which are aimed at achieving a just solution that takes into account the inalienable rights of the Palestinians has been negative and provocative. This is in contrast with the positive response of the PLO and Arab countries. In spite of Israeli provocations, they have been flexible. They have stood by the plan adopted at Fez on 9 September 1982 by the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference,[3] under which all States in the region could coexist within secure and internationally recognized borders. Unfortunately, under the mask of the right to live within secure borders, Israel has obdurately refused to recognize the Palestinian right to self-determination and to enter into a dialogue involving the PLO.

74. The International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva from 29 August to 7 September 1982, called for an international peace conference on the Middle East. The General Assembly, in resolution 38/58 C, endorsed that recommendation and mandated the Secretary-General to make arrangements for the convening of the conference. We believe that that resolution provided good machinery for building a just and lasting settlement. Regrettably, Israel continues to put road-blocks in the way of the convening of the conference. We appeal to all concerned to co-operate with the Secretary-General and to facilitate the convening of the conference. As the previous peace conference, in December 1973, of which the United States and the Soviet Union were co-chairmen, demonstrated, such a forum would enhance the chance of success of the peace process in the region.

Mr. Lusaka (Zambia) took the Chair.

75. The main elements of a just solution to the Palestinian question, which is the core of the Middle East conflict, are present in a number of United Nations resolutions. A framework for peace must be just and comprehensive. It can be comprehensive and just only if it restores the rights of the Palestinian people and involves the participation of all the parties concerned. It must include the following elements: first, the withdrawal of Israel from the occupied Arab territories; secondly, recognition of the right of refugees to return to their homeland; and, thirdly, the exercise by the Palestinians of the right to self-determination.

76. The PLO, which is the sole and authentic representative of the Palestinians, must participate in the negotiations.

77. In a message addressed to the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People on 29 November 1984, on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, the President of Uganda, Mr. A. Milton Obote, stated:

> "On this solemn occasion when we observe the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, I wish to convey to you the commitment of the Government of the Republic of Uganda and the people of Uganda to work towards the rehabilitation and enjoyment of the full rights of the Palestinian people.

> "The Palestinians have the right to return to their homeland, the right to self-determination and the right to set up an independent State of their own. There can never be just and durable peace in the Middle East without addressing the injustice done to the Palestinians."

78. I wish on behalf of the Government and people of Uganda to reaffirm the commitment made by President Obote.

79. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): I will begin with some very relevant verses from the Holy Koran. I take refuge in God, away from the accursed Satan.

> "Verily God will defend (from ill) those who believe: verily, God loveth not any that is a traitor to faith, or shows ingratitude.
> "To those against whom war is made, permission is given (to fight), because they are wronged;—and verily, God is most powerful for their aid;—
> "(They are) those who have been expelled from their homes in defiance of right,"—that applies to the Palestinians, does it not?—"(for no cause) except that they say, 'Our Lord is God'. Did not God check one set of people by means of another, there would surely have been pulled down monasteries, churches, synagogues, and mosques, in which the name of God is commemorated in abundant measure. God will certainly aid those who aid His (cause);—for verily God is full of strength, exalted in might (able to enforce His will).
> "(They are) those who, if we establish them in the land, establish regular prayer and give regular charity, enjoin the right and forbid wrong: with God rests the end (and decision) of (all) affairs." [Surah XXII:38-41.]

80. About four decades have passed since the occupation of Palestine, and the Palestinian people are still as displaced and homeless as ever. The Zionist usurpers of Palestine, with the unreserved support of the United States, are still taking hostage the entire nation of Palestine and are threatening the rest of the area. As members know, southern Lebanon has been added to the occupied territories. In spite of all the support and sympathy that the voting records have always demonstrated for Palestine, the United Nations has not so far been able to liberate one inch of the occupied land. It has been only a helpless spectator of the continuation of occupation, further illegal settlements, expansion of aggression, occupation of further territories and devastation of more residential areas.

81. Zionist dreams of occupation from the Nile to the Euphrates are coming closer to realization with the recent developments in the area; the Camp David conspiracy is gaining more recognition. After Jordan's green light, Iraq is now giving the green light. The Washington Post of 28 November 1984 has quoted Tariq Aziz as saying that "his nation will not oppose possible efforts by Jordan and the Palestinians to forge a peace agreement with Israel". "Israel," he continues, "is guilty of aggression against Lebanon, the Palestinians and Jordan, but Iraq has no right to veto a peace movement." Strange, isn't it? To give full assurance to those concerned, he says: "I say officially, we will not oppose it even if we don't like it. We have to consider it from the realistic point of view." That is how the Zionist dream of "from the Nile to the Euphrates" is gradually coming true and that is how the cause of Palestine is being raped by its once adamant supporters, namely, Egypt and Iraq. Quite regrettable, isn't it? It is good to remember that Iraq severed its relations with the United States Government simply because of the latter's support for Israel. The same champion is now considering a Palestinian-Jordan peace treaty with the Zionist aggressor "from a realistic point of view".

82. Thus the Camp David conspiracy is enjoying more and more accommodation, so to speak, and receptivity, simply because the United Nations has not been able to seek even to implement justice in the cause of Palestine. Even General Assembly resolution 38/58 C, endorsing the call for an international peace conference on the Middle East, which was expected to serve the Palestine cause, was so easily exploited by the enemies of Palestine simply because, under the guise of seeking provision for agreement with the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights[1]—adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983—the matter was referred to the Security Council. Of course, the outcome in the Security Council was already known beforehand: the negative vote of the United States on resolution 38/58 C clearly presaged the veto in the Security Council. In his letter of 13 January 1984, addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of the United States said:

> "The United States believes firmly that the only path to peace in the Middle East lies in a process of negotiations among the parties based on Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, a process that the United States has sought vigorously and consistently to encourage, particularly in the Camp David accords and in President Reagan's initiative of 1 September 1982. Holding an international conference as recommended by the General Assembly would only hinder this process. It would predictably become a forum for propagandistic and extreme positions, and in the context proposed by the General Assembly and further articulated by the Secretary-General it would very likely yield a one-sided outcome not acceptable to one or more of the parties and therefore inoperable. The net result would be to diminish the prestige of the United Nations as the sponsor of the conference"—some people care so much about the prestige of the United Nations—"and delay the day when peace will come to the troubled Middle East." [A/39/130, annex III, appendix.]

You see, according to this text, peace can be achieved only when the base of imperialism and zionism is fully installed and imposed upon the people. They have to accept it, to swallow it, because the United States wishes it to be so. Otherwise, there can be no peace—from its point of view.

83. The meaning of an international conference in which the Governments that are directly involved in the Arab-Israeli conflict—namely, Israel, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria—are invited to a negotiating table is fairly clear. By "fairly clear", I mean that such a conference could again be exploited by some as a forum for direct negotiations. My delegation is quite sure that even if the idea had not been vetoed by the United States, the very fact that the Zionist base of terror would attend the conference on an equal footing with other countries would have been a concession to the Zionist enemy, and as such a setback for the cause of Palestine. Notwithstanding this fact, the efforts of the United Nations for even a concessionary peace conference were vetoed by the United States.

84. If the same request for a peace conference is made and our Palestinian brothers vote for it, we shall follow them because we shall always co-operate with the cause of Palestine. But, in this instance, this spirit of co-operation is not fully in accordance with our spirit.

85. In such circumstances, serious consideration must be given to whether to count on the diplomatic front and whether the international forum is really advisable at all.

86. The basic problem in the Palestinian tragedy is the misunderstanding, and consequently the misrepresentation, of the problem. The problem is that the United Nations has given recognition and legitimacy to the occupation of Palestine, and so long as this mistake is not rectified, one will always confront a political situation in which the culprit and those behind it participate in making decisions for the victim. It is not very difficult to predict the decisions of a United Nations with such an absurd composition. When the burglar becomes the arbiter, obviously the victim becomes the culprit.

87. A more fundamental aspect of the problem, which I wish to address to my brothers in the delegations of the Muslim countries, stems from the fact that the occupation of Palestine by the Zionist enemy is an Islamic issue. Islamic territory has been attacked and occupied. The Muslim nation of Palestine has been subjected to aggression, homelessness, displacement, murder and massive genocide—not once, not twice, not three times, but continuously over the past four decades. Instead of undertaking our religious duty of collectively defending Palestine, we have simply secularized the matter and relegated it to a secular body, where the enemy has the power of manipulation and control. We cannot discharge our responsibilities by simply secularizing the matter of Palestine and hurling the issues at a secular playing-field. It is not by appealing to obscenity that anyone—and definitely not the Muslims in the General Assembly—can unburden himself of the Muslims' collective religious duties. Otherwise, we shall be, as we are now, left with the choice of abdicating to the incompetent our most serious concerns, such as Palestine. On what grounds can we Muslim nations expect a secular body to renounce its own artificial baby? On what grounds can we Muslim countries expect the United Nations to come and liberate our sanctuaries? On what moral, religious or even secular grounds can we expect the General Assembly to return the holy Al-Quds or the Al-Aqsa Mosque to us? Such an expectation is really absurd and inadmissible. The General Assembly is not going to do it, and we all know that it is not going to do it.

88. Either one is honest with the cause of Islam, with the cause of Palestine, or one wishes to nationalize Islam and secularize the masses of the Islamic Ummah and leave their destiny to the hands of one's Zionist enemies. If one really wants to be honest with the cause of Palestine, then one should take it as it really is. Palestine is an Islamic territory and Palestinians are a part of the Islamic Ummah. It is therefore the duty of all Muslims to mobilize all their capabilities, under the banner of Islam, for the liberation of occupied Palestine and the implementation of justice. And it is wrong to assume that Palestinians must defend and suffer but others can only support, by pushing the green button in favour of a silly draft resolution. It is equally incumbent upon all Muslims to defend Palestine.

89. If Muslims decide to nationalize Palestine and secularize their Islamic duties, then all Muslims deserve the humiliation of defeat, not only in the area, but particularly in this forum, which is, after all, a secular international club that belongs to the others and not to Muslims.

90. There is no solution to the problem of Palestine in this international body. Its so-called solution would only add to our agony, because the best they can offer is the partition plan, which installed the enemy centre in our region and annihilated our Palestine. The solution of the Islamic problem cannot be a secular one from a secular source. Our position has always been that only a united Islamic front can liberate Palestine. Zionist hegemony cannot be halted or undone by those instruments in which Zionists themselves have a role. As a matter of fact, it is the desire of the Zionists to see you, here, adopt their language, define your problems according to their categories and seek their solution to your problems. For in every step by which you accommodate something of the enemy's you have already suffered a set-back. You are therefore the loser even when you are the winner.

91. You have been the victim of aggression, you have been wronged. You have the divine mandate to defend yourself. Why do you not do it? You have divine support in defending yourself.

92. Surely, God will defend those who believe. Surely, God does not love the ungrateful traitor. Leave is given to those who fight because they were wronged, and surely God is able to help them. Therefore, we have to defend ourselves. We have to make sure that we do not betray the law of God. Do not be a traitor to Islam. Defend yourself on the basis of the divine mandate. God is able to help those who were unrightfully expelled from their homes. This applies to the Palestinians, does it not?

93. Then the verse says this. Had God not driven back the people, some by the means of others? There have been cloisters and churches, oratories and mosques, destroyed. Do members not think that all this is taking place inside the occupied lands? Are not mosques and sanctuaries being devastated, changed, destroyed? There are even resolutions to that effect. God will indeed help, but we have to move, too. It is our duty to drive back those who have come to destroy cloisters, sanctuaries and mosques wherein divine names are to be recited. Remember that God will help him who helps God.

94. The enemy is very weak indeed. Do not fear him. He has no power when one stands. Do not be astounded by his technology. Those who stand firm and united will be victorious. In the words of the Koran: "And if the fly should snatch away anything from them, they would have no power to release it from the fly" [Surah XXII:73]. They are very small, very miserable. Do not give a lot of weight to their technology. It is ultimately the human mind which acts and makes the decision, not the technology. All that we have to do is to obey the divine prescriptions, which say: "And hold fast, all together, by the rope which God (stretches out for you), and be not divided among yourselves" [Surah III:103]; and: "Against them make ready your strength to the utmost of your power, including steeds of war, to strike terror into (the hearts of) the enemies of God and your enemies, . . . " [Surah VIII:60].

95. Experience will show, and has already shown, that a small, united, faithful Muslim group can defeat the Zionist enemy. The enemy has been so well defeated for the first time in Lebanon that withdrawal is its only choice and it is trying to find a face-saving solution. It can be imagined, then, what will happen if only the Muslims of the Middle East unify against the enemy and mobilize all their resources.

96. It should be well remembered that the solutions of the international body are inevitably divisive and competitive because they are based on divisive presuppositions, whereas Islam is unifying and uniting because it is based on Tawhid. Islamic unity is the only solution. Palestine cannot be liberated by anything less than the divine dictum which says: "If then any one transgresses the prohibition against you, transgress ye likewise against him" [Surah II:194]. Do not attack them through resolutions. They did not occupy by means of resolutions. "But fear God, and know that God is with those who restrain themselves" [ibid.].

97. The enemy from the very beginning has been wanting certain things that it thinks it can secure through internationally recognized methods—negotiation, I mean. The games that are played here in the United Nations are not our games. They are their games, invented by them, and they do not play them unless they are fully convinced that they will win the games. So do not waste time here. Do not bother the Secretary-General. He is really willing to be helpful, but he cannot. And do not become a member of that certain gang, at least not in issues which must be handled on an Islamic basis. They have only one solution, which is an Islamic solution.

98. Mr. ZARIF (Afghanistan): The question of Palestine constitutes one of the oldest issues on the agenda of the General Assembly.

99. The question of Palestine, which came into being as a result of the machinations by world imperialism and its illegitimate brain-child, zionism, centres on the arrogant denial to the Palestinian people of its national inalienable rights. This question lies at the crux of the whole Arab-Israeli conflict in the Middle East and has occupied the minds of many nations and international organizations in their search for a just solution. Thousands of hours have been spent at hundreds of international and regional conferences and gatherings in considering this issue, and dozens of declarations, decisions, communiqués, resolutions and plans of action have been adopted with the sole purpose of putting an end to the prolonged tragedy of the millions of Palestinians through achieving a lasting and comprehensive solution.

100. None of those efforts, however, has brought closer the attainment of a settlement, or the establishment of peace, for that matter: Palestinian territories, together with other Arab lands, still remain under the firm grip of Israeli occupation; acts of violence and repression against Palestinians and other Arab populations of the occupied territories are affecting even larger segments of those peoples, and there seems to be no end to the Israeli policy of acquisition of territory by force.

101. Continuation of the plight of the Palestinians can in no way be attributed to lack of endeavour on the part of the international community. Nor can it be based on the pretext that there exists no realistic and just basis on which a permanent solution could be built.

102. The United Nations inherited the problem of Palestine when it had already acquired dangerous dimensions. The developments that have occurred since then greatly added to the tension which plunged the region more than once into all-out armed confrontation, resulting in enormous loss of life and property. Conscious of its direct responsibility for maintaining international peace and security, the United Nations remained seized of the situation and exerted every effort in order to bring about a comprehensive and durable peace in the Middle East through a just solution to the Palestinian problem. In the resolutions of its most important authoritative organs, the Security Council and the General Assembly, the United Nations has given a clear definition of the nature and scope of the problem.

103. By its resolution 3376 (XXX), the General Assembly established the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, of which the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan has the honour of serving as a vice-chairman. At its thirty-first session, the General Assembly endorsed the recommendations of the Committee [see A/39/35, annex I], which were designed to enable the Palestinian people to exercise its inalienable rights as previously recognized and defined by General Assembly resolutions. Those resolutions not only reflected the verdict of the international community towards the Palestinian issue, but also drew the basic guidelines for achieving an acceptable solution to it.

104. It is highly disquieting for peace-loving humanity to note that none of its repeated demands for the restoration of peace in this war-stricken region of the world, through the implementation of the United Nations resolutions, has been complied with by the Zionist régime of Israel and its imperialist mentors.

105. In gross and repeated breaches of the Charter of the United Nations and in violation of the Security Council and General Assembly resolutions, Israel stubbornly refuses to withdraw its forces and administration from the Palestinian and other Arab territories it has occupied since 1967. In line with their cynical ambition for establishing the so-called greater Israel, the Zionist rulers of Israel have embarked on the path of absorbing the territories of others. Despite the strong warnings of the international community, the Zionist régime promulgated the "Basic Law", declaring the Holy City of Jerusalem as the "eternal" capital of Israel. In the same vein, Israel not only refuses to return the vast territories of the Syrian Arab Republic in the Golan Heights to Syria's sovereignty, but has enacted legislation purporting permanently to annex them to Israel.

106. Clear reflection of the same illegal practice can be observed in the occupied territories of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Israel has persistently continued its policy of proliferating Jewish colonial settlements in those areas. As in the past, further thousands of the indigenous inhabitants were forcefully evacuated during the past year from their homes and towns or had to abandon them owing to enormous pressure and intimidation by the occupying authorities and the Zionist settlers. Land and properties thus confiscated are usually put to use for establishing new settlements and expanding the old ones, or for constructing new military facilities for the occupying forces.

107. Other laws and regulations enforced by the Israeli authorities, in complete violation of the Geneva Conventions of 1949, have extended their ominous effects to every aspect of life in the occupied territories. Local administrations such as city, town and village councils are dismantled and their elected officials are dismissed and replaced by military or civilian administrations of the occupying Power. Academic and social institutions such as schools, universities and trade unions are repeatedly closed down. Muslim mosques and holy shrines are vandalized, and peaceful civilians remain targets of constant harassment by the terrorist groups of settler vigilantes or police of the occupying Power.

108. These and many similar practices have remained permanent causes of alarm for the population of the occupied territories and for concerned humanity. The bitter memories of the massacre of innocent Palestinian refugees in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps are still fresh in our minds. If we are to prevent the recurrence of those bestial and abhorrent actions, then we must take serious steps towards defusing the tension which is increasing as a result of the atrocities committed by the Zionist régime.

109. It needs no elaboration that the Zionist arrogance could not have prevailed over the repeatedly expressed wishes of the overwhelming majority of mankind had it not been defended and encouraged by its imperialist allies—first and foremost, United States imperialism. The United States, which has forged a so-called strategic alliance with the Zionist régime, has been rendering it enormous and unconditional political, economic and military support which has enabled it to perpetrate acts of aggression against sovereign Arab countries of the area, notably Syria and Lebanon. It is United States imperialism which has effectively paralysed the Security Council by using its veto power to prevent the adoption of measures that would call to order the outlawed régime of Israel.

110. The perpetual conspiracies of the United States against international peace and security were once again manifested by its negative response to the call of the General Assembly for the convening of an international conference on peace in the Middle East. We strongly condemn that irresponsible attitude towards one of the most burning issues of our time. In this connection, we hail the constructive position of the Soviet Union and voice our support for its timely and realistic proposals of 29 July 1984 [see A/39/368].

111. While expressing appreciation to the Secretary-General for his endeavours aimed at preparing the ground for the holding of the proposed conference, we urge him to redouble his efforts in that direction.

112. It is, of course, necessary that the PLO, the sole representative of the people concerned, participate in such a conference on an equal footing. We reject any attempt at isolating the question of Palestine from the rest of the Middle East problem and consider all collusive and partial agreements, including the Camp David deals, to have no moral or legal validity. Past experience has shown that only a just and comprehensive settlement can bring about a lasting peace to the Middle East, the sine qua non of which is the attainment by the Palestinian people of their inalienable national rights.

113. In their struggle to recover their territories and to exercise their national sovereign rights, the heroic people of Palestine and the valiant patriots of Syria and Lebanon have the full solidarity and support of the Afghan people and Government.

114. I wish to conclude my statement with a quotation from the message of Babrak Karmal, General Secretary of the Central Committee of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan and President of the Revolutionary Council of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan, on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, commemorated on 29 November 1984. He said:

> "Today, it is a task more urgent than ever before to contribute, through the collective efforts of States, towards achieving peace in the Middle East, peace for all States and peoples in the region.
> "While reaffirming the strongest condemnation of the Zionists' savage actions, the Government of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan supports the continued efforts of the United Nations towards finding a just and comprehensive solution to the Middle East problem based on the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Israel from the occupied Arab territories and the restoration of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, truly represented by the Palestine Liberation Organization, including their right to establish an independent national State of their own."

115. The PRESIDENT: We have heard the last speaker in the debate on this item. The Assembly has before it four draft resolutions [A/39/L.37 and Add. 1, L.38 and Add. 1, L.39 and Add. 1 and L.40 and Add. 1].

116. I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their votes before the voting on any or all of the four draft resolutions. Representatives will also have an opportunity to explain their votes after all the votes have been taken. I should like to remind the Assembly that, under rule 88 of its rules of procedure: "The President shall not permit the proposer of a proposal or of an amendment to explain his vote on his own proposal or amendment."

117. Mr. EU Mun Hoo (Singapore): My delegation believes that the question of Palestine is at the core of the Middle East conflict. We will therefore vote in favour of the draft resolutions before the Assembly, as we regard them as positive contributions to the search for a solution.

118. My delegation is of the view that a just solution of the question of Palestine must, at one and the same time, recognize the rights of the State of Israel. In this regard, we would suggest the exchange of recognition between Israel and the PLO. In order to encourage Israel and the PLO to move in this direction, the international community should urge them to pursue a course of mutual accommodation and compromise. Those who continue to urge Israel not to have any dialogue with the PLO are not helping the process of mutual accommodation. On the other hand, those States which continue to deny the right of Israel to exist are also not helping the cause of peace. My delegation therefore appeals to both Israel and the PLO to recognize each other's rights.

119. My delegation supports the establishment of a Palestine homeland in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and cannot accept the annexation of those territories by Israel. My delegation also fully supports the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, particularly resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), which established the fundamental basis for a genuine, stable and lasting peace in the Middle East.

120. Mr. de PINIÉS (Spain) (interpretation from Spanish): The consideration of the question of Palestine by the General Assembly reveals the lack of specific progress in finding a solution to this problem. In spite of the many peace initiatives, some of which have been echoed in the United Nations, the problem of Palestine and its repercussions on the Middle East situation remain one of the most serious elements of tension confronting the international community today. The Spanish Government regrets that situation.

121. The history of the 37 years that have passed since the adoption of General Assembly resolution 181 (II) makes it clear that only the solution of the problem of Palestine will make it possible to bring about just and lasting peace in the region.

122. Throughout all these years, the Spanish position on the question has been constantly set forth both in the General Assembly and in the Security Council. For the Spanish Government, the solution of the Palestine problem should be based on Israeli withdrawal from all the Arab territories occupied since 1967; on the right of all States in the area, including Israel, to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries; and on respect for the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to self-determination.

123. It is from this standpoint that the Spanish Government understands that Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), although constituting basic decisions in the search for a peaceful negotiated solution to the conflict, do not touch on all the aspects of the problem. For these resolutions to become a real starting-point for an authentic peace process, they must be supplemented by the Security Council through a clear, unequivocal assertion of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people.

124. For my country, the continuation of the present situation, in which the rights of the Palestinian people continue to be disregarded, is unacceptable. Therefore, we shall vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.37, L.38 and L.39. Similarly, my delegation will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.40, because we believe it to be the duty of the international community to leave no path to peace unexplored, provided that it is liable to lead to a just and comprehensive solution. Nevertheless, my delegation would like to state for the record its opinion that the convening of an international peace conference for the Middle East should not be taken to exclude other peace plans for the region.

125. Mr. COSTA (Portugal) (interpretation from French): The question of Palestine is of concern, first of all, to the Palestinian people and the States of the region. However, because of its human aspect and its implications for the security of States—which far transcend the regional context—it is also of interest to the entire international community, for the latter, having recognized the existence, identity and rights of the Palestinian people, must contribute to the search for a political and diplomatic settlement of the Palestinian question.

126. The position of Portugal on this issue stems from a realistic policy based on the recognition of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to self-determination on a national territory, and on the need for all States of the region to have secure and internationally recognized frontiers.

127. In this context, Portugal participated in the work of the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva from 29 August to 7 September 1983, at which the representative of Portugal had the opportunity to stress the extent to which this attitude forms the crux of the position of the Portuguese Government regarding this problem. He said, in particular:

> "Such recognition should not remain an abstraction, leaving the Palestinian people frustrated in its legitimate national rights, including its right to govern itself. It should be part of an overall Middle East solution. It should, in particular, be reflected in the right of the Palestinian people to participate, through its representatives, in negotiations to achieve that same settlement. But, at the same time, it would be unthinkable without the recognition of the right of the Palestinians to return to their homeland, if such is their wish. The humanitarian aspect of the problem is so closely linked to its political aspects that it would not seem possible to draw a rigorous distinction between them, nor to conceive of a theory of a just, comprehensive, peaceful and lasting solution to the conflict which ignores them."

128. Portugal, therefore, will continue to support all efforts and all initiatives likely to contribute to a solution to the Palestinian problem, and my delegation will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.37, L.38 and L.39. It reserves its position regarding draft resolution A/39/L.40 because of the wording of paragraph 3. However, it shall do so in the same spirit which motivated it during the formulation of the consensus achieved at Geneva during the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held there last year, above all with regard to the role given to various bilateral contacts likely to promote the putting forward of proposals and the establishment of conditions aimed at ensuring the success of such an initiative.

129. Mr. MIZERE (Malawi): The fact that to date a solution to the question of Palestine has not been found only highlights the complexity and diversity of the dispute. The problem encompasses four principal elements: the human suffering and the existence of refugees in the region; the political inertia stemming from the world community's failure, so far, to reconcile self-determination for the Palestinians with the recognition of the existence of Israel as a sovereign State; the potential that exists that the dispute may explode into another full-fledged war, the consequences of which are difficult to contemplate; and the primary responsibility of all representatives here present for creating an atmosphere of trust conducive to a constructive dialogue among the parties involved, with a view to finding a satisfactory solution to this problem.

130. An analysis of the statements made over a span of years shows that there are three alternatives to the question: first, either continued violence or armed conflict; secondly, armed conflict combined with diplomatic efforts; or, thirdly, a political solution through negotiations without pre-conditions.

131. My delegation opts for a political solution of the dispute. For this reason, it will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.37, L.38 and L.39 and abstain in the vote on draft resolution A/39/L.40.

132. In conclusion, my delegation supports the call for negotiations without pre-conditions in order to discuss all points arising from the 1967 war in general and to reconcile self-determination and establishment of a State for the Palestinians with recognition of Israel as a sovereign State within secure borders in particular.

133. Mr. LASARTE (Uruguay) (interpretation from Spanish): The four draft resolutions before us essentially are based, as they were last year, on the Geneva Declaration on Palestine[1] and the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights,[1] adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva last year.

134. The affirmative vote of Uruguay on these four draft resolutions is consistent with the participation of my country in the Geneva consensus and our constant concern to bring about peaceful solutions.

135. Nevertheless, we believe it to be necessary to confirm the reservations my delegation expressed with regard to both the Geneva Declaration and the Programme of Action.[5]

136. Mr. GROSER (New Zealand): New Zealand has consistently held that a key element in the negotiation of a comprehensive and lasting Middle East peace settlement must be the realization of the rights and aspirations of the Palestinian people. Their most basic right is that of self-determination, including the right to establish their own State, if that is their wish. New Zealand's recognition of the right of the Palestinian people to establish their own nation is balanced by our recognition and support of Israel's own sovereignty and independence. Security Council resolution 242 (1967), which New Zealand has always supported, affirms that every State has the right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries, free from threats or acts of force. Clearly that affirmation applies to Israel.

137. At the same time, resolution 242 (1967) reaffirms the principle that it is unacceptable to acquire territory by force. New Zealand does not recognize the validity of a number of steps Israel has taken since 1967 in defiance of this principle and calls on Israel to withdraw from territories it has occupied since that time.

138. My delegation is not able to support the draft resolutions before us today. A number of the provisions in them do not adequately reflect the balance of principles in resolution 242 (1967) or contribute realistically towards the search for a settlement of the Palestinian problem. With regard to draft resolution A/39/L.40, New Zealand's reservations concern the practicality of convening an international peace conference on the Middle East at this time. In principle, New Zealand supports the idea of such a conference, but until all parties concerned are prepared to participate with realistic expectations of contributing to a settlement, New Zealand remains cautious about committing United Nations resources in this way.

139. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): My delegation will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.40 only because it is against the Zionist base. We just cannot refrain from voting positively for a draft resolution which our Palestinian brothers consider in their favour and the Zionist enemy considers against it.

140. So far as the Palestinians' right to a State is concerned, our position is very well known. We believe that Palestine belongs to the Palestinians and the flag of Palestine alone will soon, by the grace of God, be hoisted over the entirety of Palestine.

141. We look forward to seeing the State of Palestine, including all the occupied territories, restored to the Palestinians, and we look forward to seeing the Zionist usurpers return permanently to where they came from.

142. Regarding the draft resolutions which refer to the withdrawal of the Zionist forces from the occupied territories, there again we believe that the Zionist forces must withdraw from the whole of Palestine, and from our point of view the phrase "occupied since 1967" is irrelevant. We therefore declare our reservation regarding that phrase wherever it appears. We believe that the occupied territories must be returned to the Palestinians whether they were occupied before or after 1967.

143. Mr. LEVIN (Israel): Draft resolution A/39/L.38 provides for the continuation of the activities of the "Division for Palestinian Rights". This unit, a mouthpiece for Arab extremists and their backers, has compromised the integrity of the United Nations Secretariat. The discriminatory nature of this "Division" is illustrated by the fact that, whereas terrible tragedies on the globe, like that of Kampuchea, have not been fully discussed at the United Nations, the "Division for Palestinian Rights" drains the United Nations purse in providing a sinecure for the staff of a propaganda organ of a terrorist organization.

144. Draft resolution A/39/L.39 is yet another wasteful drain on United Nations funds. If adopted, this draft resolution will continue the effect of providing a sounding-board for interests and forces extraneous to the United Nations system. The sponsors of this draft resolution would monopolize the time and funds of the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat to the detriment of the Department's other legitimate responsibilities.

145. Draft resolution A/39/L.40 is not the General Assembly's first attempt to undermine Security Council resolution 242 (1967) by setting guidelines which would undermine and sabotage the carefully balanced intent of resolution 242 (1967)—which is not even mentioned in this draft resolution. The sponsors seek to eradicate the only viable resolution for a peaceful settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Some countries represented here would have us sanction a diktat regarding the vital interests of sovereign States. The expression of regret in this draft resolution at not attending a conference is utterly superfluous and reveals the true colours of the draft resolution: those negating conciliation. Everyone here knows the extremist thrust of the proposed international conference, and it is perfectly legitimate for Israel to keep away from it.

146. Rather than introduce barren formulas and hostile rhetoric, the sponsors of the draft resolution would be well advised to try to turn the United Nations into an instrument of conciliation and understanding. Instead, its machinery is being used through these draft resolutions, which the Iranian representative calls "silly" resolutions, to deepen dissension and promote conflicts. Israel will register its condemnation of this negativist attitude by voting against the draft resolution.

147. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now begin the voting process and take decisions on the various draft resolutions before it. We turn first to draft resolution A/39/L.37 and Add.1. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Greece, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Australia, Belgium, Costa Rica, Denmark, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

The draft resolution was adopted by 131 votes to 3, with 15 abstentions (resolution 39/49 C).[6]

150. The PRESIDENT: I understand that a question has been raised concerning the programme budget implications of certain activities called for in draft resolution A/39/L.39, which has just been adopted. The Controller has assured me that the resources are available within the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat for the implementation of these activities.

151. Next the Assembly will turn to draft resolution A/39/L.40 and Add.1. A separate vote has been requested on paragraph 2. If I hear no objection, I shall put that paragraph to the vote first. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Paragraph 3 was adopted by 96 votes to 18, with 29 abstentions.

153. The PRESIDENT: I shall now put to the vote draft resolution A/39/L.40 and Add.1 as a whole. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Canada, Israel, United States of America.

Abstaining: Australia, Belgium, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominica, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Haiti, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Malawi, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

The draft resolution as a whole was adopted by 121 votes to 3, with 23 abstentions (resolution 39/49 D).[6]

154. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their votes.

155. Mr. PAPAJORGJI (Albania): This year, as in the past, the Albanian delegation has made clear the position of the Socialist People's Republic of Albania on the question of Palestine, expressing the full support of the Albanian people and its Government for the just cause of the Palestinian people. It was in conformity with that attitude that we voted in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.37, L.38 and L.39. Nevertheless, we have our reservations, which we have explained in the past.

156. Our delegation did not participate in the voting on draft resolution A/39/L.40, which deals with the well-known Soviet proposal on the convening of an international conference on peace in the Middle East. Several times in the past, we have made known our position in relation to such a conference. Our position was stressed again by the Albanian delegation in its statement before the General Assembly on 27 November 1984 [75th meeting], during the discussion of the situation in the Middle East. The aim of the Soviet socialist imperialists is to consolidate the positions of the Soviet Union in the Middle East in rivalry with the American imperialists and to secure a greater involvement in the whole course of events there.

157. Mr. LEHNE (Austria): The Austrian delegation supported draft resolution A/39/L.40, which has just been adopted by the General Assembly. It did so in view of our consistent support in principle for the proposal to convene an international conference on peace in the Middle East. We still believe that such a conference, held in the right conditions and with good preparation, could contribute to progress towards a comprehensive, just and lasting solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

158. It is obvious to us, however, that the successful convening of the international peace conference presupposes the agreement of all parties concerned to participate in it. We fully share the assessment of the Secretary-General that the conditions required for convening the proposed conference with any chance of success are not met at the present time.

159. Mr. McGRADY (Ireland): I speak on behalf of the 10 member States of the European Community in explanation of their vote on the draft resolutions.

160. The views of the Ten on the principles necessary to secure peace in the Middle East are well known and were set out in the Ten's address to the Assembly on this item. [89th meeting].

161. The Ten are ready to support any constructive effort aimed at negotiating a just, lasting and peaceful settlement of the conflict in the Middle East.

162. As previously stated, the Ten have no objections of principle to the holding of international conferences. At the right time, the holding of an international conference could make a major contribution towards achieving a negotiated settlement. The Ten believe, however, that much groundwork must first be done between the principal parties to overcome their fundamental differences in order to secure the elements necessary for a successful outcome.

163. As stated at the meeting of the European Council, held at Dublin on 3 and 4 December 1984, the Ten regard it as vitally important that renewed efforts should be made towards negotiations for a settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

164. The Ten do not believe that wording such as occurs in paragraph 3 of draft resolution A/39/L.40, which singles out for criticism two of the proposed participants in a conference, is either helpful or productive in this context.

165. The Ten trust, in regard to draft resolution A/39/L.39, that the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat will continue to be guided in its activities by the principle of impartiality and maintain its normal decision-making process. Finally, they believe that, given the difficult international financial situation, every effort should be made to avoid placing unnecessary burdens on the United Nations budget.

166. Mr. LUNA MENDOZA (Peru) (interpretation from Spanish): The delegation of Peru voted in favour of all four draft resolutions.

167. As regards the Geneva Declaration on Palestine[1] and the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights,[1] adopted by acclamation at the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983, my delegation wishes to recall that on that occasion, the Government of Peru stated the following:

> "Through this statement, the Peruvian delegation wishes to reiterate its support for all efforts directed towards enabling the Palestinian people to exercise its inalienable right to self-determination and to independent statehood. The Peruvian delegation also supports the right of all the States of the region to exist within secure and internationally recognized boundaries, in accordance with the provisions of Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) and of other decisions taken by the international community.
> "However, the approach and drafting of several of the paragraphs in the Declaration and Programme of Action prevent the Peruvian delegation from supporting the document as a whole. This is true, in particular, of paragraphs (5) and (18) of part I of the Programme of Action."[5]

168. Mr. FERM (Sweden): It is Sweden's position that the most appropriate forum for serious negotiations towards a peaceful solution of the Middle East conflict is to be found within the framework of the United Nations. As my Government sees it, agreement on holding a peace conference under United Nations auspices along the lines recommended by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva last year, would be a promising sign that real progress was within reach.

169. My Government therefore regrets that it has not been possible so far to arrive at the consensus among the proposed participants which is a necessary prerequisite for the convening of a peace conference. It cannot be the intention of draft resolution A/39/L.40 to attempt somehow to force Governments to come to a conference or to convene one without their agreement to participate. The support of my delegation for that draft resolution in no way implies that we would question the sovereign right of the Governments concerned to decide for themselves on their participation.

170. Our vote expresses our continued support for the concept of a peace conference on the Middle East.

171. Mr. FARMER (Australia): A fundamental principle guiding Australia's policy on the Middle East is the recognition of the urgent need to achieve a just, comprehensive and lasting settlement of the Middle East dispute. Australia supports a peaceful, negotiated solution to the conflict in the Middle East region. Consistent with this support, Australia believes that the concept of an international peace conference, agreed to by the parties—and I repeat "agreed to by the parties"—should not be excluded as a means of achieving this objective.

172. However, it is, in our view, essential that the framework of such a conference should not seek to prescribe the outcome of negotiations among the parties on the elements of a Middle East settlement. General Assembly resolution 38/58 C sought to make such a prescription. For this reason, Australia cannot support a proposal for a conference "in conformity with the provisions of resolution 38/58 C" or the Geneva Declaration on Palestine,[1] adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva in 1983, which the General Assembly endorsed in resolution 38/58 C. Australia voted against resolution 38/58 C and has, accordingly, voted against paragraph 2 of draft resolution A/39/L.40 on this occasion because of its reference to resolution 38/58 C.

173. Our negative vote on paragraph 2 of draft resolution A/39/L.40 also reflected Australia's continuing opposition to the reference in General Assembly resolution 38/58 C to the status of the PLO. The Australian Government will maintain its refusal to recognize the PLO while the PLO maintains its denial of Israel's right to exist. The Australian Government acknowledges that the PLO, which represents the opinion of a significant portion of the Palestinian people, should be included in the process of seeking a comprehensive settlement. It believes, however, that the PLO's opportunity to engage productively in such a process is limited and perhaps non-existent while it persists in denying Israel's right to exist.

174. The statement to be made later in explanation of vote by Australia on the draft resolutions submitted under agenda item 36, on the situation in the Middle East, applies equally under this item in its references to Australia's fundamental commitment to Israel's right to exist within secure and recognized boundaries, the central importance to a settlement of the Palestinian issue, and the right of self-determination of the Palestinian people.

175. Mr. KORHONEN (Finland): The position of the Government of Finland on the question of Palestine is well known and remains unchanged. There can be no lasting peace in the Middle East without a just solution of the problem of Palestine through the attainment and exercise by the Palestinian people of their legitimate rights, including the right of national self-determination. Therefore, Israel must withdraw from the Arab territories occupied since 1967. The Palestinians must be given their right to participate in all negotiations on their own future.

176. Conversely, the Government of Finland continues to conceive of the realization of the legitimate rights of the Palestinians as part of, and within the framework of, a comprehensive settlement of the question of the Middle East through negotiation on the basis of Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973). Accordingly, all States in the region, including Israel, have the right to live in peace within secure and internationally recognized boundaries, free from threats or acts of force.

177. The draft resolutions just adopted, unfortunately, fail to represent the balance which my Government finds a prerequisite for a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement. My delegation therefore abstained in the votes on draft resolutions A/39/L.37 and L.38 and, while voting in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.39 and L.40, did so with reservations.

178. With particular reference to draft resolution A/39/L.40, it will be recalled that Finland participated in the International Conference on the Question of Palestine, held at Geneva last year, and joined in the consensus on the final documents of that Conference. However, we did so with reservations, and in this connection I should like only to refer to those reservations.[5]

179. Mr. TELLMANN (Norway): My delegation abstained in the vote on draft resolution A/39/L.37. However, my Government has reservations concerning paragraph 2 of that draft resolution and would have voted against that paragraph if there had been a separate vote on it.

180. We also abstained in the vote on draft resolution A/39/L.40. We have, however, serious reservations about paragraph 3 of that draft resolution, in which two Member States have been singled out in a way that we do not find acceptable. My delegation therefore voted against that paragraph.

181. Mr. FARTAS (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) (interpretation from Arabic): My delegation supported and voted in favour of the four draft resolutions. Indeed, only a few Member States opposed them, and they are well known to us all. However, my country wishes to reaffirm here its consistent position on the question of Palestine. One of the basic elements of that position is that we have reservations concerning any reference in draft resolutions that could be interpreted in any way as expressing my country's readiness to recognize the Zionist entity or to ascribe any legality to it.

182. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States of America): The United States voted against the draft resolutions because we found them to be unbalanced, unfair and unpromising. They will not achieve their stated goal.

183. The United States has great sympathy for the people of Palestine, sympathy which we express through large and continuing humanitarian support and social-service support of many kinds through many years. We see these human victims of political warfare as we see refugees everywhere: as tragic residues of the violent politics of our times.

184. The United States regards these draft resolutions as an unwarranted and outrageous interference in the internal affairs of the United States. The Charter of the United Nations does not give the General Assembly jurisdiction over the foreign policies of Member States, except in those rare instances where those foreign policies are a clear threat to peace and international security, determined by the Security Council to be so.

185. In considering the call for a Middle East conference in draft resolution A/39/L.40, the United States believes it is also necessary to take into account draft resolution A/39/L.20, which has been submitted to the Assembly under agenda item 36, on the situation in the Middle East. These two items must be linked in our consideration because they are linked inevitably in their subject-matter.

186. Draft resolution A/39/L.20 charges Israel with not being a peace-loving State. Yet that charge will be linked by our actions this afternoon to the call for an international conference on the Palestine question. Obviously, it is at best inconsistent to apply sanctions against a country and, at the same time, invite it to a conference. It is the justice of Alice in Wonderland: judge first, investigate later. Such an attitude could not possibly lead to good-faith negotiations. Good-faith negotiations include the subjective concept of honest intent and purpose, and also include the objective test of how the matter would appear to a reasonable person in the same circumstances. This draft resolution, by its very nature, violates both these concepts: of subjective honest intent and of objective fairness. It neither evidences intent and purpose aimed at negotiated solutions nor is likely by any subjective test to induce all concerned parties to join in a negotiated solution.

187. Yet the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, of 23 May 1969,[7] imposes on us all an obligation to negotiate in good faith. This means that each side is to propose and counter-propose, to listen to the other side and to speak with the intent of actually arriving at an agreement with which the two sides can live. The process is very important. There is to be give-and-take, constantly narrowing the original differences until an agreement is finally reached. Good faith requires that such a process be gone through.

188. Unfortunately, the draft resolution before us subverts the very idea of process. It precludes a negotiating process. It declares at the outset what the aim of the negotiations is: it is to confirm what the General Assembly declares to be the truth, the totally untenable and unfair assertion that the State of Israel—of all States in this body—is a non-peace-loving State.

189. There are many reasons why the idea of an international conference is fatally flawed. One wonders how many nations in this body would support an international conference to resolve the border disputes in which they find themselves. Would Peru and Ecuador submit their border dispute to an international conference of the sort called for here? Would Venezuela and Guyana submit their border dispute to such determination? Indeed, would the United Kingdom and Argentina submit their border dispute to this outcome?

190. We all know that the conference called for here, the outcome of which is already provided, would be an exercise in ideology and in war by other means against the State of Israel, a propaganda exercise. By calling for a conference under these prejudicial conditions, the fairness of this body is put in question.

191. The United Nations, we believe, should not put its fairness in question. We believe that the United States has the right to have its sovereignty respected, that the State of Israel has the right to expect fair play from this body and, indeed, that the peoples of the world have the right to expect that our efforts towards peace and the resolution of conflicts will be good-faith efforts towards peace and the resolution of conflicts.

192. I find that one of the draft resolutions, A/39/L.39, provides as good evidence as any of the caricature of fairness present in these draft resolutions. I refer to subparagraph (d) of paragraph 2, which calls upon the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat, in full co-operation and co-ordination with the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, to: "Publish newsletters and articles in its respective publications on Israeli violations of the human rights of the Arab inhabitants of the occupied territories".

193. I ask: where is the dispassion in that requirement? Where is the concern for the human rights of all the inhabitants of that region? Where is the judicious spirit which all members and all peoples have the right to expect from the General Assembly?

194. The PRESIDENT: The observer of the Palestine Liberation Organization wishes to make a statement. I call on him in accordance with General Assembly resolution 3237 (XXIX).

195. Mr. TERZI (Palestine Liberation Organization): As we approach the celebration of the birth of the Prince of Peace, we the people who come from the land of peace shall also today celebrate the affirmation and reaffirmation of the determination of the international community to attain peace through a peaceful solution and a peaceful process.

196. During the voting we saw three red lights, but may I assure the General Assembly that those three red lights will in no way deter us from our perseverance in our endeavours to attain the long-overdue peace for the peoples of Palestine, the Middle East and the rest of the world.

197. Crocodile tears were shed this afternoon by the representative of the United States over the Palestinian victims of force, when it is the United States that refuses to admit that it is the political and diplomatic mainstay and main support of Israeli policies and practices. It is the Government of the United States that supplies bullets and the many millions of dollars in investments for the malicious and aggressive expansionism and lebensraum of the Zionist entity. It is the United States that helps perpetuate the current state of affairs. It is the United States that obstructs the call for a peace conference.

198. Only three weeks ago, the Palestine National Council asserted that the appropriate framework to achieve a solution was an international peace conference under the aegis of the United Nations, in consultation with the Security Council and, of course, with the participation of the parties to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Naturally, the principal party here is the Palestinian people, which is represented by the PLO. A United Nations-sponsored peace conference is the proper forum, for it is the United Nations that helped create the question of Palestine. I do not see any parallelism between the question of Palestine and the situation between neighbouring States throughout the world. It is not the United Nations that created the dispute between Peru and Ecuador. But on the question of Palestine, it was the intervention of the United States and its pressure demanding the imposition of the partition of my country, the fragmentation of my people and the displacement of millions of Palestinians.

199. This morning, the Assembly heard some untruths about history. It was Count Folke Bernadotte, the first United Nations envoy of peace, who described the origins of the Palestine refugee problem; and it was Count Folke Bernadotte who was assassinated by none other than the current Foreign Minister of Israel and the party which has a representative sitting here, that same party that collaborated with the Nazis during the Second World War and called for co-operation with Hitler against the English. Yes, it was Count Folke Bernadotte who in his first report referred to the genesis of the Palestine refugee problem.

200. In his statement this morning [94th meeting], the representative of Tel Aviv said that the cause of the Arab-Israeli conflict was not rooted in the territories Israel has occupied since 1967, nor was the refugee problem a result of those attacks, and so on. I quite agree. The roots are in the plans, the ideology and the lebensraum policy of the Zionists who found a base in my homeland, in Palestine.

201. They call for negotiations. How much more can we add to the decision of our National Council that a peace conference be held in which the parties to the Arab-Israeli conflict would sit together and discuss peace? How much more civilized can we be? But, of course, if what is demanded is Pax Americana and Pax Israeli, then those red lights we saw during the voting will remain and continue to be the obstacle to peace.

202. The PRESIDENT: Some representatives have asked to speak in exercise of the right of reply.

203. Mr. FARTAS (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) (interpretation from Arabic): This morning we heard a new attempt to rewrite history. That attempt will suffer the same fate as previous such attempts made in this Hall and in committees at every session of the General Assembly. The representative of the Zionist entity has tried to twist historic truth by describing the Arabs as the aggressors and the Israelis as the victims who had to repulse aggression and threats, and by saying that the territories were occupied during legitimate military defence operations.

204. We should like first of all to speak of what happened in 1948. The representative of the Zionist entity in this Hall in previous years, and its representative this year in the Fifth Committee, described the Zionist movement as the greatest liberation movement in the world. They speak of large-scale military operations undertaken by Zionist armies and Haganah gangs against the British Mandate and against Palestinian citizens to put an end to the Mandate and to empty Palestine of its indigenous inhabitants, whose fathers and forefathers had lived there for centuries. These military operations extended to other Arab States close to Palestine. This led to the well-known military confrontation which the Zionist entity has used to consolidate its occupation of Palestine.

205. The aggressor in 1948 was the Zionist party that applied the slogan of the founder of world zionism: "Palestine is a country without people and the Jews are a people without a country." In fact, the Zionist armies emptied Palestine of its indigenous inhabitants. They drove out 900,000 Palestinians and replaced them by Jewish emigrants from Europe. Thus, in 1948 the aggressor was the Zionist party.

206. In 1956, it was the Zionist entity, with the participation of two other States, that launched an attack on Egypt in protest against the nationalization of the Suez Canal. Its troops reached the banks of the Suez Canal. Did the nationalization of the Suez Canal in fact represent aggression against the Zionist entity? President Eisenhower was not convinced by that Zionist argument and firmly opposed the aggression, demanding the withdrawal of the Zionist invasion troops.

207. On 5 June 1967, the Zionist entity carried out a surprise attack on Egyptian airports and launched intensive air raids against Egypt in protest against Egyptian operations at Sharm El-Sheikh. Did those security operations give the Zionist entity any right to attack? The French President, Charles de Gaulle, was not convinced by that argument and took a firm attitude against that aggression. That attitude was a turning-point in French policy with regard to the Middle East and Palestine.

208. In 1973, the Arabs, for the first time, had to have recourse to legitimate defence to free their territories and put an end to six years of aggression by repelling the occupier.

209. In all these confrontations and wars, it was the Zionist entity which, militarily, politically and morally, was the aggressor. The attempts to distort history that we heard this morning can serve no purpose. The Palestinians did not flee at the instigation of the Arabs but from fear of the massacres—like the well-known massacres of Deir Yassin and Qibya—perpetrated by the Israelis against the Palestinians. No one was safe, not even the United Nations Mediator, who was assassinated by the Israelis. Not a single Palestinian has fled of his own accord. The Palestinians never leave their country voluntarily. They leave under the threat of Meir Kahane, who compels them to leave alive or to leave dead.

210. These refugees must return to their homeland, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 194 (III).

211. This morning we heard statements which cast doubt on the legitimacy even of Palestinian rights and United Nations principles and denied the right of the Palestinians to self-determination and to establish their own State on their national territory.

212. Mr. LUNA MENDOZA (Peru) (interpretation from Spanish): I am obliged to speak at this stage of the debate for the following reasons. The representative of the United States, in her explanation of vote, mentioned the relations between Peru and Ecuador as an example of situations which I would describe as inaccurate and unusual. As is known, Peru has no dispute with any of its neighbouring States. The boundary dispute which lasted for many years between Peru and Ecuador was ended by an international instrument signed more than 40 years ago, which was not only binding on the parties but guaranteed by four friendly countries, including the United States.

213. Mr. ALBORNOZ (Ecuador) (interpretation from Spanish): With regard to the statement by the representative of Peru, the delegation of Ecuador would like to reiterate what the Minister for Foreign Relations of Ecuador, Mr. Terán Terán, stated on 28

September 1984, when he reaffirmed Ecuador's rights as an Amazonian country

> "from the epic discovery of the Amazon River by the Quito expedition of 1541 to the time when Ecuador, faithful to its tradition of peace and legality, sought to strengthen friendly relations with Peru and sought a sincere climate of mutual understanding in order to promote a just and honourable solution to its territorial controversy" [13th meeting, para. 59].

214. The PRESIDENT: The observer of the League of Arab States has requested to make a statement in reply. I call on him, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 477 (V).

215. Mr. MAKSOUD (League of Arab States): We listened this morning [94th meeting] to the Israeli representative turning the cannons of distortion on the reality and the background of the Palestinian question. I do not think that there is any need to repudiate many of his utterances, except to state that in much of what he said there was an assumption that the Member States of this body are not only gullible but amenable to persuasion by his distortions.

216. At the outset of his speech, he equated the question of the Palestinian people and Palestinian legitimate rights to slogans. To reduce issues which have assumed sanctity for a whole nation and have the respect and recognition of the international community to mere slogans is to insult the intelligence of the international community. But it has become habitual to insult the intelligence of the international community. Furthermore, he reduced the terms "Israeli expansion" and "Israeli aggression" to an ideology of myth, as he described it. This is not the time to say where Israel was born under the partition plan and where it is now; or to mention that Israel has withdrawn from the Sinai as a matter of "concession" when the large potential oil resources available indicate that that kind of withdrawal was effected with a historical grudge.

217. Such distortions have become habitual in this body. This attempt to make the issue an issue of the transfer of refugees—Arab Jewish refugees and Palestinian refugees—has two basic defects. One is that there are people of Jewish persuasion in many Arab countries, and we know what happened in Baghdad when a trickle of people, individual Jews, were incited to go to Israel. There was a Zionist plan that there should be many more. We heard at that time how synagogues and Jewish-owned shops were being bombed, only to discover at a later stage that these were the actions of the intelligence operatives of the Zionist organization and of the Israeli State. By the same token, we know what happened in 1952 with the Lavon affair, when Israeli intelligence agents bombed the library of the United States in order to cement the disruption of Egyptian-American relations. It was discovered at a later stage that those Israeli agents were received in Israel as heroes when an exchange of prisoners took place.

218. I do not want to repudiate or try to argue against these various distortions. What is more important is what the Australian representative said—that an international conference should be agreed to by the parties. Of course it should, but can the representative of Australia tell us how long this international body can wait? Is there a time-frame that might be acceptable? Then he said that the terms of reference of that international conference should not prescribe "the outcome". What would we negotiate on? We would negotiate on the feasibility of a mutually acceptable outcome. We would not negotiate for negotiation's sake. In the view of the Australian delegation, is there in the terms of reference a denial of Israel's right to exist within secure boundaries? At this moment, the question for the Australian representative—and supposedly also for the representative of the United States—to answer is this: what boundaries do they recognize and what boundaries of Israel do they want us to recognize? When we say "prescribe the outcome", the outcome has to be predetermined, not in its details but at least in its principles and in its modalities.

219. The United States representative said that the United States has shown sympathy with the people of Palestine and she referred to humanitarian and social services. Let me say very openly and frankly that we appreciate the humanitarian concern and the social services of many educational and other foundations, governmental and non-governmental. We take cognizance of United States Secretary of State George Shultz's statement that the United States is interested in the improvement of the quality of life of the Palestinians. However, the question is not one of philanthropy; it is not one of charity for the Palestinians; it is not one of humanitarian concern, although that has a dimension of nobility. What is important is that these are victims. The representative of the United States has stated that they are human victims, and we agree, but human victims of what? They are victims of the displacement of Palestinians, the disfranchisement of Palestinians, discriminatory practices against Palestinians, carried out deliberately by the Israeli State in the occupied territories and inside Israel itself. I do not need to give details of the separateness and alienation which Israeli citizens of Arab origin experience. Israel has created a "Jewish State" which by definition is exclusionary, which institutionalizes discrimination against non-Jews and therefore against the Palestinians who happen to be non-Jews in these circumstances; they are systematically discriminated against, they are disfranchised.

220. Therefore, when the representative of the United States objects to the convening of an international conference and objects to the fact that we have stated that Israel is not a peace-loving State, let her remember the Camp David agreement, which was an American-brokered agreement. After the agreement was signed, Israel established more settlements in the occupied territories, attacked Baghdad and invaded Lebanon, in addition to the daily raids against the people of Lebanon and against Palestinian refugees.

221. Good-faith negotiations, yes; honest intent, yes; but in view of what the representatives of Peru and Ecuador found to their amazement, and to our amazement, let me ask this. Is what is involved a border dispute, or is it the destiny of a people?

222. Mr. NETANYAHU (Israel): I spoke this morning [ibid.] of the importance of history, and indeed what I have heard from representatives of some States here has confirmed this importance, because to justify their implacable hostility to my country the Arab leaders offer arguments purportedly based on history.

223. The basic Arab claim—we have heard it today many times—is that the Jews seized Palestine from a Palestinian people which had lived there for ages and are its rightful owners. At the twenty-ninth session of the General Assembly, for example, Arafat stated: "Its Arab people"—the Arab people of Palestine—"were engaged in farming and building, spreading culture throughout the land for thousands of years, . . . " [2282nd meeting, para. 40]. The Jews came "to usurp our land". This string of assertions has been repeated so tirelessly that for some it has acquired the cachet of self-evident truth, but it is not supported by history. "For thousands of years," the country was in fact inhabited by Jews. The antiquity of the Jewish nation and its ancient struggle for independence are of course universally known through the Bible. Not so well known is the Jews' struggle for their land in the thousands of years that followed the biblical period. Despite the dispersion of large numbers of Jews, Jews continued to live throughout the centuries in the land, through the Roman conquest, the Byzantine conquest, the Arab conquest—and, by the way, the Arabs sought the support of the Jews for their conquest—the Mamelukes, the Turks. I could go on—the British.

224. After Jewish independence was ended in the country, no other people laid claim to it; no other people reclaimed it as uniquely their own and rebuilt it. The country was laid waste, it was devastated, it was in ruins, and when great numbers of Jews returned in the nineteenth century to this country they found a desert.

225. Arafat, and many of the speakers here, I am sure, describe Palestine before the return of the Jews as a "verdant area teeming with people", but Western travellers, in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, without exception told a different story.

226. In 1738, Thomas Shaw, an Englishman, wrote of "the absence of people to till Palestine's fertile soil". Was Thomas Shaw a Zionist propagandist?

227. In 1785, Constantine François Volney, a Frenchman, described the "ruined" and "desolate" country. Was François Volney a propagandist for the Zionists?

228. In 1824, Alexander Keith, recalling Volney's description, wrote this: "In his day the land had not fully reached its last degree of desolation and depopulation." Was Alexander Keith a Zionist propagandist? Well, maybe not him, but how about Alphonse de Lamartine, who in 1835 said this:

> "Outside the gates of Jerusalem we saw indeed no living object, heard no living sound, we found the same void, the same silence . . . as we should have expected before the entombed gates of Pompeii or Herculaneum . . . a complete eternal silence reigns in the town, on the highways, in the country . . . the tomb of a whole people."

Was Lamartine a Zionist propagandist, too?

229. How about that most famous traveller to the Holy Land, Mark Twain? He visited Palestine in 1867 and described the trip that he took to the Galilee. This is what he said: "We never saw a human being on the whole route." Was Twain also a Zionist propagandist? Of course he was not.

230. None of these great men was. They were objective reporters of the scene that they saw with their own eyes. And in fact in a report in the work of the great cartographer, Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, in 1881, he observed this: "In Judea"—members will notice that he did not refer to it as the West Bank; that term was not invented until Jordan seized control of that territory—"In Judea, it is hardly an exaggeration to say that for miles and miles there is no appearance of present life or habitation." Was Arthur Penrhyn Stanley a Zionist propagandist?

231. Let me close with one more quotation from Mark Twain, who said: "Palestine was a desolate country, a silent mournful expanse . . . Even the olive and the cactus, those friends of a worthless soil, had almost deserted the country."

232. Now, somebody here is lying. Somebody here is not telling the truth. It is either Mark Twain or Arafat. And I suggest that we put this to the test of all the hundreds and hundreds of travellers, the cartographers, the reporters, the people who travelled to this land before there was an Assembly such as this where lies and distortions could be put forward without any challenge. But there is history, there is history. How did this "worthless soil", to use Mark Twain's expression, come about? How is it that in 1880 there were fewer than 100,000 people in this country? How did it come to life, and how do we have now all these millions of people? They did not procreate; that is impossible biologically.

233. It was through the efforts of the returning Jews that this worthless soil came back to life. Arabs from the surrounding lands migrated to it in droves to partake of the growing economy established by the Jews. Between 1893 and 1947, the Arab population in the areas inhabited by Jews increased an astonishing fivefold. As Winston Churchill noted in 1939: "Far from being persecuted, the Arabs have crowded into the country and multiplied."

234. I did not say that Jordan is Palestine and Palestine is Jordan. Yasser Arafat did. King Hussein did. The Arabs of Palestine already possess a State of their own, Jordan. It comprises 77 per cent of Mandated Palestine's area, while the Jewish State, Israel, covers the remaining 23 per cent.

235. Those who uncritically accept Palestinian nationhood and its right to a separate State must surely ask themselves this: are there two Palestinian Arab nations, or does that single nation require two States? History gives us that answer.

236. Mr. AL-QAYSI (Iraq): I had not intended to exercise the right of reply, since the hour is late, but I feel impelled to do so, especially after listening to the representative of Israel.

237. When history comes to be assessed in relation to territory, one should not forget about law. I am quite convinced, as a modest lawyer, that international lawyers tonight would be tremendously amused to hear that, as the representative of Israel has just stated quite clearly, when the Jewish people claimed their independence, namely, in 1947, as he put it, the territory of Palestine was what we call in international law res nullius.

238. I think this is the height of folly, the height of sophistry, the height of ridiculous imagination. As we all know, the theory of res nullius in relation to territory had long been abandoned at the end of the nineteenth century.

239. Mr. FARTAS (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) (interpretation from Arabic): If we accepted the quibbles heard in this Hall, we would give the Phoenicians, the Greeks and the Romans the right to return to this territory where traces of their ancestors are found. Those who have expelled the Palestinians from their homes and farms and have seized their belongings emigrated from Europe and Asia. I need mention only a few of those refugees who have played a major role in the movement to empty the occupied Palestinian territories of their indigenous inhabitants.

240. For example, David Ben-Gurion, the founder of Mapei and leader of Rafi, who was Prime Minister 10 times, emigrated to Palestine at the age of 20. Menachem Begin, the founder of Herut, who was twice Prime Minister and who called the Palestinians "animals on two feet", emigrated to Palestine at the age of 29. Shimon Peres, who heads the occupation Ministry, emigrated to Palestine at the age of 11. Levy Eshkol, who was four times Foreign Minister, emigrated to Palestine at the age of 19. Golda Meir, in reply to a question, said there was no people called the Palestinian people. She was twice Prime Minister, and she emigrated to Palestine at the age of 23. Moshe Sharett, who was twice Prime Minister, emigrated to Palestine at the age of 12.

241. Abba Eban, who at one time held the post of Foreign Minister in the occupation Government and who is now Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee in the Knesset, emigrated to Palestine at the age of 25. Yitzhak Ben-Zvi, who was three times President of the occupation State, emigrated to Palestine at the age of 22. Zalman Shazar, who was twice President of the occupation State, emigrated to Palestine at the age of 35. Mordecai Ben-Borat, who was Minister of State in the Government of Menachem Begin and author of the well-known phrase, "Justice does not demand that a refugee return to his homeland", and who is now President of the "Borat" Committee in charge of organizing settlements in occupied Palestine, emigrated to Palestine at the age of 12.

242. It should also be noted that Mordecai Ben-Borat was born in an Arab country in which a presidential decree was promulgated that authorizes all Jewish citizens to return to the country if they so desire. However, so far he has not returned and is now planning to empty our country of its original inhabitants by the application of the maxim "Justice does not demand that a refugee return to his homeland" and on the basis of the principle that any Jew has the right to establish himself in any part of the territory of biblical Israel.

243. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): I should just like to mention three points in exercising my right of reply. One is that, when my delegation refers to the occupied land, we usually refer to it by its original name and say "occupied Palestine", or we refer to it by its real present name, which is the "Zionist base". If I refer in my speeches to its artificial label, "Israel", it is simply because I am quoting someone. That is the first point.

244. The second point is that the representative of the Zionist base has been trying to justify recolonization. Many colonies and colonialists know very well that colonization has often been wrongly justified simply by appeal to the illogical reasoning that it produces development and economic prosperity and brings material happiness to the area.

245. We come from the third world. In many of our countries there are areas of devastation and deserts. We have never wished the Zionists to come and repair and build on them for us. We love our home countries as they are and we hate to see Zionist hegemony and intervention in our countries. I am sure that the Palestinians have the same feeling. Therefore, no justification can be found in the load of nonsense we heard from the Zionist representative.

246. Thirdly, regarding the residence of the Zionist elements in Palestine, my delegation has no objection to the Jews who have been residing in Palestine for centuries, or to the Ashkenazi Jews who may wish to stay there when the flag of Palestine is hoisted over the entire land of Palestine. This would be the only policy left to the Palestinian Government. We object only to the Palestinian State being occupied and then run under an artificial label, which was given to it, regrettably, by the United Nations. The State of Israel, they call it, and it is a Zionist racist State. We object to that, but if some of the Ashkenazi Jews even wished to stay in Palestine after its liberation, we would have no objection to that.

247. Mr. NETANYAHU (Israel): I did not say that there was no Arab claim to Palestine in 1948; I said that there was no such claim throughout the centuries—to use the words that I heard here, "from time immemorial"—on the part of the Palestinian people. The fact that the representative of Iraq chose to deflect his answer to 1948, I suggest is revealing.

248. I did not say either that Jews did not continue migrating into Palestine after the twentieth century; I said it began in the nineteenth century. But I cited the fact that the country was indeed desolate, as the various travellers whom I cited confirmed. What I said was that we did not develop in other peoples' land. We came back to our own land, where we had a continual presence, albeit not very flourishing, because there were not very many people there in the first place. But it is our development, it is my great grandfather's farm that he built in 1896 and the many farms that were built elsewhere, that produced a tremendous surge of Arab immigration into the country. We welcomed those Arabs. As far as we are concerned, they have a place in our land, contrary to their position.

249. I must confess that I heard a very unpleasant note today, because the Arab refusal to view the problem for what it is—not, by the way, as a refugee problem, I did not suggest that either—a border dispute, and their insistence on demanding a second Palestinian Arab State makes one wonder if they are willing to give more than lip-service to Israel's right to exist, or if their tactics are merely a different strategy in their campaign to destroy Israel. This refers, of course, to those Arab countries that have still refused to recognize Israel.

250. Nothing serves to increase this suspicion more than the insistence of Arab leaders on designating the PLO as the sole representative of the Palestinian Arabs. Does the PLO represent the Palestinian Arabs? Until recently, it was—how shall I put this—inadvisable for any Arab to question, let alone challenge, these claims or the PLO policy. In fact, it was mortally dangerous. But there are many who have, and among them are Abd-al Nur Janho, member of the Ramallah Municipal Council, who came out publicly against the PLO; Hashem Khozandar, the Imam of Gaza, who supported Camp David and was known for his moderate view; Muhammed Hamed Abu Warda, the deputy head of the Jebalia Council, who came out in favour of the Egyptian-Israeli peace; Youssef Al Khatib, Chairman of the Ramallah District Village League, who advocated coexistence with Israel; and a name that I am sure all delegations here will be familiar with, Issam Sartawi, who recommended a peaceful settlement with the Jewish State.

251. None of these people is alive today. Janho was assassinated in 1978, Khozander in 1979, Abu Warda in 1980, Al Khatib, along with his 23-year-old son, in 1981, and Sartawi in 1983. There have been more murders since. All these murders were carried out by the PLO, the group which "democratically" claims to speak on their behalf. In fact, from June 1967 to January 1982 alone, the PLO murdered 346 Palestinian Arabs, often including their women and children, who dared to speak out against the PLO.

252. Now we have a new development. There are at least two mortal enemies claiming the dubious mantle as sole representative of the Palestinian Arabs. They continue to use the traditional method of disposing of each other, and of any others who would try to represent Palestinian Arabs, with bullets.

253. Now there are many Palestinian Arabs who, free from the threat of assassination, would speak out for Arab-Jewish coexistence. The tragedy of the Palestinian Arabs is that since the 1920s, from the Grand Mufti, Haj Aminel Husseim, through Ahmed Shukairy, through Yasser Arafat, they have been under the tyranny of a small, violent band that is bent not on coexistence with the Jews but on their annihilation, and any Arab with a dissenting voice is gunned down.

254. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the observer of the League of Arab States.

255. Mr. MAKSOUD (League of Arab States): I am disturbed by two things. First, I am immensely disturbed by the convergence of the American position with the Israeli position on treating the question of Palestine within the framework of a border dispute.

256. I do not mind the Israeli record, which is replete with distortions, but I do mind such a judgement on the part of a country, a super-Power, with global responsibilities for international peace and security. I do venture to hope that that convergence is accidental and not intentional. However, the record of the last few years suggests that it is much more than an accidental convergence, and it is disturbing because it reduces the Palestinians' right to self-determination to a mere matter of border dispute, without mentioning which border, or between whom and for what; in fact, that dispute involves the perpetuation of the political and national disfranchisement of the Palestinian people, and that is a major obstacle indeed, not only towards the convening of the international peace conference, or towards bringing about modalities for a sound outcome of a negotiated settlement, but also towards understanding between the United States and the Arab world.

257. I do hope that the United States will reconsider this over-simplification, which seems to be in total harmony with the propagandist line of the Zionist entity.

258. I mention the Zionist entity at this moment deliberately, because the Israeli representative insists on talking about the PLO as a terrorist organization, and unless he respects what the international community has recognized—the PLO—he cannot ask for respect for the name he has assumed for himself.

259. The second cause of disturbance—but it is more than a disturbance, it is revulsion at the historical, if I may say so, hysterical, argument which during the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s we thought had been submerged in the process of decolonization throughout Asia, Africa and in many parts of Latin America. Surely it is disturbing that somebody should come here today and talk about desolate lands, about transforming deserts into gardens, repeating and restructuring this old colonial argument, as if Israel now, at a time when colonization has receded into history, wants to project itself as a successful colonization enterprise. It is very disturbing that such arguments of the nineteenth century racial, colonial period should have credence and circulation in this body.

260. I am furthermore disturbed by the claim that there has been a continuous Jewish presence in Palestine and in other Arab countries. Of course there has been a Jewish presence, a Jewish-Arab presence, throughout, and Arabs of Jewish faith are part and parcel of the Arab national community. Therefore, to say that the fact that there are Arab Jews constitutes a claim to separate them into the ghetto of a nationalistic racist State is an insult to the Jewish Arab tradition, to the Arab world in general and to the humanist and integrationist policies and values that we entertain.

261. Mr. KASRAWI (Jordan) (interpretation from Arabic): My delegation, in a speech earlier this afternoon, responded to the untruths and fallacious arguments of the representative of Israel. However, he has once again given us a version of history; the reason behind that might be his keen interest in showing his credentials as a representative of expansionist and aggressionist Israel.

262. The Israeli representative resorted to the style of the long and short memory in dealing with history. When it is in the interest of Israel to have a long memory, he does that and begins his narration at the year 2000 B.C.; then, in his abridgement of history, he passes quickly over the plight of the Palestinians and jumps directly to the year 1900 A.D.

263. We do not expect the representative of Israel to understand the historic unity between Palestine and Jordan and between the peoples of the two countries. He is used to dealing with Palestinians and Arabs from the point of view of power, occupation and expansion. The logic of the Israeli representative when he tries to refer to Jordan as Palestine is only an attempt to enable Israel to perpetuate its occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, to deny the Palestinians their right to their national soil, to deny the responsibility of Israel towards the Palestinian question and to attempt to solve it at the expense of the rights of others.

264. As for the legal relationship between Jordan and Palestine, I should like to draw attention to the following fact: if Jordan is part of Palestine, as the Israeli representative claims, how could part of it be occupied? This contradiction might be accepted only according to Israeli logic, but how can the Israeli aggressors justify their aggression against the Palestinian people?

265. The PRESIDENT: The observer of the Palestine Liberation Organization has asked to make a statement in reply.

266. Mr. TERZI (Palestine Liberation Organization): What we are here for is to find a proper course and a proper process for a solution. Be that as it may, apparently somebody is trying to divert our attention from finding a solution. Let me recall that the League of Nations assigned my country, Palestine, a category A Mandate, which meant that the people who lived in Palestine in 1922 were eligible to have their own administration and just needed the know-how.

267. Later the British took over as the Mandatory Power and we were issued with passports that read "British Passport: Palestine". They were issued under the Palestine Citizenship Ordinance. We were Palestinians, and every time we thought we would like to go and visit our relatives in Amman across the river, we needed a visa. So there have been two distinct entities at least since 1922. As I recall, we used to pay one shilling for that visa, and the process took one month. I am sure some of the members of the United Kingdom delegation will remember those things.

268. Thirdly, my country in 1947 had a population that was 66 per cent Arab and 33 per cent Jewish. Yet the United Nations took it upon itself to divide that country arbitrarily. I repeat that what we are here for is to find a way, a system, a process, to resolve the problem and bring peace to the area.

269. With regard to the PLO, of course we are proud, happy and gratified that the General Assembly welcomed the PLO in 1974 and invited us to be here as the representatives of the Palestinian people. What we are more proud of is that the Palestinian people itself has recognized the PLO as its sole and legitimate representative. In 1976, the occupying Power carried out some municipal elections in occupied Palestinian territory. What was the result? I would say that Israel would not dare to repeat that process. If, as PLO supporters in 1976, we received only 85 per cent, Israel, as the occupying Power, knows very well that today 100 per cent of the people would support the PLO, despite Israeli tanks, despite Israeli bayonets and despite the presence of some members of the Israeli Knesset like Kahane and the Tehiya party and all those criminals who collaborated with the Nazis and are perpetuating racism in our country.

270. Let me tell you this. When the United Nations convened the International Conference on the Question of Palestine at Geneva in 1983, there were a number of Jews there. As a matter of fact, our representative at one of the sessions of the Commission on Human Rights held at Geneva was a Palestinian Jew. We could not care less what religion he belongs to. That is his business. We are Palestinians, whether we are Christians, Muslims or Jews. We were brought up in that life. However, how many Israeli Jews were at the International Conference on the Question of Palestine? When they returned, only the Arab was placed in prison. The Jewish Israelis who came to the Conference were not put in prison. Is that not the meanest and lowest form of racism that could be exercised?

271. But again I should like to remind the General Assembly that we are here to find a process, a method, of terminating the misery of our Palestinians. Five million Palestinians are still striving to go back to their homes and live in peace. Chairman Arafat, from this very rostrum, addressed the international community and said that there is plenty of room, that we can all live together without discrimination as to colour, race or church affiliation. I may repeat here that this is what we are striving for: that in Palestine, the land of peace, we may all live as one.

Programme of work

272. The PRESIDENT: I wish to consult the members with regard to our programme of work. We already have 28 speakers who wish to explain their votes on the situation in the Middle East. On the basis of our present experience, it would not be surprising if we also had requests to be allowed to speak in exercise of the right of reply. I suggest that we defer consideration of agenda item 36 on the situation in the Middle East, until Saturday morning, since the remainder of our work programme is full. I am in the hands of the members. I could go on for 28 hours non-stop, as I did in 1982, but of course I was two years younger then.

273. Is there any objection to the suggestion that we hold a meeting on Saturday morning?

It was so decided.

The meeting rose at 7.45 p.m.

United Nations
GENERAL ASSEMBLY
THIRTY-NINTH SESSION
Official Records

96th PLENARY MEETING

Wednesday, 12 December 1984,
at 11.10 a.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

Commemoration of the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States

1. The PRESIDENT: As members will recall, the General Assembly decided at its 3rd meeting [para. 154] that it would hold a plenary meeting today to commemorate, on the recommendation of the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 1984/64, the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States.

2. Ten years ago today, the General Assembly adopted the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States [resolution 3281 (XXIX)]. This commemoration provides a valuable opportunity for us to assess the global economic system as it has functioned in the past decade. In doing so, we should focus on what has been achieved or left unattended and what needs to be done to enhance international economic co-operation.

3. The essential premise of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States was, and still is, the promotion of development and international economic co-operation. Among other things, the charter declares, in its article 24, that "All States have the duty to conduct their mutual economic relations in a manner which takes into account the interests of other countries."

4. The process which led to the adoption on 12 December 1974 of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States should be seen in the broader context of the efforts which had culminated a few months earlier in the adoption of a related document, the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order [resolutions 3201 (S-VI) and 3202 (S-VI)]

5. The economic crisis of the early 1970s had brought about a new awareness that the international community had to commit itself to the introduction of structural changes in the pattern by which international economic relations were conducted. The important decisions taken by the General Assembly in 1974 were therefore necessary in the interest of our interdependent world.

6. Today it still seems valid to emphasize that matters affecting economic relations among nations cannot be guided by parochial considerations or limited conceptual horizons. Institutions that play a dominant role in these areas should not function only within the original framework that shaped their creation. Rather, they should be responsive to the changing needs and requirements of the countries and peoples which they now serve.

7. The growing importance of the developing countries as a whole in the global economy is perhaps the most significant single element which determines the call for a reorientation of the patterns of international economic relations. The developing countries provide a market for almost a quarter of the exports from the developed countries. Consequently, growth in developing countries favourably affects the economies of developed countries, in terms both of demand and of employment. Conversely, the buoyancy of the economies of the developed countries has a direct bearing on the economic future of the developing countries. In short, the interdependence of our global economy makes it evident that improvements in the world economic situation must be a collective enterprise.

8. The General Assembly has undertaken several initiatives in the past decade to improve the global economic environment. The results of these initiatives have been less than spectacular. The need for a rational exploitation of global resources and the equitable distribution of economic benefits remains an urgent and continuing priority.

9. The Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States is generally regarded by Governments as an embodiment of cardinal principles which must be allowed to govern inter-State relations. It is also considered to be a reasonable expression of the need for harmonious development in the world economy, as well as for the maintenance of international peace and security.

10. It is in this spirit that I should like on this occasion to appeal to all States, developed and developing, to implement this important instrument—the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States.

11. I now call on the Secretary-General.

12. The SECRETARY-GENERAL (interpretation from Spanish): Ten years ago the General Assembly adopted the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States. It was a pronouncement of lasting significance, based on the realization that in a world of growing interdependence, international economic problems could be solved only through greater multilateral co-operation. While some issues arising from this premise may be open to debate, the basic principle articulated by this charter transcends all differences of perceptions and priorities. It is the principle of promoting an economic order based on equity, sovereign equality, interdependence, common interest and co-operation among all States, irrespective of their economic and social systems.

13. The last 10 years have been years of much tumult in the economic sphere. They have accentuated certain harsh realities confronting the developing countries, and they have also underscored the need for more systematic co-operation among nations. Faced with this challenge, the world community expects the United Nations to develop the concepts and define the modalities appropriate to such co-operation. The Organization provides the only forum for a comprehensive discussion of issues relating to the long-term prospects for development and to the correction of imbalances in international economic relations. Many of the important economic issues to which the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States addressed itself continue to be on the agenda of the General Assembly. The problems of the least developed among the developing countries remain a subject of special concern, requiring urgent action. The adoption by the General Assembly of a very important declaration, The Declaration on the Critical Economic Situation in Africa [resolution 39/29, annex], testifies to this concern.

14. In the world of today, the existence of poverty results in a succession of severe economic and social crises for developing countries. These constitute not only a challenge to the international conscience but a threat to international stability as well. We have yet to achieve a new consensus on economic issues in the light of world economic and political realities. This will take time to emerge, but its absence need not prevent progress in critical areas. I believe that positive action in these areas would be the best reaffirmation of the purpose of ensuring a more peaceful and prosperous future for all the peoples of the world.

15. Mr. FISCHER (Austria), President of the Economic and Social Council: The Economic and Social Council, by its resolution 1984/64, decided to recommend to the General Assembly that it commemorate the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States in a suitable and appropriate manner at a plenary meeting on 12 December 1984. The General Assembly, in agreeing to this recommendation of the Council, has provided an opportunity to assess the importance of that historic event and to reflect on its continued relevance for our ongoing efforts to cope with the challenges of increasing global economic interdependence.

16. Through the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, its sponsors endeavoured to provide the international community of nations with an effective instrument for the establishment of a new system of international economic relations based on equity, sovereign equality and interdependence of interests of developed and developing countries. It was hoped that the evolution of economic and social principles meeting the requirements of more equitable international relations would make a major contribution to advancing the cause of development and to promoting social progress in larger freedom.

17. Today, 10 years after the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, we have to state that many of these hopes and aspirations remain unfulfilled. Many of our efforts to promote economic and social development in a manner which truly responds to the full dimension of this historic process of change still encounter major difficulties. Some of these difficulties are due to the sheer magnitude and complexity of the problems involved. Others are caused by the diversity of interests and the difference of approach and perspective in pursuing the goal of achieving a more prosperous and more peaceful world.

18. As much as our views may differ on the reasons for the lack of progress in solving the world's pressing economic and social problems, we do, I believe, all agree on the need for closer and more effective international economic co-operation. It is in this sense that the basic aims underlying the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States are as valid today as they were a decade ago.

19. It is also in this sense that we should benefit from this occasion to recommit ourselves to the strengthening of international economic co-operation for development and to making better use of the United Nations as an instrument for such co-operation.

20. The PRESIDENT: I now call on Mr. Ahmed Tawfik Khalil of Egypt, who will speak on behalf of the Group of 77.

21. Mr. KHALIL (Egypt): We are gathered today in this forum to commemorate the tenth anniversary of the adoption in 1974 of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, in implementation of Economic and Social Council resolution 1984/64 which, inter alia, recommended that the General Assembly, at its thirty-ninth session, should observe this occasion in a suitable and appropriate manner at a plenary meeting. We still recall the eloquent words of the former President of Mexico, Mr. Luis Echeverría Alvarez, when, at Santiago in 1972, before the third session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, he said: "Let us transfer the concrete principles of solidarity among men to the area of relations among countries". Then he proposed a charter of economic rights and duties, which culminated in the adoption by the General Assembly two years later of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States.

22. In view of the vital importance attached to this charter and its impact on international economic relations, the States members of the Group of 77 had hoped that enough progress in the implementation of the charter provisions since its adoption 10 years ago would have justified genuine celebration on this occasion. Today, however, we have to content ourselves with the commemoration of the adoption of a charter that remains to be fulfilled.

23. Ten years after the adoption of the resolution, several developed countries have not gone far beyond what in the language of the United Nations could perhaps be termed as merely "having taken note of" the provisions of this universal document. The gap between what the charter spells out concerning the various elements of international economic relations and what has so far been implemented cannot be overlooked or glossed over. To cite some examples, the charter calls for the promotion of rational and equitable economic relations and for the expansion and liberalization of world trade. At the level of implementation, what we really see and experience today is the marked increase in protectionism, which has become more specific in focus, more sectoral in scope and more discriminatory in effect. The growth in protectionism and its existing structures has had a major adverse impact on trade, particularly on the exports of developing countries.

24. Developed countries had pledged, even committed themselves, to desist from imposing new restrictions and to work towards dismantling existing ones. But the practice still falls far short of a genuine expansion and liberalization of world trade.

25. The charter upholds the right of all States to participate fully in the international decision-making process in the solution of economic, financial and monetary problems. However, the past decade was marked by instability, punctuated by periods of crisis, against which background deficiencies of the international monetary system have become increasingly evident. The severe economic problems faced by developing countries during this period were largely of external origin, resulting primarily from a system in whose creation and operation the developing countries played a small but insignificant role. This is not to deny that this state of affairs has generated a certain impetus to a process of change. The importance of strengthening the role of developing countries in the decision-making processes of multilateral financial institutions has consequently gained a certain momentum. Nevertheless, institutional and policy changes within multilateral financial institutions have tended so far to fall far short of the expectations of developing countries.

26. On the other hand, the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, as is well known, underlines the importance of the adjustment in prices of exports from developing countries in relation to prices of imports and calls for the conclusion of more multilateral trade agreements. Nevertheless, the Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities[1] has not yet been ratified by the required two-thirds majority to render that fund operational.

27. I shall not dwell here at length on several other articles enshrined in the charter, whether they are related to the elimination of colonialism, apartheid, racial discrimination, neo-colonialism and all forms of foreign aggression, occupation and domination, as in article 16; or to the duty to contribute to a balanced expansion of the world economy, as in article 31; or to the promotion of the achievement of general and complete disarmament and utilization of resources thereby released for development, as in article 15. Suffice it to remind ourselves of the recognition by Governments that the charter is a basic document in the field of political and economic relations. There is universal agreement that the charter properly reflects the realities of interdependence, particularly in the area of global economic relations. It underscores the importance of the expansion of international co-operation with a view to bringing about a balance in the world economy.

28. What we really need on an occasion such as today is to stress that good intentions alone are not enough. We need to pause for reflection. We need to ask ourselves, 10 years after the adoption of the charter, where do we stand? Has the charter been fully or adequately implemented? Do developing countries exercise full sovereignty over their natural resources in the context of the present international economic order? Have international economic relations been restructured on an equitable and democratic basis, as provided in the charter? Have global negotiations been launched? And in short, has the general economic situation of the developing countries improved since the adoption of the charter?

29. As the Group of 77 sees it, the answer to all such fundamental questions is, regrettably, in the negative on the whole.

30. The Declaration of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Group of 77, adopted at the meeting held at United Nations Headquarters in New York from 26 to 28 September 1984, succinctly described the critical state of the world economy when it stated:

> "While the economic recovery in developed countries remained uneven and its durability was in no way guaranteed, most developing countries continued to experience stagnant or declining growth rates. The developing countries continued to be confronted with an adverse external environment characterized by declining commodity prices, sharp exchange-rate fluctuations, deterioration in the terms of trade, increased protectionism, very high real interest rates, crushing debt burdens, reverse transfer of financial resources, decline of official development assistance (ODA) in real terms and the resource crisis experienced by the multilateral development financing institutions. The Ministers observed that the ever-widening gap between the developed and developing countries was a result of the inequities and inequalities inherent in the existing system, and that the crisis was not merely a cyclical phenomenon but the manifestation of deep-rooted structural imbalances and disequilibrium. Therefore, they observed that sustained and balanced growth of the international economy required an equitable adjustment process."
> "The Ministers reaffirmed their belief in the concept of interdependence as a basis of mutually beneficial co-operation among all countries. They regretted that, while acknowledging interdependence, some developed countries continued to follow policies detrimental and damaging to developing countries. They reiterated that interdependence should lead to co-operative endeavours for the benefit of all countries and should eliminate the widening gap between the developed and developing countries." [See A/39/536, annex, paras. 8 and 12.]

31. Developing countries have always expressed and demonstrated not only their will but also their pragmatic attitude and determination to engage in a serious dialogue with their partners from developed countries with a view to the full implementation of the provisions enshrined in various global agreements and documents, such as the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, the Declaration on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order and the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade [resolution 35/56, annex], all of which seek to establish a new world order in which justice, equity, peace and security could be achieved.

32. On a more optimistic note, let me say in conclusion that despite our frustrations and disappointments, the Group of 77 would also like to seize this opportunity to reiterate its determination to continue to engage in a constructive manner in the review of the implementation of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States. We shall pursue our co-operative endeavours—and I underline co-operative—to identify the most appropriate action for the implementation of the charter that would lead to lasting solutions to the grave economic problems of developing countries within the framework of the United Nations. On behalf of the States members of the Group of 77, I wish to express our sincere hope that the exercise of the review next April will identify the desired goals and that the relevant report to be submitted to the General Assembly at its fortieth session will herald a new era of international understanding and co-operation.

33. The PRESIDENT: I call on Mr. Natarajan Krishnan of India, who will speak on behalf of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries.

34. Mr. KRISHNAN (India): It gives me great pleasure to address this gathering on behalf of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries. It is fitting that on the eve of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations we are meeting to commemorate the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States. The charter represents a landmark in the process which started with the establishment of the United Nations itself—the reassertion of the right of every nation, big or small, rich or poor, endowed or deprived, to full sovereignty and equality. The charter amplifies sovereignty in its economic manifestation, and it is one more step that the international community has taken towards a just and equitable economic order in the world. It seeks to redress the imbalance of rights and duties for those countries upon which a peculiar constellation of historical legacies imposed a perpetuating condition of poverty and deprivation and which were placed at a disadvantage in the prevailing set of international economic relations. In seeking to redress this imbalance, the charter represents a consistent principle of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries.

35. In spite of the historical significance of its adoption, it is increasingly clear that 10 years later the charter remains largely unimplemented and the world economy continues to suffer from severe structural imbalance, which has been exacerbated by the recent economic crisis of proportions unparalleled since the great depression. The worst sufferers in the global recession have been the developing countries, which are facing increasing balance-of-payments deficits, mounting debt burdens and deteriorating terms of trade along with sharp decreases in development assistance.

36. It should be noted that, while seeking to restore the balance in international economic relations, the charter takes due account of the legitimate interests of the more affluent and industrialized States as well. In fact, it is a remarkably prescient document. Even 10 years ago, it clearly foresaw the increasing interdependence of the world economy, the relationship between peace and development and the need for greater international co-operation for mutual benefit. It is in these basic premises that all our co-operative efforts originate. It is therefore a matter of particular regret that the consensus for development which is embodied in the charter and in so many other documents of the United Nations is itself being laid open to question. Nothing could cause greater harm to international economic co-operation at a time when it is most needed.

37. It is in this spirit that the non-aligned countries express their regret at the very limited response that the request of the Secretary-General for information on the review of implementation has evoked. It is our hope that the proposed meeting of an ad hoc intergovernmental committee next year will make possible a careful examination of areas to which greater attention needs to be paid by the international community and will lead to a firm consensus on measures to reach those objectives. We are aware that some countries have reservations on some provisions of the charter. On this occasion we would like to invite them again to join the mainstream of international opinion on economic rights and duties.

38. One area which requires urgent consideration is the liberalization of trade. The provisions in articles 14 and 18 of the charter on increasing the access of exports of developing countries and for preferential treatment for such exports are particularly important. The broad thrust of trade liberalization since the Kennedy and Tokyo rounds seems to have been reversed, and protectionist barriers are taking increasingly arbitrary and discriminatory forms. To restore confidence in the international trading system, it is essential that existing commitments on standstill and rollback of protectionism be urgently implemented. In accordance with article 22 of the charter, a much greater effort is also required to increase the flow of financial resources to developing countries and progressively to reach internationally agreed targets for official development assistance. It is ironical that in the present grave economic conditions a net outflow of capital is taking place from developing countries as a whole.

39. The General Assembly has served to focus the international community's attention on the critical economic situation in Africa. The Prime Minister of India, in his capacity as Chairman of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, has expressed the solidarity of the Movement with the efforts of African countries and appealed to all members to join in the efforts to meet the immediate challenge, as well as the long-term task of fostering sustained economic growth. The objective of collective self-reliance through increased economic co-operation among developing countries, as enshrined in the charter, is one of the major principles of the Non-Aligned Movement. In this spirit, we are ready, along with the rest of the international community, to assist in any manner possible.

40. In conclusion, I should like to draw particular attention to article 8 of the charter, which places the highly significant responsibility on all countries to "co-operate in encouraging structural changes in the . . . world economy" in order to facilitate a more rational and equitable system of international economic relations. Article 10 further prescribes that all States "have the right to participate fully and effectively in the international decision-making process in the solution of world economic, financial and monetary problems". It is clear that this is one of the most pressing areas of concern. I need not dwell at length here on the reasons which prompted the heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, at their Seventh Conference, held at New Delhi from 7 to 12 March 1983, to stress the urgent need for the launching of global negotiations and to call for an international conference on money and finance for development.[2] Since that call was made, the need for change, be it described as improvement or reform, has become almost universally accepted. It would be particularly fitting if, on the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the charter, we could reach an understanding on this most pressing area of concern and initiate a process of consultations which would enable the convening of that international conference on money and finance for development.

41. The PRESIDENT: I now call on Mr. Pascal Gayama of the Congo, Chairman of the Group of African States for the month of December.

42. Mr. GAYAMA (Congo) (interpretation from French): Only a few days separate us now from the adoption by the Assembly of the Declaration on the Critical Economic Situation in Africa [resolution 39/29, annex]. At a time when, on behalf of the Group of African States, we are undertaking a succinct evaluation of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, this coincidence cannot but influence our perceptions.

43. Assuredly, the Declaration just adopted by the General Assembly does not mention this charter, adopted 10 years ago, which in its preamble stated that it is a fundamental purpose of the present charter to promote the establishment of the new international economic order.

44. Nevertheless, for many Africans the norms and principles defined by the charter remain of indisputable validity and retain a usefulness no one can underestimate for the realization of the objectives set forth in the Declaration.

45. Indeed, if the overall economic and social situation of the African continent is very far today from the conditions advocated in the charter when the General Assembly declared itself "desirous of . . . the promotion . . . of the economic and social progress of all countries, especially developing countries", we must certainly see here, above all, an effect of the particularly devastating natural calamities such as drought and desertification which have greatly afflicted the economies whose structures were still far from firm.

46. These natural disasters, however, are not the only factors involved here. They have only added to and aggravated other factors which are equally deplorable, such as laws and practices now in effect in the present international economic order. This being the case, we can ask whether effective implementation of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, if it did not reduce the consequences of the African crisis, at least might have made it possible to discern their symptoms more systematically and to intervene with more effectiveness and assurance.

47. On this point, the Group of African States supports the idea of creating an intergovernmental committee of the whole which we hope would be able to determine the precise relationship between Africa's economic situation and the non-implementation of the charter.

48. It seems necessary for us to stress, on the occasion of this tenth anniversary, that despite the less than receptive atmosphere on the part of some developed countries to the goals and principles of the charter, that charter nevertheless remains more than ever the touchstone for all normative approaches made in recent years to give real meaning to the concept of underdevelopment that can no longer be considered a sad inevitability, but as a relative state, caused by a basically unjust, blind economic system.

49. Through the clarification of ideas and the redistribution of roles that it advocates, the charter offers prospects for lending substance to the concept of the right to development and proposes the implementation of essential structural reforms appropriate for changing the picture of international economic relations.

50. The validity of the charter flows both from the goals that inspired it and from the conditions that made it necessary. The aim it was meant to serve 10 years ago remains as valid as ever.

51. First of all, it seems to us necessary to introduce into the indifferent play of market forces a minimum of ethical considerations such as would serve the goals of justice and equity which are the beginning and the end of any political undertaking. Then, it is important to stress that the conditions that some 10 years ago determined the economic and social crisis of the world have not changed. That crisis affects the developing countries, particularly those of Africa, much more than it does the developed countries. It is the gravest crisis the world has known since the 1930s. Its persistence or its aggravation definitively refuted the subjective theories that attributed all the evils of the situation solely to the rise in oil prices, and placed the responsibility on the developed countries which ceaselessly profit from a situation that is profitable to them in every aspect.

52. Thus the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States has to deal, in the implementation of its basic provisions, with the paralysing inertia, if not with the veiled or declared opposition, of those who since the beginning have seen in it a dangerous revolutionary operation, aimed at sowing chaos and desolation among the wealthier countries. They have therefore made efforts to play down its significance and to reduce its practical effect on those areas of international economic life where an attempt has been made to draw up new rules for the game, as regards production and trade as well as finance and development.

53. In all these areas lively resistance is noted, which does not even leave untouched such basic concepts as that mentioned in article 1 of the charter, "the sovereign and inalienable right [of every State] to choose its economic system as well as its political, social and cultural systems in accordance with the will of its people, without outside interference, coercion or threat in any form whatsoever."

54. There are circumstances also which show us that the provision in article 2, according to which "Every State has and shall freely exercise full permanent sovereignty, including possession, use and disposal, over all its wealth, natural resources and economic activities", is constantly the subject of negative assessment by those States whose technological capacities and economic or military power are considered to give them the right to dispose, for imperialist ends, of the resources and activities of the weaker countries.

55. However, institutions whose liberal intentions and initiatives no one can doubt, such as the World Bank, are saying the same thing when, evaluating the worrying economic situation of Africa, they advocate that international assistance for development should take into account, above all, the priorities and programmes formulated by the countries concerned themselves.

56. In this context, we remain convinced that if the global negotiations had been able to lead to operational agreements in the essential areas of raw materials, trade, development, currency and finance, this would have made it possible to achieve in a co-ordinated way the basic goals and objectives of the charter, which are reflected in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade.

57. Opposition to the charter is shown, finally, in a general retreat from the spirit of co-operation, a retreat characterized by the adoption of protectionist policies, the cut-backs in contributions in the form of public assistance to development and, generally speaking, inadequate efforts to ensure the financing of multilateral development programmes and the re-establishment of bilateral procedures, which are not all free from responsibility in the present crisis of the developing countries in general and African countries in particular.

58. In article 17, the charter clearly states that "International co-operation for development is the shared goal and common duty of all States."

59. The lack of haste shown by our partners in the developed countries with respect to the recommendations of UNCTAD, in particular to the establishment of the Common Fund for Commodities, which is of major interest for Africa, demonstrates the nature of the obstacles that have to be overcome to promote the essential purposes of the charter.

60. There are other measures, such as those provided for in the Substantial New Programme of Action for the 1980s for the Least Developed Countries,[3] which interest Africa above all, as most of the least developed countries are found in Africa. The implementation of that Programme is still the subject of discussions.

61. From the sectoral standpoint, the results hoped for from industrial development or agricultural development have not been forthcoming, despite the mobilization of the specialized agencies concerned.

62. Science and technology are important tools for development, as recognized in article 13 of the charter, which states: "Every State has the right to benefit from the advances and developments in science and technology for the acceleration of its economic and social development." Africa, more than other regions concerned, has not been able to profit satisfactorily from this in order to establish the bases for true endogenous development.

63. In sum, confined to a minor role in the redistribution of international economic activities, which are essentially perceived in terms of neo-colonialist schemes, the African continent has not been able, despite its enormous potentialities and resources, to convert itself into a pole of development activities "to contribute to the balanced expansion of the world economy", as article 31 of the charter states, taking due account of the interdependence of the elements which make up the entire international community.

64. Africa had already tried to reformulate the principles of the charter in accordance with its basic priorities through the Lagos Plan of Action for the Implementation of the Monrovia Strategy for the Economic Development of Africa, adopted on 29 April 1980.[4] The Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity, whose twentieth ordinary session was held at Addis Ababa from 12 to 15 November 1984, advocated the revitalization of this Plan in the light of the present situation. In this regard, an economic summit conference is scheduled in 1985, which certainly will be able, in addition to dealing with pressing immediate problems, to undertake an evaluation of medium- and long-term projects, such as those for the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa and the Industrial Development Decade for Africa, as well as of the implementation of sub-regional economic projects.

65. The Lagos Plan of Action, completed by the Monrovia Strategy for the Economic Development of Africa, thus constitutes Africa's positive answer to the appeal in the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States which embodies these objectives. The effective implementation of the Lagos Plan of Action will make Africa the privileged partner it wishes to become, in the framework of co-operation and the new international economic order.

66. In the area of political independence and sovereignty, we Africans know very well the cost of becoming and acting as a sovereign agent of international law to which the terms of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States would apply.

67. By expanding the horizons of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the charter gives valuable support to all those struggling, as in Namibia and South Africa, for recognition of the inalienable rights of peoples, as article 16 of the charter states clearly when it says:

> "It is the right and duty of all States, individually and collectively, to eliminate colonialism, apartheid, racial discrimination, neo-colonialism and all forms of foreign aggression, occupation and domination, and the economic and social consequences thereof, as a prerequisite for development."

It also says that: "No State has the right to promote or encourage investments that may constitute an obstacle to the liberation of a territory occupied by force."

68. Need we stress the extent to which in this context the South African apartheid régime and its illegal occupation of Namibia constitute an obstacle to the full satisfaction of the conditions for the application of the charter in Africa?

69. South Africa, which always lags behind an evolution, is here in the paradoxical position of contemporary colonial Powers when, despite the adoption of the mother instrument, the Charter of the United Nations, followed by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, they did not hesitate to carry out atrocious colonial wars, putting themselves at odds with the juridical instruments they themselves had elaborated.

70. In the final analysis, Africa realizes very well that the principles which should govern international economic relations, peaceful coexistence and the independence of States are disrupted by the tension that persists at present in East-West relations, which some are happy to extend to our continent. The arms race and the attempts to establish spheres of influence that result from it are hardly conducive to the promotion of the provisions of article 15, according to which: "All States have the duty to promote the achievement of general and complete disarmament . . . and to utilize the resources released by effective disarmament measures for the economic and social development . . . ".

71. Among the instruments worked out to supplement the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States has a very significant place.

72. Certainly, the Charter of the United Nations exists, and it already includes among its objectives

"international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social . . . or humanitarian character". Article 55 of the Charter of the United Nations in Chapter IX, on economic and social co-operation among nations, goes even further, and states:

> "With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the United Nations shall promote:
> a. higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development;
> b. solutions of international, economic, social, health, and related problems . . . "

73. In fact, the Charter of the United Nations had so stated; but if the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was needed to specify those stipulations in the area of individual freedoms, no document had yet dealt to this extent with the matter of equality of partners in world development, in the context of a more just and more equitable international order.

74. The norms and principles of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States refer essentially to the hopes and the underlying realities of the world we live in. The General Assembly reflected their spirit and exigencies when, 10 years ago to the day, on 12 December 1974, it adopted its historic resolution 3281 (XXIX). Human evolution has been marked by moments and acts of universal importance, in which mankind has united in a determination to blaze a path to peace and prosperity by assuring conditions of maximum security and progress.

75. To establish the bases of civilization for all men, all nations to benefit, the crisis through which we have been passing for more than a decade has shown that it no longer suffices to create a technological network in which men are mere puppets in the hands of puppeteers who have no respect for ecology and the environment.

76. The rediscovery of our unity and our common destiny imposes on us other attitudes towards the poverty, hunger and misery which today challenge human ingenuity.

77. The crises and insecurity that characterize the existence of most of our planet, the threats and dangers that haunt our very lives, require that we drastically change our behaviour.

78. For our part, the option is clear: the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States constitutes one of the pivots for a rebirth which the current political, juridical and socio-economic factors make imperative. The new international economic order forms the essential framework for this rebirth.

79. The PRESIDENT: The next speaker is Mr. Abdullah Salah of Jordan, Chairman of the Group of Asian States.

80. Mr. SALAH (Jordan) (interpretation from Arabic): The General Assembly is commemorating today the tenth anniversary of the adoption, in 1974, of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States. It is indeed an important occasion, on which the Assembly recalls the spirit on which the charter was based and the objectives for which it was formulated, foremost among which are to strengthen co-operation, to solve all international problems in the area of economic and social rights and to strive towards a new economic order based on justice, equal co-operation, to common interests, interdependence and equal, sovereign rights of States.

81. This charter, which stems from a clear recognition of the importance of economic interdependence between States, strives to create an appropriate international atmosphere for establishing the principles that would serve the progress and economic development of all the States in the world. It stresses particularly the necessity for encouraging and assisting developing countries to achieve a better life for all their peoples through accelerating economic and social development, making available the necessary means for that development through the encouragement of international trade, and facilitating the transfer of technical and financial resources and the required technology. The charter also stresses the importance of reinforcing co-operation among developing countries and calls for the creation of conditions for international co-operation that foster progress and economic stability.

82. On the occasion of the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the charter, we would like to commend the initiative that led to its adoption. That initiative was taken by Mr. Luis Echeverría, the former President of Mexico, whose effective role led to further important initiatives being taken on the international scene. The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the Group of 77, which met in 1974 and were also chaired by the representative of Mexico, initially took an important part in formulating this charter. Since its adoption, there have been important developments on the international economic scene, which must be referred to when the charter is considered. Of particular note are the development and strengthening of co-operation among developing countries and the efforts of the Group of 77 to enhance that co-operation, which extends to different areas, the most important of which are the promotion and development of technical and commercial co-operation among developing countries, in the field of science and technology and the preparation of a system of preferences among developing countries themselves. The means for strengthening this co-operation are still being put into effect through different meetings and through the specialized co-ordinating mechanism within the Group of 77. The Movement of Non-Aligned Countries has also taken part in establishing a similar co-operation. The two groups, namely the Group of 77 and the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, have been active in their efforts to bring about a new international economic order through constructive negotiations between developing and industrialized countries. Of note also were the results of the North-South dialogue and the United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries. A historic achievement was the adoption of the Convention on the Law of the Sea. After prolonged and difficult negotiations, the overwhelming majority of States of the world joined those negotiations and acceded to the Convention. There was also the establishment of the Common Fund for Commodities.

83. The global negotiations between developing and developed countries are stalled. Those negotiations are aimed at establishing a new international economic order that would lead to stability and an improvement in the international economic situation. We hope that those negotiations will be resumed as soon as possible, as the present economic conditions call for expediting the common efforts of States to contain the current international economic crisis and the negative impact of this crisis on developing countries. We cannot, of course, talk about the charter on this occasion without referring to the developing countries. Obviously the developing countries suffer more than other countries from this crisis. The economies of those countries are experiencing negative growth rates, if not recession. At a time when the burden of servicing the foreign debt is also increasing and when participation in international trade is becoming more and more limited, there is no doubt that, among measures aimed at the liberalization of international trade, the most important measures are those that favour the exportation of industrial products from developing countries to industrialized countries. We also have to eliminate protectionism, intensify the transfer of financial resources and loan concessions and improve the terms of lending. While we welcome the signs of recovery in the economies of industrialized countries, we hope that a similar recovery will occur in the economies of developing countries.

84. Working with a positive spirit and with constructive co-operation is the best way to achieve our objectives and to implement the articles of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, which is based on the Charter of the United Nations itself.

85. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, who will speak on behalf of the Group of Eastern European States.

86. Mr. KRAVETS (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) (interpretation from Russian): The socialist countries on whose behalf I am speaking—the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, the People's Republic of Bulgaria, the Hungarian People's Republic, the German Democratic Republic, the Mongolian People's Republic, the Polish People's Republic, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic—on this tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Charter of the Economic Rights and Duties of States have the honour to make the following statement.

87. The Charter of the Economic Rights and Duties of States is one of the most important basic instruments of the United Nations in the economic sphere. The importance of the charter lies primarily in the fact that, along with the Declaration on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order [resolution 3201 (S-VI)], it has determined the main areas for restructuring international economic relations on a just and democratic basis. An evaluation of the implementation of the charter is in essence an evaluation of the progress achieved by the world community towards implementing the ideas of the new international economic order and of the difficulties which hamper the process of democratization of international economic relations.

88. The particular concern of the socialist countries, in a profound objective evaluation of the results of the implementation of the charter over the last 10 years, is based on their sincere desire, along with all other countries, to take concrete, purposeful steps to restructure international economic relations on a just, democratic basis.

89. The principles and provisions of the charter determine not merely economic, but also political, relations among States. Equality, the recognition of the total sovereignty of States in their economic activities, the inadmissibility of any interference in the internal affairs of other States, peaceful coexistence and the duty of States to promote the implementation of general and complete disarmament—these political principles of the charter are fully sympathized with and supported by the overwhelming majority of Member States of the United Nations.

90. However, the process of international détente, which in the mid-1970s was marked by an expansion and sustained development of economic, scientific, technological and cultural relations and links among States, has been disrupted because of the action of the imperialist States.

91. The policy adopted by the United States of America in the late 1970s and early 1980s to change, to its advantage, the existing military and strategic balance and its desire to attain a dominating position in the world had an extremely negative impact on the development of normal relations among States. That policy flagrantly conflicts with the Charter of the United Nations and with the basis of international economic relations which is set forth in chapter I of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, and also the provisions of its articles 1, 4, 15 and 26.

92. As a result of the aggressive policy of the imperialist States, a dangerous situation has been created in the world. As was stressed in the communiqué of the thirty-ninth session of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance [CMEA] at Havana, the intensification by these forces of the arms race is one of the most important reasons for the deepening of political and economic instability in the world, which has increased the danger of nuclear war, threatening the very existence of mankind and imposing an increasing burden on the peoples of the world because it diverts enormous material and financial resources and slows down economic and social progress. The member countries of CMEA believe that the implementation of realistic measures to curb the arms race and bring about disarmament is a pressing task.

93. Of particular value for putting into practice the provisions of the charter concerning the maintenance of international peace and security could be the implementation of the specific proposals of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries set forth in decisions of the high-level Economic Conference of the member countries of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance, held in Moscow from 12 to 14 June 1984 [see A/39/323]; the proposal by the States Parties to the Warsaw Treaty to the States members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization [NATO] regarding negotiations on the freezing and the reduction of military expenditures, dated 5 March 1984;[5] the Prague Political Declaration adopted at a meeting of the Political Consultative Committee of the States Parties to the Warsaw Treaty on 5 January 1983;[6] the communiqué of the thirty-seventh session of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance, dated 20 October 1983;[7] and the many other joint instruments of the socialist countries regarding the halting of the arms race, the non-increase in and reduction of military expenditures and the move towards disarmament in order to ensure that the resources released may be used for purposes of social and economic development, particularly that of the developing countries.

94. The basic purposes of the charter are also to promote the establishment of the new international economic order, to strengthen international co-operation for the purposes of development and to resolve the basic impediments to the economic development of the developing countries.

95. Now, 10 years after the adoption of the charter and of the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, there has been virtually no real progress in restructuring international economic relations on a just, democratic basis. A start in this process could be global negotiations on the most pressing world economic problems, in keeping with General Assembly resolution 34/138. However, since the adoption of that resolution, not only have we not seen any positive progress on this matter but we have witnessed attempts to deny the agreements already achieved. The deadlock on the launching of global negotiations is due to the reluctance of imperialist circles to give up their privileged position in the world capitalist economy. Their policy is aimed not merely at maintaining but also at extending their neo-colonial exploitation of the developing countries and at continuing to drain those countries of colossal financial and material resources.

96. The socialist countries firmly support the speedy launching in the United Nations of global negotiations, in keeping with the decisions taken by the Organization, with the participation of all States and taking into account their legitimate interests.

97. As was emphasized in the Declaration adopted at the high-level Economic Conference of the member countries of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance entitled "The maintenance of peace and international economic co-operation" [ibid., annex II], the member countries of CMEA are consistent advocates of the adoption of effective decisions and actions aimed at eliminating any kind of exploitation in international economic relations; ensuring unimpeded international scientific and technological co-operation; eliminating discrimination, artificial impediments and unequal exchanges in commercial relations; and establishing an economically fair system of justified pricing for commodities, food and manufactured goods and, with this in mind, monitoring more closely the activities of the transnational corporations.

98. They advocate streamlining monetary relations and they are opposed to any policy driving up interest rates. They advocate normalization of the terms of granting credit, so that such terms, particularly with regard to the indebtedness of the developing countries, will not be used as a means of exerting political pressure and interfering in the internal affairs of others.

99. The socialist countries are profoundly convinced that acceleration of the development of the newly liberated States and the attainment by them of economic independence are possible only by radically breaking off unjust economic relations inherited from the colonial past. It is precisely that approach that is reflected in the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States.

100. Recently, increased pressure has been placed on the developing countries by the imperialistic States to force them to give up progressive social and economic transformations, to reduce the size of the public sectors of their economies, to review their national plans and development programmes, to rescind legislation that seeks to protect their national industries and to open the door to the uncontrolled predominance of foreign private capital.

101. This pressure is an open manifestation of latter-day neo-colonialism, and it grossly violates the provisions of the charter, in particular articles 1, 7, 10, 16 and 24.

102. Accordingly, the establishment of effective control over the activities of transnational corporations is particularly important in order to limit their harmful effect on international relations and development. The well-known "package proposal" of the Chairman of the special session of the Commission on Transnational Corporations is a realistic basis for concluding work on a code of conduct for transnational corporations. Its adoption could be an important step towards implementing the relevant provisions of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States.

103. The socialist countries strictly abide by the progressive principles of the charter and in a practical manner are promoting their implementation.

105. The socialist countries are giving the developing countries all-round broad-based assistance, as far as they are able, in forms that reflect their socialist structure, the effectiveness of which has been acknowledged by the developing countries themselves. This is graphically illustrated by facts relating to this assistance that have been referred to by a number of socialist countries in the United Nations.

106. As far as the contents, principles and goals are concerned, trade and economic, scientific and technological co-operation between the socialist countries and the developing countries constitutes a new type of international economic relations countering the system imposed by imperialism, which is one of exploitation of the natural and human resources of countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America. The nature and type of co-operation that exists between the socialist countries and the newly liberated countries are fully in accordance with the provisions of the charter, in particular articles 4, 14, 18 and 19, and represent a basic contribution by the socialist countries towards the implementation of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States and towards a restructuring of international economic relations on a just and equitable basis.

107. The assistance given by the socialist countries promotes progressive structural transformations in the economies of the developing countries and makes a substantial contribution towards their attainment of economic independence. With the participation and assistance of the socialist countries, many hundreds of enterprises have been built and are being built—for example, in the fields of metallurgy, energy, mining and light industry—the transfer of technology on concessional terms is being carried out, and there is widespread training of nationals.

108. Foreign trade between the socialist countries and the developing countries is increasing apace. In their trade policies, the socialist countries strictly abide by and will always abide by the principles of the charter as regards the inadmissibility of any discrimination in international trade and in other areas of economic co-operation, as well as the need for developing international trade on a basis of equality and mutual advantage, irrespective of differences in political, economic and social systems.

109. The increase of protectionism in the developed capitalist countries has seriously hampered international trade and economic co-operation as a whole, as has the use by imperialistic countries of sanctions and embargoes of various kinds. The use of economic pressure for political purposes, despite the clear prohibition of such measures in articles 16 and 32 of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, and the practice of sanctions, blackmail, blockade and other means of economic coercion have become extremely widespread. In this connection, of great importance is the adoption by the General Assembly at its thirty-eighth session of resolutions entitled "Confidence-building in international economic relations" and "Economic measures as a means of political and economic coercion against developing countries", and the adoption by the Second Committee, at the thirty-ninth session, of draft resolution A/C.2/39/L.98,[8] on the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, resolutions which seek to oppose the use of measures to exert pressure on the developing countries or to interfere in their internal affairs. The fact that many imperialistic countries voted against those resolutions shows that the policies of sanction and blockade are part of their foreign policy strategy. This is a gross violation not merely of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, but also of the Charter of the United Nations.

110. An important contribution towards the implementation of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States is the co-operation of socialist countries within the framework of CMEA.

111. The socialist countries have created a new type of international economic integration which is an example of genuinely equitable and mutually advantageous co-operation among all countries. The affinity in political and socio-economic goals of these States makes it possible for the member countries of CMEA to move successfully towards a radical solution of a whole range of socio-economic problems.

112. A new stage in economic socialist integration was embarked upon at the high-level Economic Conference of the member countries of CMEA, which laid down the basic areas for mutual economic co-operation for the long term.

113. As was stressed in the statement adopted at the Conference, on basic lines for further developing and intensifying economic, scientific and technological co-operation among the member countries of CMEA,

> "consistent implementation of the decisions adopted will give a new and important impetus to the further progressive development of their economies and to mutual co-operation, enhance the prestige and appeal of socialism in the world, and further expand and strengthen the unity of the CMEA member countries, joined in a community of fundamental class interests and linked by the ideology of Marxism-Leninism" [ibid., annex I].

114. The present tense political situation, the disruption by the imperialist States of world economic relations, the absence of real progress towards the restructuring of international economic relations on a just and democratic basis: all this has further increased the significance of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States.

115. The communiqué issued after the recent meeting of the Committee of Foreign Ministers of the States Parties to the Warsaw Treaty, held on 3 and 4 December 1984 at Berlin, emphasized that the States represented at that meeting condemned the imperialist policy of force and expressed their solidarity with and support for peoples fighting for their freedom, the strengthening of their independence and their socio-economic progress; they took note of the important role played by the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries in fighting for the elimination of the danger of war, the halting of the arms race, disarmament and the improvement of international political and economic relations; and they expressed opposition to any forms of domination and exploitation by States [see A/39/763, annex].

116. The socialist countries believe that the task of the comprehensive review of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States that is to take place in 1985 will be to promote the elimination of the obstacles to the effective implementation of the charter's provisions and to do everything possible to ensure that the progressive principles of the charter, which seek to bring about a radical improvement in international economic relations, are implemented.

117. The PRESIDENT: Because of our heavy programme of work for this afternoon's meeting, this commemorative meeting of the General Assembly must be completed this morning. I therefore appeal to representatives to make their statements as brief as possible. I also propose that, if there is no objection, the list of speakers be closed now.

It was so decided.

118. The PRESIDENT: I now call on Mr. Henri A. M. Guda of Suriname, who will speak on behalf of the Group of Latin American States.

119. Mr. GUDA (Suriname): Today we commemorate the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States by the General Assembly at its 2315th meeting, held on 12 December 1974. As Chairman of the Group of Latin American States for the month of December 1984, I therefore wish to make the following observations on behalf of our group of States on this solemn occasion.

120. Article 34 of this charter stipulates that:

> "An item on the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States shall be included in the agenda of the General Assembly at its thirtieth session, and thereafter on the agenda of every fifth session. In this way a systematic and comprehensive consideration of the implementation of the Charter, covering both progress achieved and any improvements and additions which might become necessary, would be carried out and appropriate measures recommended. Such consideration should take into account the evolution of all the economic, social, legal and other factors related to the principles upon which the present Charter is based and on its purpose."

121. However, the General Assembly in its resolution 37/204 requested the Secretary-General to submit a report on the implementation of this charter for consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1984.

122. Before the implementation of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States is considered, it is deemed both necessary and useful to present a brief overview of the background against which it was proposed, promoted and adopted.

123. In 1971, President Luis Echeverría of Mexico expressed the opinion that the plight of the developing world would be served if and when the economic rights and duties of States were codified by the nations of the world. He reached a consensus on this matter with Brazil and Chile, documentation of which was approved by the Group of Latin American States prior to the planning session of the third session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, which was held at Santiago from 13 April to 21 May 1972.

124. At that session, UNCTAD took up President Echeverría's idea and established a working group to prepare a draft charter for submission in its final version to the twenty-eighth session of the General Assembly. The working group was instructed to use as a basis the principles adopted at the first session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the suggestions made at the third session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the Declaration and Principles of the Action Programme of Lima[9], the principles set forth in the Charter of Algiers[10] and the documents of the Second United Nations Development Decade. After many obstacles had been overcome and after an extended mandate, a final report was requested from the working group for the twenty-ninth session of the General Assembly.

125. On 12 December 1974, the General Assembly adopted the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, contained in its resolution 3281 (XXIX).

126. What has been its effect? What progress has since been made?

127. In our opinion, the charter placed special emphasis on the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of States, the equality of rights, the promotion of international social justice and the abstention by States from attempts to seek hegemony and spheres of influence. Our Governments have regarded and continue to regard this charter as an adequate instrument both for the harmonious development of the world community and for the maintenance of international peace and security.

128. But, on balance, it appears that the charter has remained unimplemented in general. If we review the fundamentals of economic relations and the economic rights and duties of States as laid down in the charter, we cannot but be disappointed. Intervention in the internal affairs of States and economic coercion still take place in many parts of the world, thereby threatening the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political and economic independence of States. Disputes are still not being settled peacefully in many instances and international obligations are often not fulfilled in good faith.

129. The Secretary-General in his report to the General Assembly on the implementation of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States states, inter alia:

> "Since the adoption of the Charter . . . considerable progress has been made with regard to the lowering of tariffs to trade . . . Parallel with that progress, however, has been the marked increase in protectionism, which has become more specific in focus, more sectoral in scope and, in general, more discriminatory in its effect. It now appears that protectionism is geared not only to the defence of domestic markets but also, in certain cases, to the capture of foreign markets by means of export subsidies . . . . The growth in protectionism and its existing structures have had a major impact on trade, particularly on the exports of developing countries. . ." [See A/39/332, para. 6.]

It is now generally recognized that protectionism is especially harmful to the trade and development of developing countries and that measures should be taken as a matter of urgency to ensure the removal of all impediments to trade.

130. This is seen as an important obstacle on the road to implementation of the provisions of the charter. We of the Group of Latin American States are of the opinion that too much damage has been done to our economies by the open or covert protectionism existing in the world today.

131. The pressure exerted by the reduced prices of raw materials and commodities, the excessive rise in prices of imports, which are mostly quoted in the strong United States dollar, the necessary loans for development and the debt-servicing and amortization costs, that pressure has been too much to bear and has devastated our economies. It is now widely known that the external trade balance for 19 countries in Latin America which had a surplus of more than $US 13 billion in 1980 changed into a negative balance of over $US 1 billion in 1982; while, compared to previous years, the prices of 14 out of 18 main export products from this group of States fell in 1982 by as much as a quarter. In the meantime, the total Latin American debt amounts to three times the value of exports from this region.

132. With regard to the generalized system of preferences, it was agreed after a review by the Special Committee on Preferences that the objectives of the system had not been fully achieved and that the duration of the system should be continued beyond the initial period. Although the amount of trade carried out under the system has been increasing, it still represents a little less than one quarter of the preference-giving countries' dutiable imports from beneficiaries. We are of the opinion that the system should be expanded and liberalized.

133. With regard to the international monetary system, the Secretary-General's report stated: "The severe economic problems faced by developing countries during the period under review were largely of external origin and partly attributable to the workings of a system in whose creation and operation developing countries played no significant role." [Ibid., para. 10.] If any change is to be made in this regard it is imperative that developing countries play a greater role in the decision-making process of the multilateral financial institutions. To a certain extent, this already seems to be materializing; however, not to an extent satisfactory to our group.

134. Aid to the developing world has been slow over the last few years and has, in fact, been overshadowed by private bank lending, carrying high interest rates. However, funds disbursed through multilateral financial institutions grew rapidly in the eight years from 1974 through 1982. In our opinion, these institutions have started to move in the right direction with some positive initiatives. They could, and indeed should, play an important catalytic role in development financing in the near future. Their resource base should, therefore, be expanded. It is unfortunate that the replenishment process of these institutions has met with so many obstacles and shortfalls.

135. In general, it can be stated that our group of developing countries has had some measure of success in shifting the ownership of production facilities to our countries. The concept of establishing joint ventures seems to be preferred in some instances, especially in manufacturing, and certainly where know-how is externally controlled and markets are situated abroad. Therefore, transnational corporations can still exercise effective control over local affiliates. But some progress has been achieved in this sector. It is encouraging that many of our countries have been able to ensure, through general measures or individual agreements, that the affiliates of transnationals operating in our countries indeed contribute to national development. Performance requirements and effective transfer of technology are in many instances more or less standard practices. Understandably, we consequently take a great interest in a code of conduct on transnational corporations.

136. It is not our intention to discuss all aspects of the charter at this time. We have highlighted some aspects which, in our opinion, needed special attention today. The Group of Latin American States reaffirms its support for the charter, which aims at restructuring the existing international economic order to bring justice, development, peace and stability to the world.

137. The PRESIDENT: I now call on Mr. Hans-Werner Lautenschlager of the Federal Republic of Germany, Chairman of the Group of Western European and Other States.

138. Mr. LAUTENSCHLAGER (Federal Republic of Germany): I have the honour to speak on behalf of the Group of Western European and Other States.

139. An anniversary lends itself to both a retrospective view and a look ahead into the future. Whoever sets out to chronicle the history of the North-South relationship in the 1970s will certainly have to mark 12 December 1974 as an outstanding date. The Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, adopted on that day, provides us with a concise record of the concepts which have guided our third-world partners in the North-South dialogue, on which these concepts have their bearing. It would be less than honest to pass over in silence the fact that not everyone among us has been able to accept the charter in all its parts. However, as a manifestation of the political will of a majority of United Nations Member States it deserves respect.

140. As a landmark, it justifies our looking back at the ground covered since 1974 in the dialogue between North and South. Nobody can deny that we have jointly achieved significant progress on substantive questions as well as on the ways and modalities by which the dialogue is carried on. Developed and developing countries may still be separated by different views, but preparedness for co-operation has become the basis of our actions, not least in the United Nations system. The most conspicuous testimony to this is the fact that today we are able to adopt nearly all resolutions that are relevant to the North-South relationship by consensus. This was borne out convincingly in the case of the Declaration on the Critical Economic Situation in Africa, which we adopted a few days ago [resolution 39/29, annex].

141. As I have already mentioned, an anniversary also invites a look ahead. The progress achieved in the course of the last 10 years does not warrant any complacency. The problems of the developing countries are multitude, and the overall picture has become more complex. The challenge to the international community, however, remains unchanged. We have come to understand that interdependence is not a hollow slogan. If we want to master the pressing problems confronting us, if we want to overcome poverty, hunger and distress, then we must act jointly. Only joint action will bring us nearer to our goal of genuine and lasting partnership between North and South—a goal to which we are all committed. The progress achieved in recent years should encourage us to continue along the way we have embarked upon.

142. The PRESIDENT: I call on Mr. Saoud Bin Salim Bin Hassan Al-Ansi of Oman, who will speak on behalf of the Group of Arab States.

143. Mr. AL-ANSI (Oman) (interpretation from Arabic): On behalf of the Group of Arab States, which my delegation has the honour to represent this month, we are pleased to participate with the rest of the world today in commemorating the tenth anniversary of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States. It is not often that we in the United Nations commemorate positive achievements in the work that has extended over nearly 40 years.

144. Most of the items on the agenda relate usually to conflicts, wars or differences in the social, economic and political spheres. The present occasion is a positive landmark in the course of work of the international Organization, as we commemorate today the passage of 10 years since the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States and review together what has been achieved and what should have been achieved in this regard.

145. The adoption by the General Assembly of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States by its resolution 3281 (XXIX)—and resolution 3201 (S-VI) is relevant—in fact acknowledged the importance and greatness of the Charter of the United Nations itself, which is designed primarily and fundamentally to maintain international peace and security and to achieve international co-operation for the solution of mankind's social, economic and political problems. This charter is inspired in its preamble by the lofty, great principles embodied in the Charter of the United Nations, which we all cherish.

146. The world order with its social, economic and political aspects is a single indivisible whole. If any part of that order malfunctions, the other parts will be undermined under the influence of that malfunctioning part, and the economic order in this regard surely plays the same role. If all the elements of that order function properly, then the whole will function properly. Is there anybody who expects that the world will witness stability in the political and social spheres in the absence of an economic order based on justice and understanding among all the countries of the world? Can man in any part of the world live in isolated economic stability while his fellow man in other parts of the world dies of hunger and thirst?

147. The Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States was adopted to consolidate the principle of justice in the economic sphere. It also reflects deeply the new international economic order energetically sought by the developing countries to take into account the development of all economic, social and legal factors and other factors of relevance to the principles on which the charter is based and to its genuine aim: to define the most suitable measures for its implementation and to find lasting solutions to the grave problems, especially to those problems afflicting developing countries Members of the United Nations. These countries look forward to the day when they will witness the fruit of continuous work and positive dialogue with the other parties concerned.

148. Surely, no one disputes the importance of this question, coming as it does in the wake of a long era marked by the exploitation of the resources and wealth of the third-world countries which today find themselves facing new realities and evolving economic conditions requiring that they demonstrate more care and diligence, lest they lose the opportunity. The new international economic order serves not only the developing countries but, at the same level, the developed countries. The development of the economies of the developing countries will open new vistas to the benefit of all countries of the world, regardless of their economic systems.

149. The Group of Arab States, which is made up of developing countries, and in turn falls within the scope of the Group of 77, is gratified and pleased to join the world in commemorating the tenth anniversary of the adoption of this charter and hopes that this anniversary will move all the countries of the world to more action and to constructive dialogue excluding marginal differences, with the aim of achieving a more peaceful and prosperous future.

150. Mr. MUÑOZ LEDO (Mexico) (interpretation from Spanish): In response to a recommendation of the Economic and Social Council, the General Assembly is commemorating today the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States. In so doing, it is reliving one of the great moments in the life of the Organization.

151. This, to be sure, is a ceremonial occasion, but it is also a political act of clear unmistakable meaning. Paying a tribute to this basic instrument of relations among States means reaffirming the commitment of the United Nations to the principles that gave it birth and reaffirming the economic reordering of international society.

152. Indeed, the Charter is the culmination of a long process of developing awareness of the deep injustices which survived political decolonization and aggravated inequalities among nations. It also constitutes a tangible, specific response to the conclusion of the cycle initiated at Bretton Woods and to the disarticulation of the economic order designed in the wake of the great conflagration.

153. The expansion of the society of States which took place for three decades had not been in harmony with an adjustment of the policies or the institutions conceived for the stability and the recuperation of the post-war period. Quite to the contrary, the interests of the emerging countries had been ignored and progress confined to a small group of industrialized economies. Progress for the rest was barely marginal.

Mr. Gumucio Granier (Bolivia), Vice-President, took the Chair.

154. The developing world had discovered that political liberation was not necessarily accompanied by economic liberation. On the other hand, the rigidity of the system and the competition created between the main actors on the international economic scene had led to the violation of the rules which had been agreed upon and to the establishment of the disorder which lasts to this very day.

155. The initiative in working out the charter and the efforts to promote the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order took place in the same historical period and have the same purpose. An epoch of growth that was intensive and at the same time unbalanced had concluded, and it was urgently necessary to establish on the basis of mutual agreement the foundations of universal, shared development.

156. It was necessary to reconstitute rationally the organization of the world economy, based on the needs and potential of all countries. The changes in the political structure of the society of States had to be reflected in the economic sector in order to ensure the full exercise of sovereignty within a truly democratic international system.

157. Demands for a new international economic order were formulated at the beginning of the crisis in anticipation of the catastrophe we are faced with today. The suspension, in 1971, of the convertibility of the dollar into gold, the pivot of the international monetary system, heralded the collapse of the established order. Subsequently, protectionist measures, financial disruption, generalized inflation, the dislocation of international trade and the world-wide insufficiency of the means of production occurred, which led to an unprecedented concentration of resources and to unacceptable conditions of poverty and want in the majority of nations.

158. During the 20 years which preceded the charter initiative, world production increased threefold and the larger part of the industrial capacity of the world today was established. It might have been supposed that the scientific and technological revolution of the present-day world, which took man into space and by the same token made possible the annihilation of man, would have served his redemption. This would have required only a little intelligence and solidarity, but that was what the most powerful lacked.

159. As various delegations have mentioned at this session, on 19 April 1972, Mexico proposed the preparation of a charter of economic rights and duties of States, presaging the hour of change in Latin America and our own country. The validity of a dependent and frequently repressive development model having been exhausted, we were trying, through a democratic opening and just participation in the world economy, to overcome centuries of backwardness and enter into an era of full autonomy, a new stage of civilization.

160. The charter was to many countries both a national definition and a project for international reform. It was a consistent, well-reasoned offer from the working peoples to the owner peoples, as it were. It offered the possibility of a new social contract that would have made possible, had it been heeded, progress for all with dignity for each.

161. It is not a coincidence that the proposal to work out the charter was presented by a country threatened by foreign intervention, and where those threats were confirmed by the cruel overthrow of a democratic nationalist régime. Struggles for economic justice are inseparable from the defence of basic human rights and the sovereignty of States and nations.

162. During the third session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, held from 13 April to 21 May 1972 at Santiago, we set forth the urgent need to strengthen the precarious juridical foundations of the international economy. We affirmed that neither a just order nor a stable world would be possible until the rights and obligations protecting weak States were defined and the democratic principles on which the Organization is based were given tangible form and effect in the area of economic relations.

163. We said that our era was marked by a worldwide struggle for development in which every form of colonialism or dependence would have to be discarded. We denounced the tendency to relegate to the sidelines problems of productivity and employment generated in the industrial economies, the price of which was the serious impoverishment of the majority, and we proposed the basis for an era of genuine economic co-operation based on equality and in the mutual interest of all nations.

164. The value and validity of the principles we set forth at that time have been confirmed with the years. They resulted from a calm, objective analysis of the world economy and its perspectives, and what has occurred in the meantime has shown many times over how right was our initiative and how obstinately wrong the opposition to it.

165. The picture we foresaw a decade ago has materialized in such a serious form that, we must confess now, we did not even imagine at that time how frighteningly true it was to prove. The economic crisis has come about and been institutionalized, as it were, as a progressively spreading world-wide phenomenon, whose most severe effects can be seen in the developing countries, but which no people escapes. This is indeed, basically, a structural disorder, which grievously wastes the great accumulated potential of nature and the abilities of man.

166. The distribution of the world income by regions, social groups and individuals is irrefutable proof of disregard of the basic principles of the United Nations. The ruin of whole countries, owing to the arbitrary vicissitudes of foreign debt, the depression experienced by most economies, unemployment rates, the abysmal level of hunger and ill health and the recurrent reductions in world production levels should force us to react in a responsible way.

167. Unfortunately, the response to the economic crisis has been the dismantling of the institutions we established to confront such crises. The principles of the new international economic order are disregarded, the provisions of the charter we are commemorating today are ignored, the North-South dialogue is trivialized, the International Development Strategy is not complied with, the commitment to global economic negotiations is not honoured, the International Conference on Money and Finance for Development is postponed, the code of conduct for transnational corporations is rejected, the immediate adoption of measures to alleviate the serious effects of the crisis is resisted, international economic co-operation is paralysed, a humiliating bilateralism is practised and multilateralism is deliberately sabotaged. These are indisputable facts which provide clear evidence of persistent conscienceless behaviour.

168. These phenomena are greatly aggravated by the recurrent tensions between East and West. Their competition for world domination and the incredible consequences of the arms race have made all countries indeed into silent tributaries of militarism and have made all their peoples hostages of a nuclear economy which threatens to destroy everything tomorrow, and today allows for precious little growth indeed.

169. On behalf of the States Members which are members of the Group of 77, a draft resolution entitled "Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States" was introduced to the General Assembly. It is proposed in the draft resolution that, because of the deep concern at the gravity of the world economic situation, a thorough and systematic review of the implementation of this instrument be made in order to identify the most appropriate means to ensure its viability. The task would be entrusted to an ad hoc intergovernmental committee of the whole, which would meet for three weeks in 1985. That would be the best opportunity to begin the reversal of prevailing trends.

170. We fervently hope that the essential unity of the developing countries, those who promote the principles of the Organization, will overcome the obstacles cast in our path by a scarcely dissimulated neo-colonialism. We hope that we may build, with full exercise of independence by all and full recognition of the interrelationships of our objectives, an economic society that will effectively utilize the resources of this earth and its people to achieve a development based on genuine peace, a peace which will be reflected in equitable progress.

171. We repeat today, as we did 10 years ago, the commitment of Mexico to the United Nations, and recall the words of our President, Miguel de la Madrid Hurtado:

> "The crisis of the world economy is breaking down the post-war system established to orient and promote the expansion of production. This can be dramatically seen in the exhausting of the mechanisms and models and the prolonged deterioration of trade and exchanges, and a sequel of inequality, increasing obstacles and backwardness, to an extent that threatens an economic deterioration of unforeseeable consequences.
> "It is urgent to reactivate the productive forces and the exporting power of the developing countries, to extend the horizon of the economic and social progress of the world, to revitalize international co-operation, to initiate the series of global negotiations for development. We must admit that interdependence implies responsibilities and benefits for all States, in order that development may be translated into stability and constitute a collective interest of the community of nations. The objective of establishing a new international economic order is not to divide the world into antagonistic poles of development. It is not an exclusive project; it is an integrating process.

"International co-operation for development is one of the basic mainstays and objectives of the foreign policy of Mexico. We are convinced, and have been for a long time, that only through conscientious responsible practice of such co-operation will it be possible to aspire to live in the future in an international order that is more just and equitable."

172. That is the unswerving position of my country in the struggle in which we will never waver.

173. Mr. ORAMAS OLIVA (Cuba) (interpretation from Spanish): The Government of the Republic of Cuba attaches high priority to the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States as the important tool it is in the struggle of the developing countries to achieve more just and equitable international economic relations within the framework of the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order. In the 10 years following the adoption of that document, international economic relations have constantly deteriorated and international co-operation has sunk to the lowest level in its history. This situation affirms more strongly than ever the validity of the charter and the need for an analysis of the failure to implement it, which would contribute to identifying once again the causes that have given rise to the appearance and the aggravation of many negative phenomena and trends such as we witness in the world economy today.

174. The Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States was conceived as a valuable legal instrument for governing economic relations between States regardless of their economic and social régimes, their size or their levels of development. The close link between its postulates and the realities of the contemporary world and with the main instruments that govern the destiny of the Organization, including the Charter of the United Nations, make it a document of great importance indeed. They give it a significance that goes far beyond the conditions of the international situation in which it was adopted.

175. The charter was conceived for the purpose of contributing in a decisive way to the economic and social progress of peoples, of speeding their economic growth and eliminating the gap between the developed and the developing countries, as well as eliminating the main obstacles to the economic progress of the developing countries. In this context, the preamble of the charter reaffirms the need for establishing a more just and equitable economic and social order, to which end it recommends the achievement of a new sort of international economic relations and the promotion of structural changes in the world economy, as well as the creation of conditions permitting the expansion of trade, the strengthening of the economic independence of the developing countries and the promotion of international economic relations which would take into account the specific needs of the developing countries and the differences that separate them in the economic sphere from developed countries.

176. We now note with alarm that international economic relations, instead of showing progress—as foreseen by the charter—towards substantial improvement, which would promote the development of the so-called third-world countries, are radically deviating from this objective, and instead of promoting the restructuring of international economic relations to make them more compatible with the interests and development needs of the so-called third world, these tend to reinforce existing unjust and inequitable structures.

177. The imposition of protectionist measures, aggravated by new methods which do greater harm to the trade interests of the developing countries, the reduction in the prices of the raw materials and commodities which these countries export, together with excessive increases in the prices of their imports, high rates of interest on loans and increased expenditure on amortization and debt-servicing, among other negative elements, have reached an unprecedented level in recent years and have contributed to the fact that the effects of the crisis in the world capitalist economy are being felt more strongly by the third world. The spiral of external indebtedness and debt-servicing, the increasing deterioration from the point of view of the developing countries of the trade-price relationship, their difficulties in gaining access to resources, capital and technology are but a pale reflection of the critical situation these countries are experiencing.

178. The way in which the principles embodied in the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States are applied at present is very different from what it was in 1974, not because there has been an improvement in their application, but because the failure to apply them is even more flagrant than it was then.

179. Thus, no progress has been made in the international co-operation advocated in the charter, which was to have taken place within the framework of the United Nations. Since 1979, when, on the initiative of the sixth Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Havana, the General Assembly adopted resolution 34/138, the member countries of the Group of 77 have worked assiduously and in a flexible manner to ensure the launching of global negotiations which would make a decisive contribution to confrontation of the main problems of the economies of the developing countries and to the just and democratic restructuring of international economic relations. In this context, we have been confronted for five years now with inflexible, discriminatory, delaying actions designed to change substantially the very nature of those negotiations.

180. At the same time, the international economic conferences held within the framework of the United Nations system, which should have made substantial contributions to the development of the so-called third-world countries—including, most recently, the sixth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the Fourth General Conference of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, the Code of Conduct for Transnational Corporations and the examination and evaluation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade—have not had any tangible results. On the contrary, it is clear that these efforts become more negative with every passing day and are facing increasing difficulties and an ever-growing number of obstacles, instead of being positive and heading towards a system of reasonable and effective international co-operation.

181. The Cuban delegation supports the draft resolution on the charter which was presented by the Group of 77 to the Second Committee, and we feel that it is very important to establish an ad hoc intergovernmental committee of the whole to meet in 1985 to examine exhaustively and systematically the application of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States in order to identify the most appropriate means of applying the charter that could lead to lasting solutions to the serious economic problems of the developing countries.

182. In sum, the decade which has passed since the adoption of the charter shows the full validity of all its provisions and the need to strengthen the efforts of the international community to implement these provisions. Otherwise, the development of peoples will become more remote with each succeeding day and we shall sink further into an unpredictably disastrous abyss.

183. In conclusion, I will repeat something our President, Fidel Castro, said from this rostrum at the thirty-fourth session of the General Assembly: ". . . unequal exchange is ruining and impoverishing our peoples and must cease. Inflation, which is being exported to us, is impoverishing our peoples and must cease. Protectionism impoverishes our peoples and must cease." [31st meeting, paras. 86-88.]

184. Mr. XIE Qimei (China) (interpretation from Chinese): We meet here today to commemorate the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, which is an event of significance. The Chinese delegation sincerely hopes that this meeting will have positive effects and contribute to the promotion of the North-South negotiations and the strengthening of international economic co-operation.

185. The Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, adopted by the General Assembly 10 years ago, is an important document. This document, together with the Declaration and Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, sets forth the basic principles for the establishment of a new international economic order and points to the orientation of the democratization and rationalization of world economic growth and social development for a fairly long period. The charter provides that every State has the right freely to choose its economic system and freely to exercise full permanent sovereignty over its natural resources and economic activities, and also establishes the right of developing countries to participate on a basis of equality in international economic relations. Based on the fact that developing countries are in a disadvantageous position in the existing international economic system as a result of the long years of colonialist rule they were subjected to, the charter lays down a number of more just and equitable principles to guide international economic co-operation. They include the granting of preferential treatment to developing countries, stabilization of their export earnings, the right of every State to benefit from the advances in science and technology and the need to give developing countries development assistance. These principles are aimed at restructuring the world economy and establishing a new system of international economic relations so as to facilitate the acceleration of the economic development of the developing countries and seek to bridge the economic gap between themselves and the developed countries, in the interest of promoting the common prosperity of all countries. All this is conducive to the maintenance of world peace and stability and conforms to the interests of the peoples of all countries. The principles I have mentioned will therefore remain valid for a considerably long period of time.

186. As we commemorate the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the charter today, we cannot but point out with regret that the charter remains largely unimplemented and that the economic development of the developing countries still faces a most unfavourable external environment.

187. Primary products, the main source of export earnings for the developing countries, are seriously affected by the violent fluctuations in the international commodity market and their terms of trade are deteriorating. The principles and rules for the multilateral trade system have been grossly violated, and protectionist measures are multiplying. The generalized preferential system has not been fully implemented owing to the many restrictive measures imposed on the variety and quantity of commodities.

188. The developing countries call for a more just and effective international division of labour, so as to change the structure of world production and speed up their industrialization. However, for many years the negotiations on protectionism and structural adjustment have produced no concrete results, and the formulation of a code of conduct on transnational corporations and an international code of conduct on the transfer of technology have long remained unfulfilled; consequently, the process of industrialization in the developing countries has been very slow, and to this day, their share of world industrial production has been small. Should this be allowed to continue for long, the prospect of reaching the Lima target will remain dim.

189. With regard to development funds, public assistance for development has stagnated since the beginning of the 1980s, being less than half of the international target of 0.7 per cent. Moreover, there is a tendency to stress the bilateral approach while reducing multilateral assistance. The capital of the international monetary institutions has become even less commensurate with the needs, while the terms for obtaining credits and loans from those institutions have become increasingly harsh. Loans from international private banks have been drastically retrenched and the interest rates on bank loans are very high. As a result, developing countries have run into a serious shortage of development funds. The factors I have mentioned, combined with the reduction of export earnings, an increase in real interest rates and the over-valuation of some key currencies, have resulted in a sharp rise in the foreign debts of developing countries, going up from about $US 160 billion 10 years ago to over $US 800 billion today. By 1983, interest payments outflows of the developing countries were already more than the net inflow of credit.

190. In short, the charter has largely been unimplemented in the past 10 years, and irrational and unjust international economic relations remain basically unchanged. Especially the recent economic crisis has further weakened the position of many developing countries in the world economy, thus making the structural imbalances in the world economy even more prominent. The economic growth of these countries has been stagnant, and the gap between the rich and the poor countries is widening. This cannot but cause grave concern to the international community. At the current session of the General Assembly, many countries have stated the basic reasons for the lack of progress in the implementation of the charter and the measures that should be taken. Here we also wish to offer our observations and suggestions.

191. It is true that there are domestic causes for the serious economic difficulties in the developing countries. However, to a great extent those difficulties are the result of the structural malfunctioning in the world economy. International economic relations must be transformed along the lines pointed out by the charter and the basic documents on the establishment of a new international economic order. Should we fail to take reform measures to remove those malfunctions, developing countries will face long years of low growth rates or stagnation and fall into an ever-deepening whirlpool of indebtedness, or even a crisis of survival. That will make it hard for the world economy to regain vitality.

192. The launching of global negotiations is, after all, an important instrument worth trying by the international community in the course of establishing the new international economic order. We hope that the few major developed countries that still take a negative attitude towards this will reconsider their positions. At the same time, we believe that the international community should not rest content with merely issuing declarations of principles, nor should it wait passively. Instead, it should promptly adopt a set of comprehensive, interrelated, practical and effective measures designed genuinely to help the developing countries solve their pressing problems and regain their development momentum.

193. The United Nations provides an excellent venue for North-South dialogue and multilateral economic co-operation. In recent years the role of the Organization has been somewhat weakened, which is not beneficial to the implementation of the charter. We hope that one major developed country will change its present position and contribute to strengthening the competence of the United Nations in making and implementing decisions in the economic field.

194. The People's Republic of China has made and will continue to make efforts for the implementation of the charter. China is a socialist developing country which pursues the principle of "maintaining the leading role of the planned economy supplemented by market regulation" and the policy of "opening to the outside world". It has established trade relations with 174 countries and regions on the basis of equality and mutual benefit, and it actively promotes its economic co-operation with other developing countries. By the end of 1983, China had helped 76 developing countries build over 1,300 projects and had dispatched over 180,000 engineers and technicians to those countries.

195. China respects the sovereignty of the recipient countries, attaches no political strings to its aid, offers them low-interest or interest-free loans and transfers to them those technologies that are suited to their domestic conditions with a view to helping them to promote their national economies. China has consistently taken a positive approach towards the North-South dialogue and stood for the promotion of economic co-operation between the developing and the developed countries on the basis of continuous transformation of the unjust and inequitable international economic relations. We are ready to join all other countries, particularly developing countries, in making unremitting endeavours for the implementation of the charter, the establishment of the new international economic order and the revitalization of the world economy.

196. Mr. GOLOB (Yugoslavia): Ten years have passed since the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States. It is a relatively short period, but a sufficient one to prove that the validity and importance of the charter have only increased with the passage of time. This document is among the achievements of the United Nations, marking the most brilliant pages of its history. It is a vision of the world for which we are all striving.

197. Although the charter deals with economic rights and duties of States, it necessarily and rightly involves principles and a wider scope of international relations. All segments of international relations are today mutually intertwined and interdependent. Only joint action can enhance and accelerate progress in the world. It is often quite difficult to point out the individual achievements of economic, social and other measures and actions taken in order to promote international relations in general and in some spheres, including the economic sphere, in particular.

198. In the preamble to the charter, the General Assembly states that its fundamental purpose is to promote the establishment of the new international economic order, based on equity, sovereign equality, interdependence, common interest and co-operation among all States, irrespective of their economic and social systems.

199. In order to reach this goal, action cannot be confined to efforts in the economic sphere. Therefore the charter proceeds from a set of principles which regulate, as explicitly stated in the charter, "economic as well as political and other relations among States". The principle of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of States is rightly placed at the top of the list. It is followed by others, including the principle of international co-operation for development, which is found in numerous other United Nations documents, and first of all, explicitly or implicitly, in the Charter of the United Nations.

200. In the context of economic rights and duties, these principles have a particular purpose and meaning, since they express the entire complexity of the conditions to be fulfilled in order to achieve substantial economic and social progress in the world.

201. Like any other document of a similar nature, the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States is future-oriented. It contains far-reaching and progressive aspirations in the most important fields of international relations. On the other hand, it perhaps overlooks some realities of the world we live in. Although it did not receive universal support, we nevertheless keep returning to it, as on this occasion, in order to be inspired by it and to continue to act in its spirit with greater resolve.

202. This is more necessary today than ever, since there is a dangerous exacerbation of relations in the world, with acute crises, conflicts and disputes, with a critical situation in the world economy, particularly in the developing countries, and with a dramatic situation on the continent of Africa.

203. It is our desire that this occasion will serve as a contribution to greater awareness of the need to overcome those negative trends by proceeding to constructive negotiations within the United Nations framework and by implementing its decisions, in which the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States has a prominent place.

204. All creative and significant initiatives emerge at times when circumstances demand them and when there exist subjective forces able to express them and sooner or later to carry them out and translate them into practice. The charter whose tenth anniversary we are observing is yet another confirmation of that simple but historic truth.

205. All this does not lessen but, on the contrary, emphasizes the far-sightedness and statesmanship of Mr. Luis Echeverría, who, as President of Mexico, initiated and elaborated the concept of the charter. The non-aligned and other developing countries remain its natural source and stronghold. The charter, however, also enjoys the support of some developed countries, which we hope will be greater in the future, since what is involved here is the common interests of the entire international community.

206. Mr. PÉREZ GUERRERO (Venezuela) (interpretation from Spanish): The commemoration of the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States is an event of great importance for the international community and for the United Nations which represents it.

207. This charter originated on the initiative of the President of Mexico, at the third session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, held in Santiago in 1972. It was my privilege to invite President Echeverría to take the Chair at that Conference. That happy and daring initiative was broadly supported, and the relevant resolution was adopted with certain reservations on the part of a few countries, as tends to be the case when a forward-looking position is called for in the United Nations, as in these years of transition towards a new, more just and equitable international economic order.

208. Following the arduous work carried out at UNCTAD, the adoption of the charter by the General Assembly constituted a very important contribution to bringing order to economic relations, which already were showing signs of great instability and were becoming the focus of deep concern.

209. Ten years later, we find ourselves in a situation of great difficulty and suffering for most of mankind which those in some circles try to hide. However, the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States remains an undeniable contribution to the new international economic order. It is an instrument which must survive all these vicissitudes. It is part of international law, and this position can only be consolidated with the progressive forward movement—which has now been practically halted—towards a new international economic order, thus leaving behind for ever the present injustices which afflict us.

210. The international community cannot allow a world that is already adrift to continue to be subjected to developments resulting from the collapse of an anachronistic order of things. We must ensure, from both the global and the sectoral points of view, that when the most economically powerful countries realize that this is in their interest as well as in that of all the other countries, the United Nations is able, without any further vacillation or hesitation but also without undue haste, to take the positive path indicated by our common needs and interests.

211. The Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States is of great assistance to us in undertaking this difficult but indispensable task.

212. Mr. PLECHKO (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (interpretation from Russian): The Soviet delegation fully agrees with the statement made at the present meeting by the representative of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic on behalf of the socialist countries concerned.

213. We, in turn, wish to make a few additional points.

214. Throughout its existence, the Soviet State has tirelessly pursued a foreign policy designed to bring about, in the words of Vladimir Ilyich Lenin, "international relations making it possible for all oppressed nationalities to throw off the imperialist yoke".

215. The adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States was an important stage in the struggle of the progressive forces of the world to improve and democratize international economic relations. It became possible as a result of the consistent, joint efforts of the socialist and developing States to break with the old order and establish a new, just international economic order.

216. The first few years of the charter's existence coincided with the process of international détente, and there were favourable prospects for its successful implementation. However, the policy adopted by the imperialist forces, particularly the United States, in the late seventies and early eighties, of winding down détente and stepping up the arms race, of seeking military supremacy and imposing their systems on other peoples, broke off this process of improving international conditions and did substantial harm to the emerging structure of mutually advantageous economic relations among States with different social and economic systems. As a result, progress in the implementation of the purposes of the charter has been insignificant.

217. In recent years, the imperialist Powers have increasingly been grossly violating the basic principles of international political and economic relations, by pursuing a policy of blackmail, diktat and so-called economic sanctions. It is the fault of imperialism that political tension has spread to international economic relations, causing very dire consequences for the prospects of the democratization of world economic relations. Certain developing countries are being increasingly involved by aggressive Western circles in the recent spiral in the arms race that has been imposed by those circles, and this has had a negative impact on the state of international economic relations.

218. The Soviet Union has always stressed the basic importance of the intrinsic link between development and disarmament for the successful process of the improvement of international economic relations. In the letter on this question addressed to the Secretary-General on 18 May 1984, Mr. A. A. Gromyko, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the USSR, stresses:

> "The growth of the arms race leads to an intensification of the distortion and instability of international economic relations and worsens the prospects for restructuring them on just and democratic principles and creating a new international economic order free from exploitation and diktat".[11]

219. The Soviet Union, which has consistently put forward important disarmament initiatives, seeks the adoption of realistic measures to curb the arms race. That would enable us to increase significantly the resources allocated to development, including that of the developing countries.

220. The developing countries, whose economic problems are a direct consequence of the colonial and neo-colonial policies of the imperialist States, continue to suffer the dire consequences of the crisis in the capitalist economy today. The debt problem may become irreversible because of the colossal drain of financial resources from the developing countries through the channels of the transnational corporations to the developed countries. As a result of this phenomenon, the net losses of the developing countries in foreign currency from 1980 to 1982 alone were, according to the Group of 77, about $200 billion.

221. The situation has been further compounded by the fact that the Western States have disregarded such provisions of the charter as equal participation by all States in the international decision-making process in the solution of world economic, financial and monetary problems, promotion of the transfer of high technology to the developing countries, and the granting of assistance to developing countries free of any conditions derogating from their sovereignty—provisions in articles 10, 13 and 17 of the charter.

222. On the whole, in recent years we have witnessed a clear hardening by the major Western countries of the political and economic conditions not only in regard to development assistance but also in regard to virtually all areas of economic relations.

223. Capitalizing on the serious economic situation of young States, the imperialist circles are bent on forcing the developing countries to renounce the support given by United Nations bodies to the progressive demands of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and the Group of 77 for the restructuring of international economic relations. Because of the position of the Western countries, all the basic economic initiatives of the developing countries have been blocked.

224. In contrast to this obstructionist policy of the imperialist Powers, the Soviet Union and the other socialist States have always given and will continue to give political support to the developing countries in their efforts to achieve economic independence and the democratization of international economic relations. It is precisely thanks to that support that in recent years the United Nations has been able to adopt important resolutions for the development of the progressive provisions of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States. I am referring in particular to such resolutions adopted at the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth sessions of the General Assembly as those on "Economic measures as a means of political and economic coercion against developing countries" and "Confidence-building in international economic relations".

225. In the Declaration of the high-level Economic Conference of the member countries of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance, held in Moscow from 12 to 14 June 1984, it is stated that:

> "In international economic relations, there is a vital need for mutually advantageous and equal co-operation among all countries. Without that, there can be no sound material basis for consolidating and expanding détente." [See A/39/323, annex II.]

226. The Soviet Union actively and consistently supports the proposal of the developing countries to hold in the United Nations a round of global negotiations, in keeping with General Assembly resolution 34/138, which is being sabotaged by the West.

227. A significant contribution by the USSR in implementing the goals of the charter is the consistent policy to have an all-round development of trade, economic, scientific and technological co-operation with the developing countries. In our country, that policy has been institutionalized as State policy and is a new type of international economic relations. Specific facts relating to the magnitude and form of our economic assistance to the developing countries are well known. In this area, the USSR continues to do more than any developed capitalist country.

228. The Soviet Union will continue decisively to seek to implement the progressive decisions taken by the United Nations in the area of restructuring international economic relations on a just and democratic basis, in particular on the provisions and principles of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States.

229. Mr. KOROMA (Sierra Leone): Ten years ago today, the General Assembly, with tremendous prescience, adopted the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States on the initiative of the Government of Mexico. The intention of the charter then, and now, is to enhance the legal and binding character of international economic relations, removing economic co-operation from the realm of good will and grounding it in the law by transferring consecrated principles of solidarity among men to the sphere of relations among nations.

230. It is a tribute to the tremendous foresight of the Assembly that the objectives of the charter, namely, to promote the establishment of the new international economic order based on equity, sovereign equality, interdependence, common interest and co-operation among all States, particularly in the economic field, have remained as valid today as when they were first enunciated some 10 years ago. Another clarion call in that document is for a just and equitable economic and social order through structural changes in the world economy and other measures that take into account the specific needs of developing countries.

231. Commemorating the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States provides us with an opportunity to determine how many of its objectives, if any, have been achieved, and if the answer is negative, to work out new strategies to ensure its implementation.

232. In taking stock, it is of concern and regret to the Sierra Leone delegation that 10 years after the adoption of the charter, its economic, social and political goals have remained largely unfulfilled. Today, the economic climate for many of our countries is even bleaker than when this instrument was adopted 10 years ago. The failure of the international community to rise to the challenges and opportunities of the charter is partly responsible for the present dire economic consequences that now afflict most of our countries and threaten our very survival.

233. Today, the stark economic reality of the African condition is that millions of people are afflicted by hunger, malnutrition, illiteracy and abject poverty. Over the last few years, the economies of African countries have suffered severe declines in growth and output of goods and services. This trend, already apparent in the 1970s, has worsened over the last three years, leading to depressing growth rates or total stagnation. The result is a dangerous fall in already precarious living standards, mass starvation and widespread decay of the small but vital infrastructure and even the environment.

234. The reasons for this decline are many and varied. Foremost among them are the recent severe world recession which has had such a damaging effect on the economies and productive capacity of many African countries, and the stubborn refusal of our trading partners to pay fair, remunerative prices for our commodities and raw materials, as called for in the charter. Furthermore, the international trading system still requires developing countries to negotiate the prices they receive for their major raw materials and commodities, while they must pay the ever-increasing prices that are set by the manufacturers using those same raw materials and commodities. It is thus inevitable that the weakest members of the system are driven into bankruptcy.

235. For Africa, these various factors have been further aggravated by the most severe drought the continent has suffered in this century, resulting in a catastrophic fall in food production and the consequent loss of human lives through famine and starvation.

236. The acute debt problem of third-world countries, particularly those in Latin America, has preoccupied the international community over the last two years. The harsh conditions attaching to those debts are today hampering economic recovery and development in many of the affected countries.

237. Given the magnitude and severity of the problems that I have just been describing, it is clear that the African people cannot on their own prevent the imminent economic collapse that threatens many of their impoverished nations, nor can they, on their own, implement the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States. While we recognize that our Governments must continue to bear responsibility for our own well-being, on the other hand, we expect the international community, in a spirit of solidarity and in a reaffirmation of our mutual interdependence, to help to avert the catastrophe that now threatens the African continent.

238. Specifically, the international community has to come to grips with the continuing adverse terms of trade which now plague the economies of much of the third world in general. In this connection, the reform of existing financial institutions, the reduction in the present crippling rates of interest and the liberalization of world trade—as demanded in the charter—must be considered imperative.

239. Furthermore, it is the view of the Sierra Leone delegation that in seeking solutions to the manifold problems now facing the African continent, intensification of economic co-operation within the multilateral and specialized institutions, especially the World Bank, FAO and UNDP, cannot be overemphasized. Those institutions must be given increased financial support and provided with the necessary resources to enable them to perform their tasks more effectively.

240. The aspiration of the charter to solve the real economic problems facing the developing countries today and the attainment of a just and equitable distribution of resources make the charter more timely and relevant than ever before.

241. Until we can begin to solve some of the economic problems facing the developing countries today, the impact of this document will remain limited, much against the will of the overwhelming majority of the members of the international community.

242. What is required, therefore, is a bold, imaginative and generous response to implement the provisions of the charter so that together we can find a lasting solution to our manifold economic problems.

243. Mr. OTT (German Democratic Republic): The position of the German Democratic Republic on the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States and its implementation has already been expressed in the joint statement of socialist countries which was just presented by the representative of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Mr. Vladimir A. Kravets. I would like to refer to that statement and affirm that this Magna Charta of international economic relations, which was adopted 10 years ago, remains as topical as ever and is fully valid. It is one of the fundamental documents of international economic relations which, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, defines the basic criteria, tasks and guidelines for United Nations activities in the politico-economic field. In this connection, we would like to pay tribute to the initiative and constructive activities of Mexico, which were highly conducive to bringing about the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States.

244. The active share of the German Democratic Republic in the elaboration and in the adoption by an overwhelming majority of General Assembly resolution 3281 (XXIX), together with the adoption at the sixth special session of the Assembly of the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order [resolutions 3201 (S-VI) and 3202 (S-VI)], was one of the first steps the socialist German State took within the framework of the United Nations in the politico-economic field.

245. Pursuant to its policy directed towards the safeguarding of peace and towards social progress, the German Democratic Republic has made all possible efforts to translate the charter into the practice of international economic relations. Full equality, respect for sovereignty, non-discrimination, mutual benefit and non-interference in internal affairs—these are the principles marking the relations of the German Democratic Republic with States having different social systems, not least developing countries. A constituent part of this policy is the solidarity and support rendered by the German Democratic Republic to those countries in their just struggle for economic independence and social progress.

246. The adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States took place at the time of the process of international détente, which also made possible a number of other important initiatives in the politico-economic field within the framework of the United Nations.

247. At the same time, the last decade has shown that a long distance remains to be covered from the adoption of progressive international instruments to their full implementation, with major obstacles having to be overcome on the way. The imperialist course of confrontation and arms build-up undermines the realization of the principles set forth in the charter. The artificial obstacles in international economic relations ensuing from such a policy, the threat or use of economic boycott, embargo and economic aggression, as well as other internationally illegal measures, run counter to the purpose of the charter. They must be excluded as a means of politics. What is equally needed is measures of confidence-building in international relations, including international economic relations. Such steps are as indispensable as are effective measures to halt the arms race and proceed to disarmament, particularly in the nuclear field.

248. It is these aspects underlying the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States that guided the Committee of Foreign Ministers of the States Parties to the Warsaw Treaty at its meeting held at Berlin on 3 and 4 December 1984. The Communiqué on the meeting [A/39/763, annex] recalls the proposals which the States Parties to the Warsaw Treaty have submitted to the United Nations since the Prague Political Declaration of 5 January 1983[6] to evolve and strengthen a policy of disarmament, safeguard peace and ensure equal and peaceful international co-operation. Among them are the proposals of the Warsaw Treaty States aimed at establishing a new international economic order and directed against the policy of interference in the internal affairs of States and all actions designed to undermine the socio-political systems in other States. The Ministers further stressed that the application of discriminatory restrictions in economic relations and any other kind of pressure contradict the basic principles of State-to-State relations.

249. It may be by chance that the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States and the meeting of the Committee of Foreign Ministers of the States Parties to the Warsaw Treaty coincide. But it is not by chance that the contents of the meeting's Communiqué, the latest document of socialist States, and those of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States are largely identical in terms of their tasks and objectives, not least because both documents are inspired by the desire to make an effective contribution to the peaceful co-existence between States having different social systems.

250. We are under no illusion that the implementation of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States and the struggle for equal and mutually advantageous international economic relations will not meet with strong resistance in the future also. The experience of the past 10 years has confirmed that progress on the road to normalizing and restructuring international economic relations can be achieved only by joint action between all anti-imperialist and peace-loving forces in the world. The activities of the United Nations in the politico-economic field over the past decade have proved that there is no reasonable alternative to the peaceful, mutually advantageous and equal co-operation of States in solving the great and complex tasks mankind is facing today.

251. The tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States should and must induce all sides concerned to redouble their efforts towards giving effect to the progressive principles and norms of international economic relations embodied in that document.

252. The German Democratic Republic, as in the past, remains ready and willing to make its contribution to that end.

253. The PRESIDENT (interpretation from Spanish): The commemoration of the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States is thus concluded.

The meeting rose at 2.20 p.m.

United Nations

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

THIRTY-NINTH SESSION

Official Records

97th PLENARY MEETING

Wednesday, 12 December 1984,
at 3.55 p.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

AGENDA ITEM 29

Question of Namibia (concluded):*

(a) Report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples;

(b) Report of the United Nations Council for Namibia;

(c) Reports of the Secretary-General

1. The PRESIDENT: May I remind representatives that the debate on this item was concluded on 4 December. In this connection, the Assembly has before it, in the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia [A/39/24, part four, chap. I], five draft resolutions recommended by the Council, and a series of amendments to those draft resolutions, contained in documents A/39/L.23 to A/39/L.25.

2. I shall now call upon those representatives who wish to introduce the draft resolutions.

3. I call upon the representative of Zambia, who wishes to introduce draft resolution A, entitled "Situation in Namibia resulting from the illegal occupation of the Territory by South Africa".

4. Mr. KUNDA (Zambia): The cause of Namibia's independence has been supported by the overwhelming majority of States since the early years of the Organization. Since then, the momentum has been kept up by the termination of the Mandate 18 years ago; by the historic advisory opinion handed down by the International Court of Justice on 21 June 1971;[1] and by Security Council resolution 435 (1978) and many other resolutions and decisions of the General Assembly and the Security Council.

5. Over the years, the international community has, however, been frustrated in its efforts to implement the United Nations plan for Namibia by the intransigence of the Pretoria régime, backed by its allies, which has created impasse after impasse, all of them familiar to those assembled here.

6. The racist régime has tried all kinds of manoeuvres to hoodwink the international community. I refer here to attempts by South Africa and the United States to link the question of Namibian independence to irrelevant and extraneous issues, such as the withdrawal of Cuban forces from Angola.

7. The Security Council has only recently rejected South Africa's insistence on linking the independence of Namibia to irrelevant and extraneous issues as incompatible with resolution 435 (1978), other decisions of the Security Council and resolutions of the General Assembly on Namibia, including General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960. By its resolution 539 (1983), the Security Council decided that, in the event of continued obstruction by South Africa, it would consider the adoption of appropriate measures.

8. South Africa's intransigence remains the major hurdle in the way of Namibian independence. It is in this context that the draft resolution that my delegation has the honour to introduce is to be seen. It is a draft resolution that has been recommended by consensus to the Assembly by the United Nations Council for Namibia.

9. The draft resolution begins by reaffirming once more the right of the people of Namibia to self-determination and national independence in a united Namibia, while reaffirming the mandate given to the United Nations Council for Namibia as the legal Administering Authority for that territory until independence. The draft resolution further reaffirms the legitimacy of the struggle of the Namibian people by all means, including armed struggle, under the leadership of the South West Africa People's Organization [SWAPO], their sole and authentic representative.

10. After laying down these basic principles reiterated year after year by the Assembly, the draft resolution proceeds to condemn South Africa for its continued illegal occupation of Namibia and for obstructing the implementation of Security Council resolutions 385 (1976) and 435 (1978), which remain the only basis for the internationally recognized peaceful settlement of the question of Namibia.

11. The draft resolution firmly rejects the persistent attempts by the United States and South Africa to establish any linkage or parallelism between the independence of Namibia and, in particular, the withdrawal of Cuban forces from Angola, and emphasizes unequivocally that any such attempts are designed to delay the decolonization process in Namibia and constitute interference in the internal affairs of Angola.

12. In view of the recent South African threats to proceed with yet another so-called internal solution in Namibia, such as the establishment of yet another puppet institution in the form of the so-called Multi-Party Conference, the draft resolution strongly condemns this latest direct violation of Security Council resolution 439 (1978), aimed at perpetuating its domination of the Territory.

*Resumed from the 84th meeting.

13. The draft resolution condemns the recent imposition of military conscription of all Namibian males between the ages of 17 and 55 into the occupying colonial army in yet another sinister attempt by the illegal occupation régime to suppress the national liberation struggle of the Namibian people and to force them to kill one another. In this regard, the draft resolution declares that South Africa's attempts to enforce military conscription in Namibia are illegal, null and void.

14. The draft resolution also denounces the establishment of the so-called Liaison Office of the United States Government in Windhoek in direct violation of relevant resolutions and decisions of the General Assembly and the Security Council, in particular Security Council resolutions 283 (1970) and 301 (1971), and in total disregard of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice,[1] and calls for its immediate closure and withdrawal.

15. The draft resolution urges the United Nations Council for Namibia, in its capacity as the legal Administering Authority for Namibia until independence, to consider the promulgation of additional decrees and other legislation in order to protect and promote the interests of the people of Namibia and effectively implement such legislation.

16. The draft resolution welcomes the release of the patriot Andimba Toivo ya Toivo, Secretary-General of the South West Africa People's Organization, and of other leaders of that organization and considers it a victory for the international campaign.

17. The draft resolution condemns the increased assistance rendered by the major Western countries and Israel to South Africa in the political, economic, financial and military fields.

18. The draft resolution condemns South Africa for its military buildup in Namibia and its use of Namibian territory to launch armed attacks against independent African States of the region, particularly its continued unprovoked attacks against and occupation of Angola. Furthermore, it expresses grave concern at the acquisition of nuclear weapons capability by the Pretoria régime as constituting a further attempt on its part to terrorize the independent States of the region while also posing a danger to international peace and security. In this regard, the draft resolution condemns the continuing military and nuclear collaboration of certain Western countries and Israel with the racist régime, which is in violation of the arms embargo imposed against South Africa under Security Council resolution 418 (1977).

19. The draft resolution also deals with South Africa's attempts to thwart the work of the Southern Africa Development Co-ordination Conference and it calls upon all States and the United Nations agencies to render all possible assistance to the Southern Africa Development Co-ordination Conference in its efforts to promote regional economic co-operation. The draft resolution declares that all activities of foreign economic interests in Namibia are illegal under international law and that all foreign economic interests operating in Namibia are liable to pay damages to the future lawful Government of Namibia and calls upon the Governments concerned to take appropriate measures to ensure the implementation of Decree No. 1 for the Protection of the Natural Resources of Namibia.[2]

20. The draft resolution reiterates its request to all States, pending the imposition of mandatory sanctions against South Africa, to take legislative, administrative and other measures, unilaterally and collectively, to isolate South Africa and requests the United Nations Council for Namibia to continue to monitor the boycott of South Africa.

21. Finally, the draft resolution calls upon the Security Council to adopt the necessary measures to tighten the arms embargo against South Africa and ensure strict compliance by all States and, in the light of the serious threat to international peace and security, urges the Security Council immediately to impose on South Africa comprehensive mandatory sanctions, as provided for in Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.

22. It is my sincere hope that this draft resolution will receive the full support of the Assembly.

23. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the representative of Guyana, who wishes to introduce draft resolution B, entitled "Implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978)".

24. Mr. SINCLAIR (Guyana): I have the honour to introduce draft resolution B, on the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978)—a resolution which is so well known to members of the Assembly that it hardly requires any introduction or description.

25. Representatives will recall that it was little more than one year ago—in October 1983—that the Security Council addressed itself to the question of the implementation of resolution 435 (1978). On that occasion it adopted resolution 539 (1983), in which it once again expressed its indignation at South Africa's refusal to comply with its resolutions, in particular at the racist régime's insistence on an irrelevant and extraneous issue of "linkage", which obstructed the implementation of resolution 435 (1978). The Council also reiterated that resolution 435 (1978) was the only basis for a peaceful settlement of the Namibian question.

26. The General Assembly, for its part, made a similar determination in its resolution 38/36 B, and demanded the immediate and unconditional implementation of resolution 435 (1978) without qualification, modification or amendment or the introduction of extraneous and irrelevant issues of "linkage", "parallelism" or "reciprocity" insisted upon by the United States of America and South Africa.

27. South Africa's intransigence, along with the support extended to it by its collaborators, remains the only hurdle in the way of Namibian independence.

28. The draft resolution which my delegation has the honour to introduce to this Assembly is succinct and to the point. After reaffirming the need to proceed without any further delay with the implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibia and after taking note of the consultations which have been held with a view to achieving the early implementation of the plan, it strongly condemns South Africa for obstructing the implementation of Security Council resolutions 385 (1976), 435 (1978), 439 (1978), 532 (1983) and 539 (1983) and for its manoeuvres, in contravention of those resolutions, designed to consolidate its colonial and neo-colonial interests at the expense of the legitimate aspirations of the Namibian people to genuine self-determination, freedom and national independence in a united Namibia.

29. It proceeds to reaffirm that Namibia is the direct responsibility of the United Nations until independence and reiterates that Security Council resolution 435 (1978) is the only basis for a peaceful settlement of the question of Namibia. In paragraph 8, it formally rejects the persistent attempts by the United States of America and South Africa to establish any linkage or parallelism between the independence of Namibia and the withdrawal of Cuban forces from Angola.

30. The draft resolution strongly condemns racist South Africa for sabotaging the Namibian independence talks held in 1984 at Lusaka and Mindelo by insisting on the notorious "linkage" pre-condition and introducing new insidious subterfuge as alternatives to resolution 435 (1978).

31. The draft resolution requests the Security Council to exercise its authority with regard to the implementation of its resolutions 385 (1976), 435 (1978), 532 (1983) and 539 (1983) so as to bring about the independence of Namibia without further delay, and to act decisively against any dilatory manoeuvres and fraudulent schemes of the South African administration in Namibia aimed at frustrating the legitimate struggle of the Namibian people for independence. In this connection, the draft resolution urges the Security Council to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions against the racist régime of South Africa under Chapter VII of the Charter, in order to ensure the total cessation of all co-operation with that régime, particularly in the military and nuclear fields, by Governments, corporations, institutions and individuals.

32. The concern of draft resolution B is purely and simply the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978), and nothing else. It is the implementation of what is the only internationally accepted framework for a settlement of the Namibian question, a framework unanimously adopted by the Security Council in discharge of its solemn obligation. For, so long as resolution 435 (1978) continues to be unimplemented, the suffering of the people of Namibia continues. As we consider this draft resolution, let us keep uppermost in our minds the well-being, the interests and the future of the people of Namibia and, accordingly, give this draft resolution our whole-hearted support.

33. The PRESIDENT: The next speaker is the representative of Yugoslavia, who will introduce draft resolution C, entitled "Programme of work of the United Nations Council for Namibia".

34. Mr. GOLOB (Yugoslavia): I have the honour to introduce, for the consideration and adoption of the Assembly, draft resolution C, entitled "Programme of work of the United Nations Council for Namibia".

35. The United Nations Council for Namibia was established by a General Assembly resolution as the legal Administering Authority for Namibia until its independence and as the policy-making organ of the Assembly on the question of Namibia. We in the United Nations Council for Namibia consider that the proposed programme of work of the Council for the next year will contribute to the effective and fruitful fulfilment of the mandate entrusted to it by the General Assembly.

36. The programme envisages that the Council will continue to represent Namibia and protect the interests of the people of Namibia in the international arena, including conferences, intergovernmental organizations and meetings of the specialized agencies and of non-governmental organizations. It will also continue to consult with Governments and seek their support for efforts of the United Nations designed to bring about a settlement of the question of Namibia.

37. The Council will also contact Governments and corporations in order to persuade them to cease any dealings with South Africa regarding Namibia and, particularly, to stop the exploitation of the natural and human resources of Namibia. It will consider the activities of foreign economic interests operating in the Territory of Namibia with a view to recommending appropriate policies to the United Nations General Assembly.

38. During 1985, the Council will take further steps to implement Decree No. 1 for the Protection of the Natural Resources of Namibia,[2] which it enacted on 27 September 1974. In this regard, the Council will consider legal action in the domestic courts of States and other appropriate bodies.

39. The Council will also continue to review and report on the progress of the liberation struggle in Namibia and to monitor the voluntary boycott of South Africa. It will, for these purposes, continue to gather information from governmental and non-governmental sources and to prepare comprehensive reports on developments concerning Namibia. It will hold a series of plenary meetings and continue to carry out hearings, seminars and regional symposia to obtain information and mobilize international action in support of the cause of the independence of Namibia.

40. In implementing its programme of work, as well as in any matter of interest to the Namibian people, the Council will continue its close co-operation and consultation with SWAPO, the sole and authentic representative of the people of Namibia. It will also continue to co-operate with the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and with the Organization of African Unity [OAU] on the question of Namibia.

41. The Council will undertake its programme of work with the intention of effectively increasing and intensifying international support for the speedy withdrawal of the illegal South African administration from Namibia and for the immediate independence of Namibia.

42. The Council is convinced that its activities for the next year will contribute to keeping the question of Namibia at the forefront of international attention and concern and that they will be instrumental in translating into concerted action the support of the international community for the speedy implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibia.

43. We feel in the Council that at this moment, when South Africa is rejecting all attempts to implement the United Nations plan for Namibia, the programme of work of the Council has become even more important and essential. Therefore, we are submitting draft resolution C to the General Assembly for its adoption, convinced that the activities of the Council will significantly contribute to the early attainment of independence for Namibia.

44. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the representative of Bulgaria to introduce draft resolution D, entitled "Dissemination of information and mobilization of international public opinion in support of Namibia".

45. Mr. YOSSIPHOV (Bulgaria): I have the honour to introduce draft resolution D entitled "Dissemination of information and mobilization of international public opinion in support of Namibia".

46. The formulation of the draft resolution has been motivated, as indicated in the preamble, by the urgent need to mobilize international public opinion on a continuous basis with a view to assisting effectively the people of Namibia in the achievement of self-determination, freedom and independence in a united Namibia and, in particular, to intensify world-wide and continuous dissemination of information on the struggle for liberation being waged by the people of Namibia under the leadership of SWAPO, their sole and authentic representative.

47. In pursuance of that goal, the United Nations Council for Namibia is requested to consider ways and means of increasing the dissemination of information relating to Namibia. The Secretary-General is requested to ensure that the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat, in all its activities of dissemination of information on the question of Namibia, follows the policy guidelines laid down by the United Nations Council for Namibia and assists, as a matter of priority, the Council in the implementation of its programme of dissemination of information.

48. Over the years, it has become increasingly clear that the mere recognition by the United Nations of the right of the Namibian people to self-determination, freedom and independence, the repeated condemnations of racist South Africa's brutal colonialist policy of apartheid, repression and aggression, the appeals by the world Organization for the immediate cessation of that policy and for granting independence to Namibia, although being of utmost significance, cannot by themselves bring about the withdrawal of Pretoria from the illegally occupied Territory. On the contrary, in blatant defiance of numerous United Nations resolutions, the racists have continued and expanded their aggressive colonial war against the people of Namibia, who, under the leadership of their sole and authentic representative, SWAPO, are waging a heroic and just struggle for independence. The aggression of Pretoria long ago crossed the borders of South Africa and Namibia.

49. Therefore, draft resolution D contains, in paragraph 5, a decision to intensify the Council's international campaign "in support of the cause of Namibia and to expose and denounce the collusion of the United States of America, certain other Western countries and Israel with the South African racists", and to this end the Council is requested to formulate a programme of activities on the dissemination of information, including the organization of an international conference at United Nations Headquarters in order to mobilize and strengthen further international support for the just cause and heroic struggle of the Namibian people, led by their sole and authentic representative, SWAPO.

50. In recognition of the very important role that non-governmental organizations have to play in our common struggle for the liberation of Namibia, the draft resolution would further strengthen their co-operation with the United Nations Council for Namibia and urge them to intensify their efforts for the mobilization of public support and solidarity with the struggle of the Namibian people.

51. In addition, the draft resolution contains other provisions aimed at strengthening the co-operation of the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat with the United Nations Council for Namibia, and also requests the Council to continue to organize journalists' encounters prior to the activities of the Council during 1985. Member States are requested to broadcast programmes and publish material about the situation in and around Namibia and the obligation of Governments and peoples to assist in the struggle of Namibia for independence.

52. The dissemination of information on Namibia represents a very important aspect of the overall efforts of the United Nations to achieve freedom and independence for Namibia. In spite of the long years of illegal occupation of Namibia, the public in some countries is still not sufficiently aware of the true nature of the problem. The media of certain countries either do not publicize sufficient information on the problem of Namibia or publicized information is biased in accordance with specific political interests.

53. The Council also expresses grave concern at the increasing South African media propaganda and "psychological warfare" on independent African countries and SWAPO. The Council also deplores the deliberate abuse of the mass information media in some countries for the purpose of waging that same "psychological warfare" under the guise of the concept of "free flow of information, ideas and people". That concept has been misused to brand as terrorists the fighters for national independence in Namibia while condoning genuine acts of terrorism.

54. To render assistance and to bring human dignity to the oppressed peoples of Namibia, the United Nations must increase its support to the media organs, especially those of independent African countries, for the purpose of nullifying the adverse effects of Pretoria's destabilization campaign.

55. Therefore, dissemination of information is an important activity and it is a most important means for bringing pressure to bear on Pretoria and its allies for their compliance with the will of the Namibian people and the resolutions of the United Nations on the granting of independence to Namibia without further delay.

56. I therefore have the honour and pleasure of recommending draft resolution D to the General Assembly for adoption.

57. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Venezuela, who will introduce draft resolution E, entitled "United Nations Fund for Namibia".

58. Mr. GRIFFIN (Venezuela) (interpretation from Spanish): I have the honour to introduce draft resolution E, entitled "United Nations Fund for Namibia".

59. The United Nations Fund for Namibia was established in 1970 [resolution 2679 (XXV)] on the termination of South Africa's Mandate to administer the Territory, and the United Nations thus assumed direct responsibility for Namibia until its accession to independence. The United Nations entered into the solemn obligation to help the Namibian people in its struggle to achieve independence, and therefore the United Nations should provide the people of Namibia with the material assistance it requires until independence.

60. At the outset, the sphere of activities and assistance provided in the context of the United Nations Fund for Namibia was restricted, but when the struggle for liberation was stepped up the need for assistance increased and at the end of the 1970s, the Fund was composed of three accounts: the General Account, which provided educational and social assistance and relief aid to Namibians; the Nationhood Programme Account, which provided assistance for comprehensive development programmes, including those that would be carried out during the period just prior to independence and those that would be carried out after it; and the United Nations Institute for Namibia Account which provides financial resources for training functions and research functions in the United Nations Institute for Namibia in Lusaka, Zambia.

61. Therefore, the magnitude and the variety of the assistance provided under the United Nations Fund for Namibia has grown as the years have passed.

62. I have pleasure in reporting to the Assembly that the activities financed by the Fund are proceeding satisfactorily and all the available funds in the three accounts have been allocated. However, the Namibian people's need for material assistance considerably exceeds financial resources available, therefore several proposed projects have not been implemented, and requests from Namibians who are candidates for scholarships have had to be rejected because of the scarcity of resources.

63. Note has been taken of the fact that, as in previous years, it is necessary to subsidize the United Nations Fund for Namibia from the regular budget of the United Nations. Therefore, in the draft resolution the Assembly would decide to allocate a sum of $US 1 million for 1985.

64. However, most of the activities carried out within the context of the United Nations Fund for Namibia are financed by voluntary contributions from Governments, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and individuals. I should like to emphasize the urgent need for those donors to increase their contributions to the Fund in order to enable the United Nations Council for Namibia to continue to expand its humanitarian and development activities for the Namibians.

65. In this connection, I should like in particular to stress the need for additional contributions to enable the Council to provide assistance to those Namibians who wish to acquire practical experience in the place of work. A growing number of Namibian young people are finishing their theoretical work and also carrying out practical work within the context of various programmes of assistance; but, in order to make a productive and effective contribution to the socio-economic development of Namibia in the period following independence, it is necessary to make it possible for Namibians who have been trained in various disciplines to be accepted in various institutions, particularly in Africa. Therefore, this programme will require additional funds from donor countries as well as job opportunities in host countries. This effort is essential and the United Nations Council for Namibia must make it in order to ensure proper training of Namibians for independence.

66. Draft resolution E refers not only to the direct financing of projects within the context of the United Nations Fund for Namibia, but also to measures necessary to prepare a programme of assistance for Namibian people by carrying out projects which are financed jointly by Governments and non-governmental organizations. In this connection, I draw attention to the fact that effective co-ordination in all areas of assistance is necessary. We must call upon specialized agencies and other institutions of the United Nations system to implement those projects for Namibians rapidly and on the basis of procedures that reflect the role that the United Nations Council for Namibia plays as the legal Administering Authority for Namibia.

67. Increased contributions to the United Nations Fund for Namibia and effective utilization of other available resources, would put the United Nations Council for Namibia in a better situation to alleviate the situation of Namibians who have escaped the repugnant system of apartheid and to prepare them for the extremely important task of the reconstruction and administration of their country after it has acceded to independence.

68. Having made this brief introduction, I hope draft resolution E will be adopted unanimously.

69. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the representative of the United States of America to introduce the amendments contained in A/39/L.23 to L.25.

70. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States of America): As we hope everyone in this chamber is aware, the United States, in co-operation with partners in the contact group and with our colleagues in the front-line States, has been engaged in the effort to bring independence to Namibia through the elimination of the illegal South African occupation of that Territory. Our effort has not slackened. On the contrary, it has intensified markedly of late, as the exchanges between the United States and various parties in southern Africa have mounted in intensity.

71. The United States Government has tried hard to demonstrate at the highest levels our continuing commitment to good relations with Africa and in particular to achieving the independence of Namibia in the shortest possible time, in accordance with Security Council resolution 435 (1978). President Reagan has underscored the fact that this is a major goal of his Administration. We hope that, with the continued co-operation of our friends and partners in and outside the region, the goal will be achieved. Because of the sensitive nature of our involvement in this effort, we have consistently held the view that it is inappropriate for the United States Government to take a position on the substance of the draft resolutions before us. We shall therefore abstain on these draft resolutions again this year.

72. The citation by name of Member States, and in particular of the United States, in certain sections of those draft resolutions constitutes an unfair and regrettable exception to the long established practices and norms of the United Nations and of the General Assembly. The United Nations was founded to promote peace and greater mutual understanding among nations, despite their differences. It was founded to promote discussion. In pursuit of those goals, it is essential that the Assembly consistently respect basic principles of civility, fairness and factual accuracy. We feel very strongly that direct, hostile, unfair and inaccurate references to particular Member States in United Nations resolutions are contrary to those basic principles and detrimental to our common purposes in the Organization. We have therefore moved to strike out such language from those draft resolutions, as the Fourth Committee did in similar instances. Our amendments received the support of the majority of the Fourth Committee, and we hope that the important principle involved will receive similar support now.

73. Some delegations have asked us how we can oppose such a phrase as "on account of the veto of the United States of America". Is this, they ask, not simply a statement of fact? It is a fact that the United States exercised its veto on 31 August 1981, as it is a fact that other States have exercised vetoes to defeat Security Council resolutions since then. Yet the names of those States have not been cited in resolutions before this body, despite the fact that blatant and continuing aggression in Afghanistan and Kampuchea were involved. More objectionable still is the argument made in the same paragraph that, as a result of the veto of the United States, armed aggression against Angola continues. That is to say, the draft resolution maintains that the United States is the direct cause of that aggression. That is not true. That assertion is not only demonstrably untrue, it ignores the successful efforts undertaken by the United States to achieve an end to the South African intervention.

74. Another paragraph which similarly ignores these efforts and which we have proposed to delete, denounces the establishment of the United States Liaison Office at Windhoek as a violation of General Assembly and Security Council resolutions and of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice. Delegations should be aware, however, that the United States Liaison Office was opened as a direct result of the agreements entered into between Angola and South Africa at Lusaka in February of this year. According to the communiqué of that meeting, the parties agreed that a small number of American representatives would participate in the activities of the joint monitoring commission at the request of the parties in order to facilitate the withdrawal of South African troops from southern Angola. To this end, and with the agreement of the Governments directly involved, the United States Government opened a small office which had to be near enough to the disengagement process to work effectively with the parties involved. Though located in Windhoek, this office is in no way accredited either to the South African Government or to the authorities in Namibia. It has no diplomatic or consular function; it implies no recognition of the legitimacy of the South African presence in Namibia. Our action is therefore entirely consistent with the resolutions passed by the General Assembly and the Security Council.

75. The issue posed by our proposed amendments is in fact quite a simple one. Does the General Assembly wish to see its resolutions on the serious and urgent matter of Namibia abused for purposes which not only make no contribution to the effort to bring about Namibian independence but which are calculated to discourage those engaged in that effort? Our amendments aim to eliminate just this abuse. We have not proposed to alter in any way the substance of the draft resolutions before us. Therefore, whatever a Government's substantive views may be, whether your Governments wish to support the draft resolutions, abstain or vote against them, you should feel free to support these amendments. We appeal to all, therefore, to join together in reaffirming our respect for the principles of civility, basic fairness and respect for accuracy which have shaped our accepted practices and which should govern all our deliberations and decisions here.

76. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Guyana to speak on a point of order.

77. Mr. SINCLAIR (Guyana): My delegation has asked to speak on a point of order to address itself to the amendments just presented by the delegation of the United States of America to the draft resolutions recommended by the United Nations Council for Namibia in its report [A/39/24, part four, chap. I]. Those amendments are contained in documents A/39/L.23 to L.25.

78. It goes without saying that Guyana recognizes and supports the right of the delegation of the United States of America to present those amendments. My delegation has considered them with the same seriousness and thoughtfulness which characterize our approach to any other matter on the agenda of the Assembly.

79. In our approach to the amendments in question, we were of course inspired by our concern for truth, for "factual accuracy", to use the words of the representative of the United States. My delegation believes that the wealth of data available to Members of the Assembly relating to Namibia and to relations of other States with Namibia, quite independently of that prepared by the United Nations Council for Namibia itself, fully substantiates the statements advanced in the Council's report, to which objection is being made by the representative of the United States.

80. At any rate, and without in any way wishing to derogate from a position which, in terms of substance, is unassailable, my delegation would like to direct attention to another aspect of this question which we consider to be of equally fundamental importance. It is a commonplace within the United Nations to see the case of Namibia as a unique one in the history and practice of the Organization. The aspects of this uniqueness do not need to be detailed here by me since they were so extensively alluded to in the recently concluded debate on the question of Namibia.

81. The rules of procedure of the General Assembly reveal yet another aspect of the uniqueness of Namibia. Namibia is the only non-independent territory which is the object of specific consideration by those rules of procedure. Delegations will recall that in 1954, at its ninth session, the General Assembly had adopted a special procedure for the examination of reports and petitions relating to Namibia, then the Territory of South West Africa [resolution 844(IX)]. That special rule is contained in annex III of the rules of procedure, special rule A. It will be noted that special rule F says:

> "Decisions of the General Assembly on questions relating to reports and petitions concerning the Territory of South West Africa shall be regarded as important questions within the meaning of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations."

Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter reads:

> "Decisions of the General Assembly on important questions shall be made by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting."

82. Now, if we were to turn to rule 84 of the rules of procedure, we would see set forth the procedure for dealing with amendments to important questions. Rule 84 reads:

> "Decisions of the General Assembly on amendments to proposals relating to important questions, and on parts of such proposals put to the vote separately, shall be made by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting."

83. It therefore seems clear to my delegation that, in accordance with an unequivocal provision of the rules of procedure of the General Assembly, the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia is an important question and that, accordingly, the amendments proposed by the United States of America to the draft resolutions in the report of the Council require for adoption a two-thirds majority of members present and voting. I submit this to the Chair out of a concern for order, for legality, for consistency and for fidelity to the procedures which the Assembly, in its wisdom, had set out three decades ago for dealing with reports relating to Namibia, then South West Africa, and I request that you, Mr. President, guide the Assembly accordingly.

84. The PRESIDENT: The representative of Guyana has drawn attention to special rule F of annex III of the rules of procedure, which reads:

> "Decisions of the General Assembly on questions relating to reports and petitions concerning the Territory of South West Africa shall be regarded as important questions within the meaning of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations."

85. The General Assembly's position regarding the character of decisions concerning Namibia is clearly established. In accordance with rule 84 of the rules of procedure, which reads:

> "Decisions of the General Assembly on amendments to proposals relating to important questions, and on parts of such proposals put to the vote separately, shall be made by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting", the amendments proposed to the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia are important questions requiring for adoption a two-thirds majority of those Member States present and voting.

86. Accordingly, the Assembly will now proceed to vote on the amendments contained in documents A/39/L.23 to L.25, it being understood that they require for adoption a two-thirds majority of members present and voting. That is the ruling of the President. If I hear no objection, it will be so decided.

It was so decided.

87. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now vote on the first amendment in document A/39/L.23, which relates to the seventeenth preambular paragraph of draft resolution A, "Situation in Namibia resulting from the illegal occupation of the Territory by South Africa". A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Belgium, Belize, Burma, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Malta, Mauritius, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Paraguay, Portugal, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Senegal, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Togo, Turkey, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Against: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Bahrain, Benin, Botswana, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, China, Comoros, Congo, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Egypt, Ethiopia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Pakistan, Poland, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bangladesh, Barbados, Bhutan, Bolivia, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Equatorial Guinea, Haiti, Malawi, Nepal, Niger, Oman, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Rwanda, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Venezuela.

There were 55 votes in favour, 65 against and 25 abstentions. Having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the amendment was not adopted.

88. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now vote on the second amendment in document A/39/L.23, which concerns the twentieth preambular paragraph of draft resolution A. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Belize, Bolivia, Burma, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mauritius, Netherlands, New Zealand, Niger, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Portugal, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Senegal, Singapore, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Togo, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Against: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Bahrain, Benin, Botswana, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, China, Comoros, Congo, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Maldives, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Poland, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Barbados, Bhutan, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Egypt, Gambia, Lesotho, Malawi, Malaysia, Nepal, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Rwanda, Solomon Islands, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Turkey, Venezuela.

There were 57 votes in favour, 63 against and 22 abstentions. Having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the amendment was not adopted.

89. The PRESIDENT: I next put to the vote the third amendment in document A/39/L.23, which concerns paragraph 21 of draft resolution A. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Belize, Burma, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Malta, Morocco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Portugal, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Samoa, Senegal, Singapore, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Togo, Turkey, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Against: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Bahrain, Barbados, Benin, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cape Verde, China, Congo, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Egypt, Ethiopia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Hungary, India, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Mali, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Mozambique, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Pakistan, Poland, Qatar, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Bolivia, Brazil, Cameroon,[3] Equatorial Guinea, Indonesia, Jordan, Lebanon, Malawi, Maldives, Nepal, Niger, Oman, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Rwanda, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Saudi Arabia, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Venezuela, Yemen.

There were 56 votes in favour, 60 against and 29 abstentions. Having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the amendment was not adopted.

90. The PRESIDENT: Next I put to the vote the fourth amendment in document A/39/L.23, which concerns paragraph 38 of draft resolution A. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Malta, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Paraguay, Portugal, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Senegal, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Togo, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Antigua and Barbuda, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Honduras, Jordan, Lebanon, Malawi, Nepal, Niger, Oman, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Rwanda, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Venezuela.

There were 45 votes in favour, 65 against and 32 abstentions. Having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the amendment was not adopted.

91. The PRESIDENT: Finally, I put to the vote the fifth and last amendment in document A/39/L.23, which concerns paragraph 49 of draft resolution A. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Austria, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Bolivia, Burma, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mauritius, Netherlands, New Zealand, Niger, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Portugal, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Senegal, Sweden, Togo, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Against: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Bahrain, Botswana, Bulgaria,Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, China, Comoros, Congo, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Ethiopia, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Hungary, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Poland, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sierra Leone, Sri Lanka, Sudan,[4] Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Vanuatu, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Antigua and Barbuda, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Haiti, India, Lesotho, Malawi, Nepal, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Rwanda, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Spain, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Turkey, Venezuela.

There were 54 votes in favour, 66 against and 23 abstentions. Having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the amendment was rejected.

92. The PRESIDENT: After some consultations, in order to guide the Assembly, I should like to explain that we have dealt with all the amendments to draft resolution A. We have not yet dealt with the amendments to the other draft resolutions. I think it will be best if we deal with draft resolution A first, and once we have disposed of that and have heard explanations of vote before and after the voting, we can move on to draft resolution B.

93. I call on the representative of Spain, who wishes to speak on a point of order.

94. Mr. de PINIÉS (Spain) (interpretation from Spanish): With reference to the last vote, I thought that we were voting on paragraph 5 (a) in document A/39/L.23, concerning paragraph 49 of draft resolution A. Had my delegation realized that we were voting on paragraphs 5 (a), (b) and (c) together, it would have voted in favour. I would ask that these clarifications be included in the verbatim records.

95. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly has taken a decision on amendments to draft resolution A only. Some delegations have expressed the wish to explain all their votes before the voting on draft resolution A. Of course, the General Assembly is its own decision-maker, but I suggest that perhaps we could dispose of one draft resolution at a time in order to avoid confusion. Thus, we could hear explanations of vote before the voting on draft resolution A, take the vote on the draft resolution, and then hear those who wish to explain their votes after the voting. Having disposed of draft resolution A, we would then move on to draft resolution B, taking the amendments first and following the same procedure as on draft resolution A.

96. I call on the representative of Somalia on a point of order.

97. Mr. OSMAN (Somalia): My delegation had the impression, with regard to the last amendment that was voted on, the fifth amendment in document A/39/L.23, that paragraphs 5 (a), (b) and (c) would be taken separately. Since the three amendments were voted upon together, we would like it to appear in the record of the meeting that had we participated in the voting process we would have voted against.

98. The PRESIDENT: Does the Assembly agree to follow the procedure I have outlined?

99. I call on the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran on a point of order.

100. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): Mr. President, I understand that you have made a decision. If this is not an arbitrary decision of the President, then I would like to know whether the point you have just mentioned is a part of the rules of procedure, or is it just a choice which can be changed?

101. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly is master of its own decisions. I was merely trying to help the General Assembly. The President cannot dictate to the Assembly. Therefore, I leave it to the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran to come forward with some bright ideas.

102. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): Yesterday, when we were voting on the draft resolutions regarding Palestine [95th meeting], we voted on three draft resolutions and then the explanations of vote were given after the voting on all of them. Could we not follow the same procedure today?

103. The PRESIDENT: May I ask the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran to make a formal proposal?

104. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): I request, Mr. President, that we complete the voting on the amendments in documents A/39/L.24 and L.25 and then give representatives the opportunity to explain their votes.

105. The PRESIDENT: The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran has formally proposed that we deal with the amendments in documents A/39/L.24 and L.25, and after that hear explanations of vote before the voting. We would then vote on the draft resolutions and hear explanations of vote after the voting. If there is no objection to that procedure, it will be so decided.

It was so decided.

106. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now proceed with the vote on the first amendment in document A/39/L.24, which concerns the third preambular paragraph of draft resolution B. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Belize, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Malta, Mauritius, Morocco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Portugal, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Singapore, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Togo, Turkey, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Against: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Bahrain, Barbados, Benin, Botswana, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, China, Congo, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Egypt, Ethiopia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Hungary, India, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Mali, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Mozambique, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Poland, Qatar, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Vanuatu, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Bolivia, Brazil, Brunei

Darussalam, Burma, Haiti, Indonesia, Jordan, Lebanon, Malawi, Maldives, Nepal, Niger, Oman, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Philippines, Rwanda, Saudi Arabia, Senegal,[5] Solomon Islands, Somalia, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Venezuela, Yemen.

There were 57 votes in favour, 60 against and 30 abstentions. Having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the amendment was not adopted.

107. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now vote on the second amendment in document A/39/L.24, which relates to paragraph 3 of draft resolution B. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Belize, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Malta, Morocco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Paraguay, Portugal, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Singapore, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Togo, Turkey, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Against: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Bahrain, Barbados, Benin, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, China, Congo, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Egypt, Ethiopia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Mozambique, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Pakistan, Poland, Qatar, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Vanuatu, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Gambia, Jordan, Lebanon, Malawi, Nepal, Niger, Oman, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Venezuela, Yemen.

There were 53 votes in favour, 67 against and 27 abstentions. Having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the amendment was not adopted.

108. The PRESIDENT: We shall now vote on the third amendment in document A/39/L.24, which concerns paragraph 8 of draft resolution B. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Belize, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Malta, Morocco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Oman, Panama, Paraguay, Portugal, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Senegal, Singapore, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Togo, Turkey, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Against: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Bahrain, Barbados, Benin, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, China, Congo, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Egypt, Ethiopia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Hungary, India, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Mali, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Mozambique, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Poland, Qatar, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Vanuatu, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Equatorial Guinea, Gambia, Indonesia, Jamaica, Jordan, Lebanon, Malawi, Maldives, Nepal, Niger, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Rwanda, Saudi Arabia, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Venezuela, Yemen.

There were 55 votes in favour, 62 against and 30 abstentions. Having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the amendment was not adopted.

109. The PRESIDENT: Finally, I put to the vote the fourth and last amendment in document A/39/L.24, which relates to paragraph 9 of draft resolution B. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Belize, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Malta, Mauritius, Morocco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Niger, Norway, Oman, Panama, Paraguay, Portugal, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Senegal, Singapore, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Togo, Turkey, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Against: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Bahrain, Benin, Botswana, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Congo, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Ethiopia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia,[6] Mali, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Poland, Qatar, Sierra Leone, Syrian Arab Republic, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Vanuatu, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Barbados, Bhutan, Bolivia, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Burma, Egypt, Haiti, Jordan, Lebanon, Malawi, Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Venezuela, Yemen.

There were 59 votes in favour, 54 against and 29 abstentions. Having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the amendment was not adopted.

110. The PRESIDENT: I now put to the vote the first amendment in document A/39/L.25, which relates to the sixth preambular paragraph of draft resolution D. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Australia, Austria, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mauritius, Netherlands, New Zealand, Niger, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Portugal, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Spain, Sweden, Togo, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Bolivia, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Burma, Egypt, Gambia, Jamaica, Lesotho, Malawi, Malaysia, Nepal, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Rwanda, Senegal, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Turkey, Venezuela.

There were 52 votes in favour, 66 against and 26 abstentions. Having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the amendment was not adopted.

111. The PRESIDENT: I now put to the vote the second and last amendment in document A/39/L.25, which relates to paragraph 5 of draft resolution D. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Bolivia, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Liberia, Luxembourg, Malta, Mauritius, Netherlands, New Zealand, Niger, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Portugal, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Senegal, Singapore, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Togo, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Antigua and Barbuda, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Burma, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Gambia, Jamaica, Lesotho, Malawi, Malaysia, Nepal, Papua New Guinea, Rwanda, Solomon Islands, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Turkey, Venezuela.

There were 61 votes in favour, 63 against and 21 abstentions. Having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the amendment was not adopted.

112. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly has completed its action on the amendments. I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their votes before the voting on any or all of the five draft resolutions contained in the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia [A/39/24, part four, chap. I]. Representatives will also have an opportunity to explain their votes after all the votes have been taken.

113. Mr. McDONAGH (Ireland): I have the honour to make a statement on the draft resolutions on behalf of the 10 member States of the European Community.

114. In their statements in the course of the general debate on the question of Namibia, the Ten stressed their unwavering commitment to the right of the people of Namibia to self-determination and independence by means of free and fair elections under the supervision and control of the United Nations, in accordance with the United Nations settlement plan, which has been accepted by both South Africa and SWAPO. The Ten have consistently supported efforts aimed at bringing about a just and peaceful solution to the Namibian question in accordance with the terms of that plan. The Ten do not accept that the settlement plan, endorsed by the Security Council in its resolution 435 (1978), should be delayed or set aside for extraneous reasons or for arrangements inconsistent with resolution 435 (1978).

115. The Ten are disappointed that once again draft resolutions on the question of Namibia have been presented in a way which cannot attract the unanimous support of the Assembly.

116. The attitude of the 10 member States of the European Community to the endorsement of armed struggle in resolutions of the General Assembly has been frequently expressed in the Assembly and is well known. The Ten are conscious that the continued illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa suggests to many that it will be ended only through armed struggle. The United Nations, however, has, above all, the obligation to encourage peaceful solutions.

117. The Ten regret that in certain respects the draft resolutions before the Assembly do not appear to take fully into consideration efforts which the Ten have consistently supported—such as those of the Secretary-General—aimed at bringing about a just and peaceful solution to the Namibian question in accordance with Security Council resolution 435 (1978).

118. The Ten's commitment to the Charter of the United Nations and its division of competences remains unchanged.

119. The people of Namibia have the right to choose their own Government through free and fair elections. In the view of the Ten, none of the participants in these elections should therefore be designated in advance as the sole and authentic representative of the people.

120. The Ten reject all arbitrary and unjustified attacks on individual Member States or groups of countries.

121. The Ten wish to reiterate here the concern which they have expressed in the Fifth Committee about the financial implications of some of the resolutions before us. They feel that in the present financial climate a more judicious approach to the programme of work of the United Nations Council for Namibia could have resulted in reduced financial implications without detracting from the attainment of the Council's objectives.

122. The Ten remain firm in their commitment to the independence of Namibia. They will continue to work for and support all efforts aimed at the urgent implementation of the United Nations settlement plan, which alone embodies a universally accepted framework for the peaceful transition of Namibia to independence in a manner which is guaranteed by the Organization to be free and fair.

123. Mr. MONTEIRO (Portugal) (interpretation from French): During the last few years, the Portuguese delegation has stressed here its opposition to any act likely to delay the process designed to ensure the Namibian people free determination of the political future of their country. Moreover, during the International Conference in Support of the Struggle of the Namibian People for Independence, held in Paris from 25 to 29 April 1983, my delegation reaffirmed that the situation in southern Africa was all the more deplorable since it increased the feeling of failure, given the obstacles systematically put in the path of the implementation of decisions which reflected a consensus on the creation of a free and independent Namibia and which aimed at putting an end to the violation of the principles on which the Organization is based, in particular those of respect for the rights of peoples to self-determination, to their sovereignty and territorial integrity and to non-interference in their internal affairs.

124. Portugal therefore believes that the immediate accession of Namibia to independence is imperative, with respect for its national frontiers, and considers with apprehension the crisis which has occurred in the United Nations regarding a problem of vital importance which endangers the prestige and credibility of this Organization. In this context, my delegation has also always stressed that the illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa must cease and that the problem falls within the purview of international responsibility. Like all the members of the international community, including those parties most directly involved, Portugal believes that only the United Nations settlement plan, endorsed by the Security Council in resolution 435 (1978), can serve as the framework for a peaceful and balanced transition of Namibia to independence, and assure its people the right to decide on their own future through free elections under United Nations control, as a guarantee of recognition internationally.

125. This position of principle must, however, take into account those difficulties experienced in the application of resolution 435 (1978), as well as the importance and significance of the initiatives and contacts which have taken place in the meantime, on both the bilateral and the regional levels, to eliminate those obstacles and ensure a peaceful solution to the problem.

126. The Portuguese Government has followed and is supporting the efforts made by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, the OAU, the front-line States, the Western contact group and SWAPO. It does so in the hope that this will lead to the establishment of a climate of mutual confidence between the parties involved which could bring South Africa to accept in practice resolution 435 (1978). My Government also views positively the agreements reached this year by the States of the region, in particular the agreement of Lusaka, between Angola and South Africa, dealing with the control machinery for military withdrawal from Angolan territory. My delegation therefore condemns all delaying tactics which contribute to increasing the danger to the security and stability of the region, in particular the insistence of the Pretoria Government on maintaining its illegal occupation of Namibia, defying internationally accepted compromises, in particular with other countries of the region, such as Angola, as well as all other acts which, under the guise of strengthening the role of the United Nations, are in fact aimed at undermining the negotiations which are under way and discrediting the countries directly involved or disputing the legitimacy of their initiatives.

127. Because of the language in which some of the provisions of the draft resolutions before us are formulated, and in view of the discriminatory references made therein to certain countries, my delegation is not in a position to support all of the draft resolutions. What it believes is extremely important is the intensification of all sincere efforts designed to come to an urgent, negotiated, peaceful and internationally acceptable solution of the question of Namibia. It therefore reaffirms its full support for Security Council resolution 435 (1978), which reflects the will of the international community to achieve the liberation of the Territory and to contribute to the development and progress of an independent and sovereign Namibia, a full-fledged Member of the United Nations.

128. Mr. SARRÉ (Senegal) (interpretation from French): Like the question of apartheid, the question of Namibia is at the core of African concerns. Regarding these two questions, Africa, standing in unity and solidarity, does and will do its utmost to eradicate those two evils that impair its dignity and jeopardize its economic and social development. For those considerations, the African Heads of State, while ready for a dialogue which would lead to a negotiated and thus a peaceful solution of these problems, remain more than ever determined to ensure that law and justice will prevail over force.

129. Senegal, through its President, Mr. Abdou Diouf, has made the item currently under consideration one of the constants of its foreign policy since the very accession of Senegal to independence. It is upon the initiative of Senegal that there is a yearly International Day of Solidarity with the Namibian People, and it was my delegation which had the honour of presiding over the International Conference in Support of the Struggle of the Namibian People for Independence held in Paris in April 1983. My country also actively participates in activities of the United Nations Council for Namibia.

130. The interest my country attaches to the question of Namibia stems from its dedication to General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, and also from our support for the restoration of stability in Africa and the consolidation of international peace and security. No one can doubt that those two objectives cannot be fully achieved as long as Namibia remains under the yoke of South Africa; therefore, my country must explore all ways and means which could lead to the independence of Namibia. The Head of State of Senegal has always advocated, both internationally and nationally, the full and speedy implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978), which includes a plan for the settlement of the Namibian question. Accordingly, we cannot endorse any prerequisites to its implementation; and, in the same spirit, we have always appealed to the countries of the Western contact group to step up their pressure on South Africa.

131. On that basis, my delegation will vote in favour of the draft resolutions contained in the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia.

132. However, my delegation considers that the formulation of some paragraphs in the draft resolutions contained in that report should be reworded. I should like to mention, for example, selective condemnations. My delegation considers that, in so far as condemnation is concerned, objectivity and credibility require that it be total rather than selective. That has become a rule because in similar circumstances and cases our Assembly has indeed abided by that provision. The texts we are considering today would remain valid in substance in the absence of these selective condemnations or recriminations. That is why my delegation will vote in favour of the amendments in document A/39/L.23 to L.25, except for the amendment to draft resolution B, contained in paragraph 2 of document A/39/L.24, and the amendment to draft resolution D contained in paragraph 1 of document A/39/L.25. Hence my delegation abstained in the voting on those two amendments.

133. My delegation supports and will in the future continue to support the Namibian people to ensure the triumph of their inalienable right to independence. We give similar support to the Palestinian cause and to the eradication of apartheid.

134. Mr. de La BARRE de NANTEUIL (France) (interpretation from French): France is now more than ever aware of the situation in southern Africa and in particular the situation in Namibia. We have continually called for independence for Namibia in keeping with the modalities stipulated in Security Council resolution 435 (1978). My Government voted in favour of Security Council resolutions 532 (1983) and 539 (1983) calling for the speedy implementation of the United Nations settlement plan so as to ensure the end of the illegal occupation of that Territory by South Africa.

135. Everyone knows very well the circumstances that caused France to suspend its active participation in the work of the Western contact group in December 1983. That was a solemn way of indicating its strict adherence to resolution 435 (1978).

136. Today we can only note with interest the official letter addressed by the President of the People's Republic of Angola to the Secretary-General [A/39/688], to whom my country wishes to pay a particular tribute in view of the personal attention he constantly gives to the questions of southern Africa. My delegation hopes that recent developments will contribute to establishing the conditions indispensable to the settlement of the Namibian question.

137. While awaiting such a settlement, which we hope will be achieved without delay, France intends to maintain a position which will make it possible to make a contribution to the conclusion of the process leading to the independence of the Territory.

138. For that reason, my delegation intends to take a position of abstention in principle regarding these five draft resolutions.

139. Mr. MIZERE (Malawi): First, please allow me to reiterate and solemnly declare here and now that my delegation fully and unequivocally supports self-determination and genuine independence for Namibia. This commitment is total and immutable.

140. Secondly, my delegation supports the consensus that has emerged that South Africa should relinquish its hold on Namibia in order to allow Namibians to exercise self-determination and to enjoy the fruits of independence in terms of Security Council resolution 435 (1978).

141. Thirdly, my delegation welcomes the release from prison of Andimba Toivo ya Toivo and expresses the cherished hope that other political prisoners will also be released.

142. Having stated this, my delegation, however, has reservations in respect of, first, the principle of singling out some Member States for selective condemnation or criticism. Such a procedure may be construed as sheltering some States for their double standards, thereby creating a credibility gap. Secondly, because of geographical predicament, practical difficulties and Malawi's belief in the policy of contact and dialogue, my delegation is unable to support the policy of isolation, sanctions and some of the language formulations contained in some of the preambular and operative paragraphs of the draft resolutions.

143. For these reasons, my delegation will abstain in the vote on draft resolutions A and B contained in the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia, and it will be recalled that it abstained in the vote on the amendments contained in documents A/39/L.23 to L.25. We shall, however, vote in favour of draft resolutions C, D and E.

144. Mr. CHETTY (Sri Lanka): Sri Lanka fully supports the legitimate struggle of the Namibian people, under the leadership of SWAPO, their sole, legitimate representative, for the establishment of a free, unified and independent Namibia.

145. We believe, in this context, that Security Council resolution 435 (1978) constitutes the means through which Namibian independence could be brought about. It should be implemented in its entirety without pre-conditions. Issues such as the linkage of the Cuban presence in Angola with the independence of Namibia are extraneous and should not be advanced as reasons for the delay or denial of Namibian independence.

146. Sri Lanka's consistent policy at the United Nations on all issues has been that we have not favoured the condemning or denouncing by name of countries with which we have diplomatic relations. Our carrying out of this policy in United Nations voting does not, however, imply any diminution of our position on the question of Namibia which we have summarized just now and indicated in our statement in the general debate [5th meeting] under this item.

147. Sri Lanka has supported some of the amendments and opposed some others contained in documents A/39/L.23 to L.25. Had we been given an opportunity of voting separately on the amendments to paragraph 49 of draft resolution A contained in paragraphs 5 (b) and (c) of document A/39/L.23, we would have voted in favour of them. Similarly, on the amendments to draft resolution D, contained in document A/39/L.25, our vote would have been cast differently had we been given the opportunity to vote separately. We regret that we were denied that opportunity.

148. We intend to vote in favour of all the draft resolutions under this item when each of them is put to the vote as a whole, as contained in the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia.

149. Miss DEVER (Belgium) (interpretation from French): Belgium, which is a member of the United Nations Council for Namibia, regrets that, despite the diplomatic efforts carried out during the past 12 months, no substantive progress has been achieved in the attainment of independence for Namibia.

150. With respect to this situation, the international community can only maintain and endeavour to make more effective the pressure it is exerting on the Government of South Africa to ensure that it ceases to block the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978). In that regard, my country last month joined in the consensus by which all countries members of the United Nations Council for Namibia adopted the report of the Council.

151. However, on that occasion, my delegation pointed out that it still had reservations on some of the draft resolutions included in the report and that it would explain those reservations at the time of the voting in the General Assembly.

152. In reference to the comments that have just been made by the representative of Ireland in this regard on behalf of the European Community, my delegation believes it is useful to recall some of the principles motivating Belgium in its international relations, which it feels should not be discarded even in the present situation.

153. My delegation will vote in favour of draft resolution C, on the programme of work of the United Nations Council for Namibia, while recalling here the very strong reservations which explained its abstention in the voting on the financial implications yesterday in the Fifth Committee. My country will also vote in favour of draft resolution E on the United Nations Fund for Namibia.

154. On draft resolutions A, B and D, concerning respectively the situation in Namibia, the implementation of resolution 435 (1978) and the dissemination of information, my delegation will abstain. The reasons for this triple abstention are the same as those we explained last year. The wording that caused difficulties for us in the past has been maintained and in some cases even strengthened.

155. For example, in draft resolution A, my country cannot agree with those paragraphs which call for support for armed struggle and for the breaking off of all relations with South Africa, or those which systematically denigrate the actions of some countries.

156. Nor can my country recognize SWAPO as the sole and authentic representative of the Namibian people. No party has ever obtained or claimed such recognition in Belgium. Indeed, that would be contrary to the ideals of freedom and pluralism that are the basis of our national democratic system. We therefore cannot attribute to SWAPO—and my delegation hopes that it understands this—a title which only the Namibian people can grant it, through free elections.

157. My delegation believes also that the diplomatic efforts exerted in southern Africa during the past 12 months deserve—despite the fact that so far the results have been very limited—a more subtle interpretation than that given in this draft resolution.

158. In draft resolution B, my delegation cannot accept the unjustified attacks upon the United States and the criticism directed at other Western members of the Security Council.

159. With regard to draft resolution D, on the dissemination of information, my delegation believes that the volume of this programme of information and mobilization is excessive. This programme, moreover, contains various points of view that are not shared by my Government.

160. Having said that, I would state that my country understands the impatience—indeed, the exasperation—of the Namibian people and the countries most directly involved with the consequences of the illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa. We are not losing sight of the fact that this question, with its tragic consequences, results from the challenge flung by Pretoria at the international community. We shall continue to work for Namibia's rapid accession to independence.

161. Mr. WOOLCOTT (Australia): When my delegation spoke in the debate on this question [81st meeting], we expressed a number of reservations about the draft resolutions appearing before us today.

162. In this connection, I should like to emphasize that it has long been a matter of concern that, because of language which is unacceptable to us, Australia has been obliged to distance itself in the United Nations Council for Namibia and in the General Assembly over a number of years from resolutions and programmes with which the Australian Government is in basic agreement.

163. During the general debate, in which approximately 100 delegations participated, there was a clear and unanimous message: Namibia must be brought to the earliest possible independence, in accordance with the United Nations plan, and South Africa's illegal occupation of the Territory must be terminated.

164. Yet, turning to the draft resolutions before us, we find language which deliberately sets out to divide rather than to mobilize the common purpose of the international community.

165. The Australian Government is deeply concerned about the situation in Namibia resulting from South Africa's occupation of the Territory. We fully support the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978) and we support programmes to disseminate information and mobilize international public opinion in support of Namibia. Yet, in the past, we have been unable to accept resolutions which were similar to draft resolutions A, B and D and which dealt precisely with these subjects, because of the language in which they were couched.

166. As I said earlier, my delegation has sought to have the United Nations Council for Namibia and the General Assembly adopt resolutions which will be more widely acceptable. We supported the amendments contained in documents A/39/L.23 to L.25, proposed by the representative of the United States, because we have consistently argued against the selective and arbitrary naming of Member States in General Assembly resolutions. We regret that these amendments were not carried. If they had been carried in their entirety, my delegation would have voted in favour of draft resolutions B, C, D and E and abstained on draft resolution A. This would have represented a distinct change in Australia's voting pattern, as compared to recent years. We would have done so notwithstanding the fact that draft resolutions A and B—and A in particular—contain elements which we do not fully support. As the amendments were not carried, we shall now abstain on draft resolutions A, B and D and support draft resolutions C and E.

167. The draft resolutions before us contain a number of difficulties that we have previously elaborated on in the Assembly. For example, my delegation is unable to accept references to SWAPO as the sole and authentic representative of the Namibian people, although we acknowledge that SWAPO has an essential role to play in the settlement regulations.

168. Nor can we accept endorsement of armed struggle as a means of bringing about Namibian independence, as this runs counter to the very Charter of the United Nations. Having said this, however, we do understand the frustrations which have led many countries and peoples to argue that if peaceful methods do not produce the necessary results, force may inevitably occur as a last resort to end institutionalized discrimination in southern Africa.

169. We are concerned also with exaggerated allegations concerning co-operation by "Western countries" with South Africa. I do not propose here to outline in detail the concerns we have where such allegations are made on each and every occasion; I would simply register that such criticism is arbitrary and selective. A further difficulty we have is that we do not accept that South Africa ought to be excluded from international organizations. It is through its membership in such bodies that South Africa comes face to face with the force of international opposition to its unacceptable policies in relation to apartheid and Namibia.

170. Mr. ULRICH (Denmark): I have the honour to speak on behalf of the five Nordic countries—Finland, Iceland, Norway, Sweden and Denmark—in explanation of vote on the draft resolutions concerning the question of Namibia.

171. The Nordic countries remain firmly convinced that the people of Namibia must be permitted as soon as possible to determine their own future through free and fair elections under the supervision and control of the United Nations, in accordance with Security Council resolution 435 (1978). They are deeply concerned that South Africa continues to lay down extraneous conditions for co-operating in the implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibia. The Nordic countries reiterate the view that the settlement plan alone provides a universally accepted framework for Namibian independence.

172. The Nordic countries deeply regret that again this year they will not be able to support all the draft resolutions. This is all the more regrettable since we strongly support the overall objective—namely, freedom and independence for Namibia.

173. The draft resolutions before us contain an increasing number of elements which cause us difficulties of principle. I shall now outline these difficulties in general terms.

174. First, as we have stated on a number of occasions, the Nordic countries cannot accept endorsement by the United Nations of the use of armed struggle. One of the basic principles of the Organization is to promote peaceful solutions to international problems. For the same reason, we cannot support calls for military assistance.

175. Secondly, owing to the strict adherence of the Nordic countries to the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, we must generally reserve our position with regard to formulations which fail to take into account that only the Security Council can adopt decisions binding on Member States.

176. Thirdly, the Nordic countries deplore the inappropriate and arbitrary singling out of individual countries and groups of countries. We believe that this procedure, which is getting increasingly common, makes it more difficult than before to maintain the international consensus on the question of Namibia.

177. Fourthly, all political parties enjoying popular support in Namibia must be allowed to participate in a political process through free and fair elections. SWAPO is such a party and must be part of any solution in Namibia. However, we have reservations concerning formulations which prejudice the outcome of free elections.

178. Fifthly, we are also this year concerned about the substantial additional expenditures which the proposed large meetings away from Headquarters involve. The Nordic countries support the general principle embodied in General Assembly resolution

31/140 that United Nations bodies shall meet at their established Headquarters.

179. The Nordic countries hope that the future recommendations of the United Nations Council for Namibia will be changed accordingly, thereby making it possible for our long-standing support for the Namibian people to find expression in only affirmative votes.

180. Mr. WERNDL (Federal Republic of Germany): I believe the position of the Federal Republic of Germany on the question of Namibia is well known. There has been no change in that position. As Federal Foreign Minister Genscher repeatedly stated, most recently on 6 June before the German Bundestag, Security Council resolution 435 (1978) is and remains the one and only basis for the internationally recognized independence of Namibia.

181. Being a member of the Western contact group, the Federal Republic of Germany, as in recent years, will abstain on all draft resolutions concerning the question of Namibia. As has been pointed out by the contact group collectively on similar occasions in recent years, such abstention is motivated by procedural reasons. As a member of the contact group, the Federal Republic of Germany might be involved in negotiations on the implementation of the Western settlement plan endorsed by the Security Council in 1978. In order not to prejudge the outcome of those negotiations in any way, the Federal Republic of Germany must refrain from associating itself with the draft resolutions before the General Assembly in either a positive or negative manner. Mainly for this reason, but also out of certain reservations with regard to some financial implications contained in the draft resolutions, my delegation will abstain.

182. Mr. van der STOEL (Netherlands): The Netherlands has repeatedly condemned South Africa for continuing its illegal occupation of Namibia in defiance of the unanimous opinion of the international community. My Government has consistently joined other Members of this Organization in appealing to South Africa to enable the people of Namibia to exercise their right to self-determination and independence, in accordance with Security Council resolutions 385 (1976) and 435 (1978). For the Namibian problem to be solved, South Africa must be prevailed upon to co-operate without further delay or pre-conditions in carrying out the settlement plan endorsed by resolution 435 (1978) which, inter alia, provides for free and fair elections under United Nations supervision and the establishment of an independent and sovereign State of Namibia.

183. The Netherlands will continue to encourage all efforts aimed at bringing about this goal and overcoming the obstacles to which the inalienable right of the Namibian people to independence has been held hostage too long. As Namibia has always been a particular responsibility and concern of the United Nations, it is our duty, as Members of this world body, to attract the widest possible support for these efforts. To our deep regret, however, we are faced once again with draft resolutions that include many elements which are more likely to create controversy and division than to lay the foundations for concerted action by the Organization in pursuit of our common goal.

184. My delegation has no choice, therefore, but to abstain on some of the draft resolutions presented to us.

185. As an Organization whose Charter commits its Members to search for solutions by peaceful means, the United Nations cannot in good conscience encourage the use of violence. For this reason, the Netherlands dissociates itself from any wording which, explicitly or implicitly, condones the use of force, such as the endorsement of armed struggle. Furthermore, the Netherlands cannot agree to calls for the total isolation of South Africa because the imposition of such measures would run counter to the objective of seeking international agreement on Namibia's independence.

186. In our view, SWAPO is a major political force in Namibia and as such it has participated from the outset in the negotiations concerning the implementation of resolution 435 (1978). But my Government feels that to designate SWAPO as the sole and authentic representative of the Namibian people would prejudge the outcome of the free and democratic elections provided for in Security Council resolutions 385 (1976) and 435 (1978). Nor can the Netherlands Government subscribe to attempts to politicize the specialized agencies and to interfere with their autonomy. We also attach great importance to the principle of universality and respect for the division of competences of United Nations bodies embodied in the Charter.

187. In our view, one of the most reprehensible aspects of the draft resolutions before us is the arbitrary and unjustified accusations hurled at individual Member States or groups of countries. My Government strongly rejects this practice of selective name-calling as unworthy of the Organization. The aspersions cast on one particular group of Member States can only serve the interests of those who are less concerned with strengthening the resolve of the United Nations to deal effectively with this difficult issue than with exploiting it for their own narrow objectives.

188. Against this background, my delegation has voted in favour of all amendments introduced by the United States. In this context we would urge the United Nations Council for Namibia henceforward to resist the introduction of those elements into draft resolutions and thereby enhance this body's ability to contribute to international efforts to bring about Namibia's independence.

189. In view of the considerations just mentioned, the Netherlands will abstain on draft resolution A and on draft resolution D concerning the dissemination of information. We will also abstain on draft resolution B concerning the implementation of resolution 435 (1978). The early exercise by the Namibian people of its internationally recognized right to self-determination and independence should not be impeded because of the situation in a neighbouring country. At the same time, the Netherlands Government supports the efforts of all parties concerned to reach a common understanding on issues relevant to the stability of the region as a whole once the implementation of the Namibian independence plan is set in motion. The immediate cessation of South African aggression against the territorial integrity and sovereignty of Angola and the withdrawal of foreign troops from that country would certainly contribute to a climate of confidence conducive towards this end. But I wish to emphasize that, in the opinion of the Netherlands, the independence of Namibia remains the essential and primary responsibility of the United Nations, which must necessarily take precedence over other considerations.

190. The Netherlands will vote in favour of draft resolution C concerning the programme of work of the United Nations Council for Namibia. It cannot be inferred from our positive vote, however, that the Netherlands agrees to all aspects of the programme of work. In particular, we feel strongly that the request to the Council, in paragraph 19, to hold a series of plenary meetings during 1985 away from Headquarters, will require considerable additional cost in return for a very questionable additional benefit. At a time when most Member States and the United Nations itself have increasingly been forced to observe financial self-restraint, it cannot be beyond the Council to find less extravagant projects with a greater potential benefit to the people of Namibia on which to spend the funds that could be saved by holding the meetings at Headquarters.

191. Finally, the Netherlands does not share the view that the United Nations Council for Namibia must enjoy the same rights and privileges in international organizations as are reserved for States.

192. Mr. SVOBODA (Canada): My delegation would like to make clear that its abstentions in the votes on the draft resolutions concerning Namibia now before the Assembly are purely procedural and indicate neither approval or disapproval of their contents. We do regret, however, that the amendments proposed a few moments ago were not adopted by this body. Canada is again abstaining on the substantive resolutions this year because we are a member of the contact group, which has been involved in the past and, indeed, may be involved in the future in negotiations concerning the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978). We would not wish, therefore, to prejudge the outcome of any negotiations by our votes on these draft resolutions. Canada's basic position was stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his statement to the Assembly on 25 September:

> "We are also grieved that the people of Namibia are still denied their independence after a century of colonial rule. South Africa must set a date to implement Namibia's independence under Security Council resolution 435 (1978)." [7th meeting, para. 97.]

193. We join other delegations in looking forward to the day when Namibia will be free and will join the ranks of our membership.

194. Mr. BARMA (Chad) (interpretation from French): The debate on the question of Namibia, and even the debate which has been devoted to the question of apartheid, have clearly shown to what extent South Africa continues to defy the international community by its illegal occupation of Namibia and its base policies of apartheid. It is unquestionable that all delegations here present, even those which did not take part in the debate, quite strongly denounce and condemn South Africa for its illegal occupation of Namibia and reject its abject policy of apartheid.

195. It is in this spirit that the foreign policy of my country, Chad, has always been pursued, since we have always worked and will always work, in so far as possible, for the fraternal Namibian people, under the wise and responsible leadership of its sole authentic representative, SWAPO, to accede to freedom and independence in accordance with the United Nations plan, which was endorsed in Security Council resolution 435 (1978)—a resolution which has been accepted by all the parties concerned.

196. Whereas the United Nations, through the United Nations Council for Namibia, was about to implement this Plan, South Africa, in order unjustly to hold up the independence of the Territory, has set in motion problems which are quite contrary to the spirit and letter of resolution 435 (1978).

197. As we did last year, we would like to reiterate that there should be no link established between the independence of Namibia and the presence of foreign troops in Angola because that is a matter which concerns two sovereign independent States—Angola and Cuba. It is by no means accurate to say that Cuban troops in any way pose a threat to a heavily armed South Africa. It is rather South Africa which represents a threat to its neighbours, particularly Angola, a considerable part of whose territory it occupies.

198. We would therefore urge South Africa's friends to exert appropriate pressure on that country to bring it to abide by the decisions and resolutions of the United Nations by unconditionally liberating Namibia and by completely giving up its policy of apartheid. Undoubtedly, it will be retorted, with some reason, that this attitude, far from leading the Government of South Africa to heed these appeals, will encourage it to persist in its policy of apartheid and its occupation of Namibia. My delegation is not entirely convinced by this view and considers that as far as self-determination for the Namibian people is concerned, the process of negotiation under way, although slow and difficult, will undoubtedly lead eventually to the much desired independence of Namibia.

199. My delegation sincerely believes, therefore, that it would be judicious not to discourage those States which, like the United States, are trying to do the best they can by approaching South Africa in order to try and induce it to grant independence to Namibia. Of course, each and every one of us recognizes that pressures exerted on South Africa have not proved as decisive as the international community had hoped they might be. We can only regret this state of affairs. Nevertheless, we do not believe that a condemnation by name of particular States Members of the Organization is likely to facilitate a solution to the Namibian problem. However, I hope we will be properly understood; our position should not be construed to mean that we are encouraging any sort of collaboration with South Africa. This is far from our thoughts. The idea of our delegation is that selective condemnations, at whatever States they be aimed, frequently produce results which are contrary to those that we are seeking.

200. That is why my delegation, in accordance with its traditional policies, voted in favour of the amendments introduced in documents A/39/L.23 to L.25. In so doing, we believe that avoiding selective condemnation by no means detracts from the substance of the draft resolutions on Namibia, with which we are in agreement. My delegation will therefore vote in favour of the draft resolutions contained in the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia while at the same time entering express reservations on those paragraphs which selectively condemn certain States Members of the Organization.

201. Mrs. LEGWAILA (Botswana): Although my delegation will vote in favour of all the draft resolutions contained in document A/39/24, we wish to place on record our reservation on any paragraph in any of them which seeks to commit us to the imposition of sanctions against South Africa. For reasons which are well known to the Assembly and which have often been stated in the past, Botswana is in no position to participate in such sanctions.

202. Mr. GBEZERA-BRIA (Central African Republic) (interpretation from French): My country, the Central African Republic, has continuously and firmly reiterated that Namibia should be independent without any pre-conditions. There could be no compromise with regard to the right of the Namibian people to self-determination under the leadership of its sole legitimate representative, SWAPO. Therefore there must be an end to the illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa so that Namibia may accede to independence and freedom without linking it to extraneous considerations, which in fact have to do with the full and complete sovereignty of Angola and South Africa, and without its being subject to any pretext for destabilization in the region. Security Council resolution 435 (1978) must therefore be implemented in its entirety.

203. My country's position on this matter cannot be called in question; nor can the will of the international community be challenged. Indeed, with regard to Namibia, there exists a collective responsibility in the application of decisions which have been taken. There also exists a complacency which comforts South Africa in its arrogant persistence in perpetuating its illegal occupation, with no chance in sight for a negotiated settlement which would not only lead to the international sovereignty of Namibia, but also guarantee peace in southern Africa. The important role which is played by the United States does not exclude such collective responsibility, and it is that collective responsibility which is tested in the difficult and delicate negotiations under way which must be encouraged and the merits of which must be recognized.

204. Thus, while voting in favour of the draft resolutions as a whole, my delegation could not support certain provisions, in particular those which selectively condemn one State or another, that is, the United States, which is endeavouring to reach a peaceful settlement of the question of Namibia.

205. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): South Africa is the only régime which has an institutionalized system of racism, apartheid. All the Members of the Assembly know very well and very much about the racist policies and the crimes that the South African régime has been perpetrating against humanity. We have all read about and heard the cries of the 3.5 million black workers who have been removed from their homelands; about the strikes of over 800,000 students and millions of workers; and about many other examples of public and popular outcry against racism and the apartheid policies of the South African régime.

206. On the other hand, the involvement of the United States—not forgetting the involvement of the Zionist régime in the Middle East—in South Africa is well known, not only to the General Assembly, but also to the American people and their senators. This is why demonstrators occupied the South African embassy and its many consulates in Washington, D.C. and in other American states, in opposition to the policies of the United States regarding South Africa and, indeed, in opposition to the policies of the South African régime.

207. In spite of all that, United States-owned transnational companies are still very active and apparently very productive and prolific in South Africa. There is nothing secret about it. Even the American mass media—channel 13—have disseminated information about the exceptionally high level of profit and the accumulation of wealth enjoyed by the American-owned companies in South Africa. Those companies, thanks to the cheap and abundant manpower and raw materials, which essentially belong to those poor people, made a profit of 1,500 per cent last year. This easily explains the reason behind the poverty of the indigenous people of South Africa and also the profound interest of the United States Government in its dealings with South Africa. It is that same illegitimate wealth which constitutes the backbone of the constructive engagement of the United States, which is intended to serve its exploitative, inhumane and destructive role in South Africa, and I shall therefore call it American "destructive engagement".

208. This unholy, sinister engagement has a wide range of activities and objectives which are embodied in the phrase which the President of the United States is quoted as using: "the strategic value of South Africa". One of the many dangerous and anti-human elements of this destructive engagement is United States co-operation with the régime of South Africa in the field of military and nuclear technology. The Wall Street Journal of 28 November 1984 stated the following:

> "One of the six countries that have not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, South Africa, has the necessary technology and equipment, raw uranium and scientists to fashion at least a crude nuclear bomb."

> "Indeed, Western countries have little leverage over South Africa. What few pieces of the nuclear puzzle South Africa lacks have mostly been given or sold to them by the United States and others."

And then the article continues:

> "In 1957, under the 'Atoms for Peace' programme, the United States signed a 50-year co-operation agreement with South Africa. In 1961 South Africa built its first nuclear reactor with United States technology. The United States has agreed to supply enriched uranium, uranium fuel, to that reactor."

209. These and many other examples bear witness to the role of the United States Government in South Africa. It is this sinister destructive engagement that is immediately responsible for the perpetration of the crimes of apartheid in South Africa and also for the perpetuation and prolongation of the apartheid régime in that part of the world. Had it not been for the sinister role of this collaboration between the United States and South Africa, the South African régime would have died long ago, and our oppressed fellow man in South Africa and, as a matter of fact, the entire population of Africa, would have been rid of that régime.

210. The South African Catholic Bishops' Conference, as you know, has condemned the policies of the South African régime in that part of the world. A report by the Conference states that "the South African police behaved like an occupying army controlling enemy territory while combating recent black unrest in the townships."

211. The United States Administration and the Zionist régime in the Middle East are historically known as the most adamant supporters of South Africa, and their joint collaboration with that régime deserves the explicit condemnation of the entire international community. That is why my delegation, regarding it as a personal religious duty as well as being the position of my Government and my people, voted against the amendments contained in documents A/39/L.23 to L.25.

212. I have to congratulate you, Mr. President, for this defeat that was so swiftly and effectively inflicted upon the enemies of the African people under your leadership. I must also sincerely congratulate and thank my dear friend Mr. Sinclair for his very intelligent and timely move requesting approval by a two-thirds majority. Today's record has made it evident that, in spite of all the United States intimidations, the oppressed can be victorious and they will be indeed.

213. Mr. LUNA MENDOZA (Peru) (interpretation from Spanish): My delegation will vote in favour of all the draft resolutions submitted on the question of Namibia. The position of Peru on this question is well known. We firmly support the exercise by the people of Namibia of their inalienable rights to self-determination and independence. In that connection we call for the immediate implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibia endorsed by Security Council resolution 435 (1978).

214. We cannot, however, agree with the mentioning by name of specific countries in the draft resolutions before us. Such singling out is discriminatory not only as a practice but also in the light of the reality of the international situation and of the Power that is illegally occupying the Territory of Namibia.

215. Mr. VAN LIEROP (Vanuatu): The Government of Vanuatu has instructed our delegation to support the recommendations of the United Nations Council for Namibia contained in its report [A/39/24, part four, chap. I]. In supporting the draft resolutions in that document the Government of Vanuatu regrets that language capable of gaining a consensus was not used.

216. It is our belief that Namibia's independence will be achieved by a concert of co-operation and good will and through the efforts of the people of Namibia themselves, with the support of a broad international constituency. Concrete action in support of Namibia's people is, of course, essential. Unfulfilled promises, empty sloganeering and strident rhetoric will gain nothing. Had we been responsible for the wording of these draft resolutions, we would have used different language. However, such was not the case, and we will, because of their primary thrust, support the draft resolutions as recommended by the Council.

217. We will do so for two basic reasons. One, we respect the recognized expertise and authority of the Council. Two, we firmly believe that it is essential to send a strong message of support to the people of Namibia and their representative, SWAPO, particularly at this moment in history, while at the same time sending an equally strong message of disapproval to Pretoria. Our vote is directed against no country but South Africa and for no people but the people of Namibia.

218. We believe that we, the nations of the world, must finally fulfil our promise to Namibia's people and stand firmly once and for all against South Africa's injustice. We must lead by example and not just word in rejecting the continued illegal occupation of Namibia in defiance of international public opinion. To us, these factors outweigh deficiencies in the language and thrust of parts of the draft resolutions.

219. While we do not approve of all of that language, we were compelled to vote against the proposed changes because of our aforementioned support for the Council and for Namibia's people. Nothing should be read into our position, nor should any interpretation be given other than a heartfelt empathy with the colonized people of Namibia. We have and will continue to state to our friends our objections to the imperfect language. We will also continue to make what we feel are constructive suggestions. We hope that some of these suggestions, and those made by others, will find their way into future draft resolutions.

220. It is our firm hope that, should the situation in that country persist and we consider similar draft resolutions next year, such draft resolutions may be more precise, far less selective and more capable of eliciting broad support. We believe that selectivity is neither constructive nor accurate. However, by the same token, we do not believe it is appropriate to change the language of the Council's recommendations at this time. We do not doubt that in the future greater thought will be given to the words expressed today by all of us, both those who will support the draft resolutions and those who will not be able to.

221. Reflection, reappraisal, re-evaluation and interaction can only serve us all. In the process we may strengthen the opposition to South Africa here at the United Nations and swell the ranks of those who vote to support the Council's recommendations.

222. Mr. GARCÍA-MORENO (Colombia) (interpretation from Spanish): In a recent statement on this question [83rd meeting], the delegation of Colombia reiterated its unequivocal support for the independence and territorial integrity of Namibia and renewed its unswerving solidarity with that country's people. The cause of Namibia, as we have said before, is a priority objective of our foreign policy.

223. My delegation will therefore vote in favour of all the draft resolutions that have been submitted to the Assembly today. However, we have reservations with regard to the wording of paragraphs in which specific countries are singled out for condemnation. We believe that draft resolutions that come before the Assembly should seek the desired balance and avoid any language that might lead to confrontation rather than co-operation.

224. The authors of these important initiatives, which are aimed at ending the illegal occupation of Namibia, should find formulas that could enjoy the support of the overwhelming majority of the international community.

225. Mr. MILES (United Kingdom): My delegation's general reservations on certain of the draft resolutions in the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia have been expressed by the representative of Ireland speaking on behalf of the States members of the European Community.

226. The five members of the contact group were involved in the formulation of the United Nations settlement plan and are likely to play a role in the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978). It has therefore been our custom not to adopt a substantive position on the draft resolutions on Namibia placed before the General Assembly. For that reason my delegation will once again abstain in the voting on those draft resolutions.

227. Mr. MALINGA (Swaziland): The Swaziland delegation will vote in favour of all the draft resolutions on Namibia before the General Assembly because their main thrust seeks to obtain the long-overdue independence of Namibia. It is our wish that our fellow southern Africans be given an opportunity to exercise their inalienable right to self-determination.

228. Owing to well-known reasons dictated to us by circumstances of geographic sensitivity, my delegation will register, for the record, its reservation on all paragraphs which contain elements that advocate economic sanctions against South Africa. We also do not endorse the use of arms by both sides as a means of solving the problem of Namibia.

229. Mr. TOMBIA (Angola): My delegation rejects the allegation made by the representative of the United States of America concerning the establishment of a Liaison Office in Windhoek. In the Lusaka talks referred to by the representative of the United States, no agreement was reached with anybody about the establishment of a so-called Liaison Office. The People's Republic of Angola did agree in those talks that the United States would be invited to participate in the joint commission only at the invitation of the parties concerned, just in case of any disagreement in the process of disengagement. Therefore, the allegation made by the representative of the United States of America that there was an agreement, or any kind of understanding with the United States to establish the so-called Liaison Office, is false.

230. That is why my delegation voted against all the amendments presented by the delegation of the United States, in particular the amendment contained in paragraph 4 of document A/39/L.23 concerning paragraph 38 of draft resolution A.

231. There is not a shadow of a doubt that my delegation will vote in favour of all the draft resolutions before us.

232. Mr. HAPPI TCHANKOU (Cameroon) (interpretation from French): I should like to explain my vote on the amendment by the United States which is contained in paragraph 3 of document A/39/L.23 and which concerns paragraph 21 of draft resolution A. We voted against this amendment, but the voting display showed that we abstained. I should like the record to indicate that my delegation voted against that amendment. I should like to make it clear that the position of Cameroon on Namibia has been constant.

233. The PRESIDENT: We have heard the last speaker in explanation of vote before the voting. However, before proceeding to the vote, in answer to a number of queries we have received, I wish to inform the Assembly that as soon as we have completed the present item on Namibia, we shall then proceed to take up the remaining items on our agenda covering various reports from the First Committee.

234. The Assembly will now take a decision on draft resolutions A to E recommended by the United Nations Council for Namibia in its report [ibid.]. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of the draft resolutions is to be found in document A/39/813. The General Assembly will now begin the voting process and take a decision on draft resolution A, entitled "The situation in Namibia resulting from the illegal occupation of the Territory by South Africa". A recorded vote has been requested.

Draft resolution D was adopted by 130 votes to none, with 24 abstentions (resolution 39/50 D).

238. The PRESIDENT: We come now to draft resolution E, entitled "United Nations Fund for Namibia". A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Canada, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

Draft resolution E was adopted by 149 votes to none, with 5 abstentions (resolution 39/50 E).[7]

239. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their votes after the vote.

240. Mrs. BETHEL-DALY (Bahamas): The Bahamas has always supported every initiative which we felt would somehow facilitate the long overdue attainment of independence for Namibia. Similarly, we have wasted no time, nor have we minced our words, in condemning those actions which have been barriers or obstacles to the achievement of Namibia's independence. As noted in our statement in the general debate [28th meeting] at the beginning of this session, we find it discouraging and even deplorable that the international community continues to be plagued by this issue year after year.

241. Because we believe that the policies of the racist régime of South Africa with regard to Namibia pose a direct threat to international security and peace and because it is our conviction that Namibians must exercise their inalienable rights as free human beings, through sovereignty and the establishment of democratic rule in that country, my delegation voted whole-heartedly in favour of the resolutions just adopted. Further, we support these resolutions because we believe that their general thrust underscores the important fact that Namibia's independence and the inherent dignity of its people should no longer be jeopardized through the intransigence and selfishness of another State, namely South Africa.

242. Having said this, my delegation is convinced that issues which are extraneous to these two basic and crucial elements of independence and democratic rule serve not to enhance the resolutions but rather to make them just another scapegoat for prolonged and unnecessarily complicated debates. In an effort to promote the call for equity and sound judgement my delegation voted in favour of the amendments to the seventeenth preambular paragraph of draft resolution A and paragraph 5 of draft resolution D. As we see it, fundamentally, what is being called into question in the aforementioned seventeenth preambular paragraph is not the actions of an individual country but rather the rules and procedures of the Security Council, which should not be an issue in this context. With regard to paragraph 5 of draft resolution D, my delegation contends that the language of this paragraph fails to show any correlation between the objective thought and the methods to be employed. Our vote against the amendment to paragraph 38 of draft resolution A was determined by our belief that until Namibia achieves independence, no foreign Government should establish any type of representative office in that country, particularly since Namibia is currently being administered by the United Nations Council for Namibia, which represents the world Organization and consequently the individual States.

243. Finally, we believe that arbitrary name-calling is sometimes necessary. For example, the omission of reference to South Africa from the texts would make them meaningless. It would seem that, generally speaking, the repetitious and inconsistent references tend to compromise the balance of the texts and their possible future efficacy. We reiterate our point that independence and democratic rule for Namibia should be the focal point of this issue and neither will be gained through resolutions which would seem to give undue weight to other contentious aspects. My delegation trusts that these ideas will be considered in any future texts that may be deemed necessary.

244. Mr. LEHNE (Austria): Austria has consistently supported the right of the Namibian people to self-determination. We regard the United Nations plan for Namibia as offering the most promising way to end South Africa's illegal occupation and to facilitate peaceful transition to independence. We regret that issues outside the scope of Security Council resolution 435 (1978) have so far prevented the implementation of the Namibian plan and consider it imperative that South Africa change its intransigent attitude.

245. For all these reasons, we would have liked to support all the draft resolutions submitted under this item. Unfortunately, some of these texts contain provisions which are unacceptable to Austria. Also, we understand the impatience and disappointment of the Namibian people in view of the protracted negotiating process. We remain convinced that, in the light of the principles and goals of the Charter of the United Nations, it is not up to the General Assembly to endorse the resort to armed struggle, nor should it encourage military support for such struggle.

246. Furthermore, Austria has strong reservations about the attempts to prejudge and influence the independent work of the Security Council, an attempt which is in contradiction with the relevant provisions of the Charter. Austria is fully aware of the significant and important role which SWAPO plays in the fight for Namibian independence, as well as in the negotiating process, a role which undoubtedly will continue. The final endorsement of this role, however, will be given by the Namibian people themselves in free and fair elections. The General Assembly must not prejudge this free and democratic expression of political will by the population of Namibia.

247. Austria also does not believe that the arbitrary singling out of certain States for condemnation either is justified or in any way advances the legitimate interests of the Namibian people. We therefore supported the amendments regarding these paragraphs.

248. We regret that, for the reasons mentioned above, Austria had to abstain on draft resolutions A, B and C. We wish to reiterate, however, that this in no way affects Austria's firm commitment to a peaceful and negotiated transition of Namibia to independence on the basis of Security Council resolution 435 (1978).

249. Mr. PFIRTER (Argentina) (interpretation from Spanish): During the recent debate on the question of Namibia, my delegation explained in detail Argentina's position on the item [81st meeting].

250. Argentina strongly condemns the illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa and supports the adoption by the Security Council of mandatory sanctions in accordance with Chapter VII of the Charter. Pursuant to that clear and firm position, we voted in favour of all the draft resolutions that were put to the vote. Nevertheless, we wish to reiterate the reservations which we expressed in the Fourth Committee [see A/C.4/39/SR.19, para. 40] as to the references to certain countries in the draft resolutions. Those reservations guided our position on each of the amendments voted on this afternoon.

251. Mr. BERMUDEZ (Honduras) (interpretation from Spanish): The delegation of Honduras voted in favour—and has done so every year—of all the resolutions on the question of Namibia, whose Territory and people are under the direct legal and political responsibility of the Organization. Our commitment is strong in favour of the cause of self-determination, independence and freedom for the Namibian people, as well as for the territorial integrity of Namibia. On 29 November of this year [79th meeting] we expressed our position in this respect in this forum.

252. On this basis, Honduras has continued to vote in favour of these resolutions without thereby implying that we share views as to the specific mention of countries other than South Africa, since the selective mention of certain States does not seem to us to be a justifiable practice in the Organization. In addition, Honduras adopts the same position in everything which relates to any State Member of the Organization.

253. Neither do we share views with regard to other aspects which are not in keeping with the fundamental requirements frequently reiterated in resolutions of this Organization to ensure that South Africa withdraws from Namibian territory, the duty of every State Member of the United Nations not to recognize that presence and illegal military occupation and, to that end, to support all efforts of the United Nations Council for Namibia and the Secretary-General aimed at reaching a peaceful solution of the Namibian question based on Security Council resolution 435 (1978).

254. Mr. DOS SANTOS (Mozambique): The Government of the People's Republic of Mozambique strongly rejects the South African attempts to wreck Security Council resolution 435 (1978) and to delay the independence of Namibia. We are also opposed to the so-called linkage. We hold the position that one people's sovereignty should not be used as a bargaining chip for another people's independence.

255. My Government has taken an active part in all efforts aimed at finding an immediate and just solution to the question of Namibia at the OAU, in the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and here at the United Nations. We have therefore spared no effort in the joint undertaking by the front-line States with a view to immediately freeing Namibia from the colonial yoke. The People's Republic of Mozambique, together with other front-line States, played an important role in the efforts that led to the adoption of Security Council resolution 435 (1978), which endorses the United Nations plan for the independence of Namibia. We have engaged in this process on the understanding that only the genuine independence of Namibia and the eradication of apartheid can bring about peace and stability in the region.

256. I want to take this opportunity once again to reiterate our firm support for and solidarity with SWAPO, the sole and legitimate representative of the Namibian people. Those were the reasons for our affirmative votes on the draft resolutions just adopted.

257. Nevertheless, while supporting the view that the United Nations should consider taking every possible measure, including those envisaged in Chapter VII of the Charter, to ensure South Africa's compliance with the decisions of the Organization, my delegation reiterates the fact that the People's Republic of Mozambique is not in a position to apply economic sanctions against South Africa.

258. Mr. INFANTE (Chile) (interpretation from Spanish): Since the year 1946, that is, practically from the birth of the United Nations, Chile has rejected South Africa's alleged claims over the Territory of Namibia and has supported the various stages of the Namibian people's struggle. Its conduct as a member of the United Nations Council for Namibia has always been consistent. Today we reiterate that decision and pledge Chilean support for the present and future of the Namibian cause.

259. However, my delegation must reiterate here what it has stated on several occasions, namely, that it does not consider it advisable to adopt the practice of bringing to this forum and in respect of this question accusations that would be better placed in the context of the East-West conflict and debated in other forums. A specific case in point is the unfelicitous drafting of paragraph 14 of draft resolution A, which is selective with regard to the general responsibility that members of the Security Council bear for the maintenance of international peace and security.

260. Furthermore, in this context we find specific mention of countries. Selectivity, in our view, is not a good practice and, ultimately, it affects the credibility of the resolutions concerned.

261. Likewise, my delegation does not consider it appropriate to refer to measures that fall within the Security Council's competence and believes that the way in which mention is made of technical financial bodies is counter to the autonomy of their constitutional documents, which are based on purely technical considerations.

262. Mr. AOKI (Japan): My delegation abstained in the vote on draft resolutions A, B and D. As we have explained on many occasions, we have serious reservations about a number of their provisions. For example, these resolutions contain many paragraphs which refer to and criticize by name particular Member States. My delegation does not believe that this name-calling will contribute to a solution of the problem. That is why we voted in favour of the amendments proposed by the United States.

263. In addition, with reference to draft resolution D, while my delegation attaches importance to the dissemination of information on Namibia, we believe that the information must be accurate, fair and balanced. It is also important that close co-operation and co-ordination be maintained between the United Nations Council for Namibia and the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat so that the facilities of that Department will be utilized effectively and information disseminated in a co-ordinated manner. It is essential that limited financial and human resources be utilized as effectively as possible.

264. My delegation voted in favour of draft resolutions C and E, however, our affirmative vote should not be construed as support for all the paragraphs of those resolutions. My delegation's position, which it has made clear on various occasions, has not changed.

265. As in previous years, my delegation has reservations about some parts of the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia, which we expressed in the debate on this agenda item [81st meeting].

266. My delegation has reservations also with regard to the dramatic increase in the budget appropriations. Again, although we recognize and appreciate the important role that the United Nations Fund for Namibia is playing, we have reservations regarding paragraph 5 of draft resolution E, which allocates $1 million from the regular budget. The Fund, it should be recalled, was established as a voluntary fund.

267. Mr. KOFA (Liberia): The policy of the Government of Liberia regarding the question of Namibia is well known. Liberia has repeatedly expressed its firm support and commitment to the concerted efforts of the international community to bring an end to the colonial and illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa. Its membership in the United Nations Council for Namibia has further served as a constructive contribution to the achievement of this goal.

268. My delegation has voted in favour of the adoption of all the draft resolutions recommended by the Council in its report, because they reflect the general thrust of the Namibian liberation struggle for the attainment of self-determination, freedom and independence.

269. Having voted affirmatively, we take this opportunity to emphasize that we differ with the approach taken in the formulation of the provisions of the draft resolutions, which we feel could give rise to difficulties for some Member States, such as Liberia, and even resistance by others, in their implementation.

270. In this respect, Liberia reserves its position with regard to the following matters. We consider certain sections of resolutions A, B, and D that arbitrarily single out a few countries for exposure, criticism and condemnation while deliberately shielding other known and recognized culprits which are co-operating and collaborating with South Africa to be not only divisive but self-defeating.

271. Our vote, therefore, in favour of the amendments proposed by the United States delegation is to make clear our strong opposition to selective criticism and condemnation and does not in any way imply a radical departure from our position calling for the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978) in its entirety. Liberia would have preferred similar language to that used in the resolution adopted at the twentieth ordinary session of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity, held at Addis Ababa from 12 to 15 November 1984.[8] The Liberian delegation had hoped that the Assembly would have adopted all the resolutions by consensus. We are deeply disappointed that it has not been possible to achieve such unanimity, but we expect that in the future this will be the case, since we all profess to have the same goal: self-determination, freedom and independence for Namibia at the earliest possible date.

272. Mr. AKYOL (Turkey) (interpretation from French): The Turkish Government supports all efforts which are aimed at ensuring the swift accession of Namibia to complete independence in accordance with the relevant United Nations resolutions, particularly Security Council resolution 435 (1978). My Government's view on this matter was expressed in a statement made during the general debate by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Turkey [20th meeting] as well as in the debate on the question of Namibia [81st meeting].

273. In accordance with the firm support which we have committed ourselves to providing for the independence of Namibia, my delegation voted in favour of all the draft resolutions contained in the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia. Nevertheless, my delegation has a number of reservations in connection with certain paragraphs in draft resolutions A, B and D. Generally speaking, we do not approve of the idea of making express mention of certain countries or groups of countries when it is difficult to spell out the respective responsibilities. More specifically, my delegation has reservations about the references made to the Western countries, either as a group or individually, which appear in the seventeenth, twentieth and twenty-third preambular paragraphs and in paragraphs 14, 21, 37, 44 and 49 of draft resolution A.

274. We also disapprove of a Western country and all the countries belonging to that region being mentioned by name in the third preambular paragraph and in paragraphs 3, 8, 9 and 11 of draft resolution B. We have a similar reservation in connection with the sixth preambular paragraph and paragraph 5 of draft resolution D.

275. Mr. MAGALHÃES (Brazil): The Brazilian Government supports all measures aimed at the prompt independence of Namibia. That is why we voted in favour of the five draft resolutions submitted for our attention by the United Nations Council for Namibia.

276. The Brazilian delegation, however, deems it necessary to place on record its reservations concerning the language of certain paragraphs of those draft resolutions, language which cannot be considered as a positive contribution to our common objective: the granting of freedom and independence to the Namibian people.

277. Mr. MAKEKA (Lesotho): My delegation voted in favour of all the draft resolutions in the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia because they represent the position of the Government of Lesotho on the question of Namibia.

278. In the vote on the amendments proposed by the United States, my delegation abstained on those amendments which unfairly singled out some countries by name while in fact there are many other countries which are engaged in similar activities. We have, however, voted against amendments that would distort the facts. I conclude by stating that my delegation has, as usual, difficulties with paragraphs which invoke Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.

279. Mr. AYE (Burma): The delegation of Burma would like to clarify that it has just voted in favour of all five draft resolutions on the question of Namibia in conformity with our firm and consistent support for the Namibian people in their brave struggle for national liberation, under the leadership of SWAPO. Burma is in complete agreement with the objectives expressed in the draft resolutions, which are directed towards compelling South Africa to abide by the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council, particularly Security Council resolution 435 (1978), which constitutes the basis for the peaceful settlement of the Namibian question.

280. However, we regret to note that a number of the formulations in draft resolutions A, B and D have tended to be unfairly selective and partial, and their inclusion is not a positive contribution to the furtherance of the primary objective of our deliberations, which is the attainment of national independence by the people of Namibia. In such unfortunate circumstances, my delegation sees no alternative but to register its reservations to the form and content of certain paragraphs in draft resolutions A, B and D, but my delegation would like to reaffirm that by our positive vote on all five draft resolutions on the question of Namibia Burma has amply demonstrated its long-standing and continued support for the just cause of the Namibian people.

281. Mr. GAUCI (Malta): As in the past, we have supported all the draft resolutions before the Assembly concerning Namibia because we are anxious to secure early independence for Namibia in accordance with Security Council resolutions 435 (1978) and because we sympathize with the sense of frustration of all against South Africa's delaying tactics. That does not necessarily imply, however, that we are in full accord with every single provision contained in the draft resolutions, particularly draft resolution A. On such an important issue we feel that more effort should be expended in searching for a resolution which would command universal support.

282. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on the representative of Turkey, who will speak in his capacity as Acting President of the United Nations Council for Namibia.

283. Mr. HAKTANIR (Turkey): On behalf of the United Nations Council for Namibia, I would like to thank all those Member States which participated in the debate on the question of Namibia. The draft resolutions which the United Nations Council for Namibia recommended to the present session of the General Assembly have been adopted by the overwhelming majority of Member States. We thank those who voted in favour of the resolutions, thus making it clear to South Africa that the international community stands solidly behind the Namibian people in their struggle for justice, liberty and independence.

284. A large majority of Member States have, in the debate on this question, condemned the continued illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa in defiance of the numerous resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council. They have demanded the withdrawal of South African troops from Namibia and have stated that Namibia is a unique responsibility of the United Nations and one of the most serious problems facing the Organization. Many delegations have opposed the linking of Namibian independence with extraneous and irrelevant issues.

285. From the statements by Member States and the resolutions just adopted it is quite clear that the collective view of the international community is that South Africa's continued illegal occupation of Namibia constitutes a threat to international peace and security. The General Assembly, by these resolutions, gives a mandate to the United Nations Council for Namibia to continue its extensive programme of work for the next year. It calls for appropriate action by Member States; it provides for increased action by intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations.

286. A number of Member States have abstained in the voting on the draft resolutions. The United Nations Council for Namibia would like to believe that these Member States still support the spirit of the resolutions adopted. The Council is confident that they too share with it the deep conviction that the people of Namibia must attain their right to self-determination and genuine independence in a united Namibia.

287. The firmness of our resolutions in recent years is a natural reaction to South Africa's continuing rejection of all efforts on the part of the United Nations to solve the Namibian question. It is, furthermore, a reflection of the deep disappointment of the oppressed people of Namibia, who have struggled for a century against the colonial occupation of their country.

288. The United Nations Council for Namibia, in conformity with its mandate as the legal Administering Authority for Namibia until independence, will continue its efforts to mobilize world opinion in support of the legitimate struggle of the Namibian people, under the leadership of SWAPO, for self-determination, freedom and national independence.

289. Before concluding, I should like to recall what the Secretary-General of the South West Africa People's Organization, Mr. Andimba Toivo ja Toivo, said in his statement on 29 November:

> "As I speak now, my people have their ears glued to their transistor radios in the hope that my words before the General Assembly will rekindle outrage and invigorate the world community to take concrete measures to assure the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978)." [78th meeting, para. 108.]

290. The people of Namibia have put their trust in the United Nations; they have waited for almost 40 years for that trust to be fulfilled. The United Nations Council for Namibia strongly believes that effective means to compel South Africa to comply with Security Council resolution 435 (1978) are provided for in the Charter of the United Nations.

291. The PRESIDENT: Before the Assembly proceeds to consider the reports of the First Committee, I shall call on the Secretary-General, who wishes to make a statement.

292. The SECRETARY-GENERAL: The Assembly has before it at this session 64 draft resolutions dealing with disarmament. During the past weeks, the able and dedicated representatives in the First Committee have worked diligently to devise resolutions on almost every aspect of nuclear and conventional disarmament and arms limitation. Their efforts have been painstaking and thorough. I believe I would be failing in my responsibility as Secretary-General, however, if I did not take this occasion to voice my alarm at the current state of disarmament endeavours in the world. We must ask ourselves if we are truly committed to the first precept of the Charter of the United Nations, which is "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war".

293. The Charter gives both the General Assembly and the Security Council responsibility for considering disarmament and the regulation of armaments. Today there is no more important task before us. The threat of nuclear catastrophe is not one issue among many. Preventing such a horror is the pre-condition of all our endeavours. The great tasks before the world Organization, the challenges of economic and social development, progress in human rights, the construction of a world of justice and human dignity—all will be in vain if we fail to prevent nuclear disaster.

294. Imperfect as it may be, the United Nations is the only existing expression of the entire international community. The common aspirations of the world's people must be articulated here, and none is more fundamental than the survival of humanity. I will not rehearse once more the terrifying statistics that seem to have numbed us with their repetition. Suffice it to say that a nuclear war could never remain limited and could never be won. Its effects would not be confined to the nuclear adversaries but would threaten the existence of all the peoples on this earth. It could lead to the extinction of humanity. Doomsday scenarios need not be proven; the existence of the risk is enough, for the worst need only happen once.

295. As I look across this Hall, I see the delegations of 159 member nations. Almost all the world's peoples are represented here. All of them—all of us—live under the nuclear threat. As Secretary-General of the Organization, with no allegiance except to the common interest, I feel the question may justifiably be put to the leading nuclear Powers: by what right do they decide the fate of all humanity? From Scandinavia to Latin America, from Europe and Africa to the Far East, the destiny of every man and woman is affected by their actions. No one can expect to escape the catastrophic consequences of a nuclear war on the fragile structure of our planet. The responsibility assumed by the great Powers is now no longer to their populations alone: it is to every country and every people, to all of us.

296. No ideological confrontation can be allowed to jeopardize the future of humanity. Nothing less is at stake: today's decisions affect not only the present; they also put at risk succeeding generations. Like supreme arbiters, with our disputes of the moment we threaten to cut off the future and extinguish the lives of the innocent millions as yet unborn. There can be no greater arrogance. At the same time, the lives of all who lived before us may be rendered meaningless, for we have the power to dissolve in a conflict of hours or minutes the entire work of civilization, with all the brilliant cultural heritage of mankind.

297. For almost 40 years we have lived under the nuclear shadow. Many have claimed that it alone has kept peace in the world. If nuclear weapons are indeed peace-keepers, does it follow that they ought to be acquired by every nation on earth? On the contrary, it is clear that to rely on nuclear deterrence is to accept a perpetual community of fear. That is very far from the community of human worth and understanding foreseen by the Charter.

298. It is neither desirable nor feasible in the long term to find true stability through nuclear deterrence. It is not desirable because in the long term human values are inconsistent with the threat of the indiscriminate death of millions of our fellow men and women. No humane society that recognizes individual worth and dignity can contemplate such an action. Conversely, the very fear and hatred of an adversary believed to be capable of carrying out such an attack would destroy the basis of a civilized society.

299. Even if we ignore its inhuman aspects, in the long run can we really expect stability from a balance of fear and the suspicion that it breeds? With the accelerating pace of military technology, the need to counter each new threat will become ever more frantic and desperate. Every innovation in arms will tend to destabilize the fragile balance. Every perceived advantage will lead to fears of first-strike capability and the resulting temptation, at a time of great crisis, to launch a pre-emptive attack. And will our scientific vanity allow us to forget the double fallibility we face from human and from technological error? Offensive capacity must certainly be reduced. Ultimately, however, there is no deterrence, since any initiation of nuclear hostilities would be to no one's advantage. This is made cruelly clear by suggestions that a "nuclear winter" could follow a nuclear strike, even without any retaliation. To launch any nuclear attack could then indeed be suicide. The fruits of such violence would fall equally and with grim justice on the initiator and the victim alike.

300. Six years ago in this Hall we decided on the fundamental objective facing all of us:

> "Removing the threat of a world war—a nuclear war—is the most acute and urgent task of the present day. Mankind is confronted with a choice: we must halt the arms race and proceed to disarmament or face annihilation". [Resolution S-10/2, para. 18.]

It remains our most acute and urgent task. Every representative in this room, I am sure, shares the hope that the meeting between the Foreign Ministers of the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics will be a step in the direction that we all seek. Indeed, every one of us has a right to urge the start of a new and determined process of disarmament negotiations by the nuclear Powers. Next September we shall hold the Third Review Conference of the Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons. The corollary for horizontal non-proliferation under that Treaty was the undertaking given, particularly by the great Powers, to "pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date and to nuclear disarmament" [resolution 2373 (XXII), annex, art. VI]. Is it reasonable to expect restraint in one direction and uncontrolled expansion in the other? With progress in both directions the Non-Proliferation Treaty could become the embryo of a treaty, however distant, for the abolition of nuclear weapons.

301. It is not for me to make detailed observations on the course of the negotiations to be undertaken. However, it seems clear that fundamental security needs have to be acknowledged and taken into account. Paradoxically, both sides have an interest in each other's security, since insecurity can only lead to mutual peril and to pre-emptive considerations. Given the enormous complexity of today's weaponry and the varying composition of arsenals, advantages in different spheres will have to be balanced against each other. Finally, serious talks can take place only at the negotiating table and not through the media. The international community will no longer be reassured by the mere appearance of progress.

302. United Nations Member States have at their disposal the world's only multilateral negotiating body for disarmament, the Conference on Disarmament at Geneva. I have said on more than one occasion that its endeavours should not be made to depend upon progress on the bilateral side. Moreover, we can make a contribution to the bilateral process in various ways. I appeal for a renewed effort towards a comprehensive test-ban treaty. No single multilateral agreement could have a greater effect on limiting the further refinement of nuclear weapons. A comprehensive test-ban treaty is the litmus test of the real willingness to pursue nuclear disarmament. Is it wise to develop new classes of ever more lethal, ever more technically complex weapons, whose control is ever more difficult to verify? We are at the point of leaving the decision on humanity's future to the automatic—and fallible—reactions of computers. Talks on a comprehensive test ban have been in abeyance for too long, and their value has even been questioned. As with all arms-limitation negotiations, there will never be a perfect time to begin them in the opinion of all sides. The time to recommence these talks is now; they should not be delayed any further.

303. The time is equally pressing for talks on space weapons. It seems that, where weapons are concerned, the only way to halt a race is to prevent its starting. Once the race is under way, agreement is far more difficult. And the winner enjoys only a few insecure moments of victory before the other side catches up, leaving both to look back over yet more wasted human effort and ingenuity. There is no final advantage in the arms race. It is therefore crucial that a ban on weapons in the new theatre, outer space, be concluded at the earliest possible time, before it is once again too late.

304. Next year is the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations. It is also the fortieth anniversary of the first and only use of nuclear weapons, at Hiroshima and Nagasaki. While we have so far avoided global conflagration, we have made only halting and inadequate progress in disarmament or arms limitation over these past 40 years. Discussions have taken on a life of their own. All too often it seems as if the players are only moving their lethal pawns in a global chess game. We cannot calculate the quantity of our precious and limited resources that has already been poured into the endless arms race.

305. At a time of uncertainty for the young and despair for the poor and the hungry, we have truly mortgaged our future to the arms race, both nuclear and conventional. Several brilliant studies have shown us how expenditure on arms distorts our economies. We know that development will be a casualty of the arms race. In this sense, the arms trade impoverishes the receiver and debases the supplier. Here there is a striking resemblance to the drugs trade. Yet we continue on the same course even when faced with the silent genocide of famine that today stalks millions of our fellow men and women. The international community has to focus and act on the link between disarmament and development. We should take concrete and far-sighted steps toward the conversion of arms industries from military to civilian production. And we should begin to redress some of the enormous imbalance between research on arms and research on arms limitation and reduction.

306. The role of the Secretary-General under the Charter requires him to confront any matter which may threaten international peace and security. It is my belief that nothing poses a greater threat to the international community than the continuing arms race, above all the nuclear-arms race. The leaders of the great Powers have recently expressed their commitment to the prevention of war between them. The announcement that their two Foreign Ministers will soon meet is most welcome. I appeal to the two leaders to ensure that these talks lead to persistent, determined negotiations. I would also hope that they will eventually meet together in recognition of their responsibility for humanity's survival. I would urge them to enhance the prospects for disarmament by taking steps to strengthen the collective security framework afforded by the United Nations. The Organization and I are at their disposal.

307. Many words have been spoken in the cause of disarmament. We are all aware of the goals, as outlined in the Final Document of the Tenth Special Session [resolution S-10/2]. Only the political decisions of Governments can take us towards the realization of these goals, and only the peoples of the world can urge their Governments to move in that direction. The Charter of the United Nations speaks of "We the peoples", since it was to fulfil their hopes that the Organization was created. Every person on this earth has a stake in disarmament. In the nuclear age, decisions affecting war and peace cannot be left to military strategists or even to Governments. They are indeed the responsibility of every man and woman. And it is therefore the responsibility of all of us in this chamber to break the cycle of mistrust and insecurity and respond to humanity's yearning for peace.

308. The PRESIDENT: I now request the Rapporteur of the First Committee, the representative of Chad, to present all the reports of the First Committee relating to disarmament.

309. Mr. KESSELY (Chad), Rapporteur of the First Committee (interpretation from French): I have the honour and the pleasure to present to the General Assembly the reports of the First Committee on its work on disarmament matters under agenda items 45 to 52, 54, 56 to 58, 60, 61, 64 and 142. These reports are contained in documents A/39/735 to 742, A/39/744, A/39/746 to 748, A/39/750, A/39/751, A/39/754 and A/39/760. In this connection, may I point out that the reports on the question of Antarctica and international security, under agenda items 66 to 69 and 143, will be presented at a subsequent meeting of the General Assembly. The group of 22 disarmament items was included on the agenda of the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly pursuant to previous resolutions adopted by the Assembly, with the exception of agenda item 142.

310. The great number of agenda items dealing with disarmament clearly indicates the growing concern which delegations are experiencing vis-à-vis world peace and international security and the efforts they are making to bring about disarmament.

311. In order to improve and streamline the Committee's work, we organized the general debate in two stages. The first stage consisted of a general debate on all disarmament items. The second stage was intended to gear the discussion to specific disarmament items, while at the same time allowing for a debate like that of the first stage. The two stages of the general debate lasted approximately four weeks. Thereafter, we had two weeks to consider draft resolutions submitted on these items. The Committee devoted 33 meetings between 17 October and 12 November to the general debate and statements on specific disarmament items. A large number of delegations took part in the debate, which made it possible to have a fruitful exchange of views.

312. Among the various subjects relating to disarmament, the Committee particularly focused on the cessation of the nuclear-arms race and nuclear disarmament, as well as bilateral negotiations on nuclear weapons, the prevention of nuclear war, a nuclear-test ban, the prevention of an arms race in outer space and chemical weapons. Furthermore, the vast majority of speakers emphasized the importance of the relationship between disarmament and development. Although the thirty-ninth session opened in a climate of uncertainty, which increased the fear of nuclear confrontation, the debate which we had on disarmament during this session proceeded in a less tense atmosphere than that which prevailed last year, undoubtedly because there was some hope for an improvement in international relations, particularly with respect to the two super-Powers, as indicated by the bilateral negotiations which are to be held on 7 and 8 January at Geneva. However, the concerns and anxieties expressed by most of those speakers over the continuing arms race, in particular the nuclear-arms race between the two major Powers, brought out the fact that no effort should be spared to keep the situation from deteriorating and to ensure that the situation will be reversed.

313. During the work of the Committee the delegations introduced 71 draft resolutions and a draft decision on various disarmament items. In this connection, the Committee organized its work to facilitate the adoption of these draft resolutions. The Committee considered 71 draft resolutions and the draft decision before it. Seven of them were not put to a vote. The consideration of one draft resolution was adjourned under rule 116 of the rules of procedure. The Committee therefore adopted at this session 18 draft resolutions on disarmament matters without voting on them and 45 draft resolutions as well as a draft decision by a recorded vote, which amounts to a total of 63 draft resolutions and one draft decision. We can thus see that this figure is somewhat higher than the number of draft resolutions adopted last year. Of the 63 draft resolutions adopted, 26 dealt with the question of nuclear disarmament, including the prevention of nuclear war, a nuclear-weapons-test ban, bilateral negotiations on nuclear weapons, a nuclear-weapons freeze and security safeguards for non-nuclear-weapons States, as well as nuclear-weapon-free zones. The draft decision dealt with the question of deterrence. The number of draft resolutions dealing with the subject indicates the importance which attaches to matters related to nuclear armament.

314. Regarding other disarmament matters which are also of very great importance, the Committee adopted four draft resolutions on chemical weapons, three on conventional weapons, including the naval arms race, one draft resolution dealing with the prevention of an arms race in outer space and 29 draft resolutions on all other matters, including the Conference on Disarmament, the Disarmament Commission, the Declaration of the Indian Ocean as a Zone of Peace, the World Disarmament Conference, a certain number of studies covering various disarmament issues, the relation between disarmament and development and the reduction of military budgets, as well as the World Disarmament Campaign and Disarmament Week.

315. The reports of the First Committee which you have before you give details about the action taken on each of the agenda items, as well as the results of the votes on the various draft resolutions which were adopted. It is not my intention to take up too much of the little time available to the General Assembly by presenting detailed comments on all of these reports. Nevertheless, I would simply like to emphasize that among these reports there are three which cover a number of subsidiary items which were the subject of several draft resolutions, particularly agenda item 59 on review of the implementation of the recommendations and decisions adopted by the General Assembly at its tenth special session, comprising 12 sub-items that were the subject of 19 draft resolutions; agenda item 60 on review and implementation of the Concluding Document of the Twelfth Special Session of the General Assembly, comprising eight sub-items, which gave rise to 11 draft resolutions; and agenda item 65 on general and complete disarmament, comprising eight sub-items, which were the subject of 10 draft resolutions.

316. In conclusion, I should like to emphasize that the Committee carried out constructive consideration of all disarmament matters, which covered a wide range of international issues. Deliberations in recent weeks in the First Committee have clearly indicated that there is a general consensus that the United Nations should play a central role and bears prime responsibility in the field of disarmament. In this context it is encouraging to note that delegations have undertaken to work unswervingly towards general and complete disarmament under effective international control. The decisions they took on various disarmament items before the Committee indicated that it was their genuine desire to seek practical, effective ways and measures to preserve and promote international peace and security.

317. With these brief comments, I have the honour to recommend to the General Assembly the adoption of the draft resolutions contained in the reports of the First Committee.

Pursuant to rule 66 of the rules of procedure, it was decided not to discuss the reports of the First Committee.

318. The PRESIDENT: Statements will be limited to explanations of vote.

319. The positions of delegations regarding the various recommendations of the First Committee have been made clear in the Committee and are reflected in the relevant official records.

320. May I remind members that under paragraph 7 of decision 34/401 the General Assembly agreed that

> "When the same draft resolution is considered in a Main Committee and in plenary meeting, a delegation should, as far as possible, explain its vote only once, i.e., either in the Committee or in plenary meeting, unless that delegation's vote in plenary meeting is different from its vote in the Committee."

May I also remind members that, in accordance with the same decision, explanations of vote are limited to 10 minutes and should be made by delegations from their seats.

321. We turn now to the report of the First Committee on agenda item 45 [A/39/735]. I invite members to turn their attention to the draft resolution recommended by the First Committee in paragraph 7 of its report. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda,[9] Saint Lucia, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United Republic of Tanzania, United States of America, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Argentina, Belize, Cuba, France, Guyana, Ivory Coast, Malawi, Mali.

The draft resolution was adopted by 139 votes to none, with 8 abstentions (resolution 39/51).

322. The PRESIDENT: We now turn to the report of the First Committee on agenda item 46 [A/39/736]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution recommended by the First Committee in paragraph 7 of its report. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Austria, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Honduras, Hungary, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ireland, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua

New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: France,[10] United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

Abstaining: Australia, Bahamas, Belgium, Brazil, Burma, Canada, China, Denmark, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, India, Israel, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Saint Lucia, Samoa, Spain, Turkey.

The draft resolution was adopted by 122 votes to 3, with 23 abstentions (resolution 39/52).

323. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Cuba, who wishes to explain his vote.

324. Mr. GARCÍA ITURBE (Cuba) (interpretation from Spanish): My delegation voted in favour of the draft resolution just adopted but wishes to state for the record that that does not affect Cuba's position regarding the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, which is mentioned therein.

325. The PRESIDENT: The next report of the First Committee is on agenda item 47 [A/39/737]. I invite the Assembly to turn its attention to the draft resolution recommended by the First Committee in paragraph 7 of its report.

326. I call on the representative of Nigeria, who wishes to explain his vote before the voting.

327. Mr. ADENIJI (Nigeria): The statement made this afternoon by the Secretary-General is a further indication of his personal concern at the escalating arms race, a concern which my delegation deeply shares. Permit me therefore to preface my intervention with this observation.

328. Two events, as the Secretary-General mentioned in his statement, that have taken place in the last six years are emphasized in two different ways. As regards the universal consensus on disarmament, at the first special session devoted to disarmament, in 1978, representatives of all Member States adopted by consensus the Final Document [resolution S-10/2], which remains on record as the closest thing to a blueprint for disarmament ever adopted. A second special session devoted to disarmament, in 1982, which was to have consolidated the achievements of the first special session, failed, but that special session can best be remembered as providing the opportunity for the unprecedented march for peace on 12 June 1982, in which about three quarters of a million people from all over the world participated. This was a clear demonstration of the fervent desire of the ordinary man and woman that Governments should act before it is too late. Instead of improving, however, the situation has grown worse.

329. The General Assembly, of course, has not been remiss in its duty of adopting resolutions that emphasize areas for urgent action. However, the nuclear-weapon States have simply ignored these resolutions and persisted in their resolve not only to refine nuclear weapons to unimaginable limits but to extend the arms race to an environment hitherto considered fictional.

330. In the conventional weapons age which saw the birth of this Organization, disarmament was desirable to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war. In the nuclear age in which we now live, disarmament is an absolute necessity to save mankind from total extinction.

331. The present level of sophistication of nuclear weaponry has brought mankind to a period in which the next war will be one of machine against man, and it is one which man is bound to lose. Man's own creation of nuclear weaponry accumulated by the two super-Powers will, if launched in a war between them, kill perhaps half of humanity in its direct and immediate impact, but, more than that, it will create what has been called a nuclear winter, which will certainly finish the other half. This is not the imagination of alarmists or idealists; it is the finding of eminent scientists.

332. Thanks to the study whose result has been popularized by Mr. Carl Sagan, we now know that obscuring dust, and especially the dark soot which is one of the four known environmental consequences of the nuclear war, will absorb ordinary visible light from the sun, heating the atmosphere and cooling the earth's surface. Severe and prolonged low temperatures—the nuclear winter—would follow a nuclear war. For the first time it has been shown that the effects of such a war would not be restricted to the northern hemisphere where the nuclear exchange would mainly take place. Fine particles would be transported across the equator, bringing cold and darkness to the southern hemisphere. Therefore, the more we know about the consequences of nuclear war, the greater is our fear, if not panic.

333. We are about to adopt a series of draft resolutions which again signify that fear. However, we are painfully aware also that the key to progress is with the two super-Powers, and their perception of each other is a major obstacle to that progress. We therefore hope that the forthcoming negotiations, which are due to commence in January, will be undertaken in a changed atmosphere.

334. The attitude to multilateral negotiations, we believe, must also change. It is most unfortunate that the single multilateral negotiating forum which emerged out of the first special session on disarmament has not been enabled to carry out serious negotiations. There seems to be a certain distrust of the Conference on Disarmament by certain nuclear-weapon States. That distrust is leading to the paralysis of that body.

335. Turning now to the draft resolutions in document A/39/737, my delegation attaches very great importance to the urgent conclusion of a comprehensive nuclear-test-ban treaty. It is regrettable that, although this subject is one of the most thoroughly studied, it has not been possible for the multilateral negotiating body to undertake concrete negotiations on it. This is a result of the distrust that I have just mentioned, a distrust of the multilateral negotiating body. At the same time during which there has been no negotiation in the Conference on Disarmament, the trilateral negotiations between the United States, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union have not been resumed since 1980. The crucial role of a comprehensive test ban in an effective non-proliferation régime cannot be over-emphasized. The impending Third Review Conference of the Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons obliges the nuclear-weapon States parties to show their determination to fulfil their undertakings under that Treaty. My delegation hopes that a step in this direction will be demonstrated by a consensus in the Conference on Disarmament on the initiation at its next session of multilateral negotiations on a comprehensive test-ban treaty. Such a consensus will of course imply the agreement of those nuclear-weapon States not parties to the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

336. With this hope in mind, my delegation will support all the draft resolutions on a nuclear test ban recommended by the First Committee, and this includes the draft resolution in document A/39/737. However, our affirmative vote on that draft resolution—which is a change from our abstention in the First Committee—is not to be construed as endorsement of paragraph 4 of that draft resolution.

337. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution recommended by the First Committee in paragraph 7 of its report [A/39/737]. A separate vote has been requested on paragraph 4 of the draft resolution. If there is no objection, I shall first put to the vote paragraph 4 of the draft resolution. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

Draft resolution B was adopted by 137 votes to 4, with 11 abstentions (resolution 39/61 B).

349. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the representative of Albania for an explanation of vote.

350. Mr. JANKU (Albania): The Albanian delegation did not participate in the voting on numerous resolutions recommended by the First Committee regarding various disarmament problems. At the same time, I should like to put on record that although my delegation dissociated itself from the consensus when these resolutions were so adopted, it did not mean that my country is against disarmament and the strengthening of international peace and security. On the contrary, our position in this respect is just and crystal clear; it has been expressed in our statements in the General Assembly or the appropriate committee.

351. We share the concern and join our voice to the appeal of peace-loving peoples and countries for peace, international security and genuine disarmament. However, by taking this opportunity, the Albanian delegation wishes once again to reiterate its reservations with regard to these resolutions.

352. As on previous occasions, we maintain that it is the two super-Powers—American imperialism and Soviet social imperialism—which, in pursuit of their aggressive and hegemonistic policies, and ignoring the concern of world public opinion, as well as resolutions adopted by the United Nations and other international forums, are continuously intensifying the arms race, which has now extended to outer space. Nevertheless, we wish to point out that our delegation voted in favour of the draft resolutions in document A/39/747, entitled "Implementation of the Declaration" and "Nuclear capability of South Africa" and will vote in favour of the draft resolution in document A/39/743, entitled "Israeli nuclear armament".

353. As we have explained before, we reiterate now that our affirmative vote for those draft resolutions is in keeping with our determined position in support of the struggle of the African peoples against the racist régime of South Africa and the Arab peoples' struggle against the Israeli Zionists. However, we should like to stress that our support for these draft resolutions does not affect our well-known and principled attitude as regards the establishment of so-called zones of peace, or nuclear-weapon-free zones.

354. The PRESIDENT: We come now to the report of the First Committee on agenda item 58 [A/39/748]. The Assembly will vote on the draft resolution recommended by the First Committee in paragraph 7 of its report. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

Draft resolution E was adopted by 87 votes to 18, with 30 abstentions (resolution 39/65 E).[15,18]

375. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the representative of Democratic Kampuchea, who wishes to explain his vote after the vote.

376. Mr. THACH SIRAY (Democratic Kampuchea): I should like to explain the vote of my delegation on draft resolution B. My delegation abstained in the voting on that draft resolution, for the following reasons. Most people believe that the use of chemical warfare began and ended in the fields of Europe in the First World War, with monstrously gassed boys dying in the trenches. The deaths of the troops eased up, but the development of chemical warfare has never stopped. The capability of chemical weapons to bring sickness, death and destruction has in fact grown to levels never before thought possible. As a result we are now on the threshold of the age of chemical weapons.

377. During the past few years chemical weapons have still been widely used on hot battlefields in various areas of the world, for instance, in Afghanistan, Laos and my country, Kampuchea. Since December 1978, as a result of the Vietnamese aggression against Kampuchea, many hundreds of thousands of Kampucheans have died in massacres committed by the enemy or as a result of famine deliberately spread or chemical and biological weapons used by the invading forces.

378. These crimes of genocide, perpetrated by means of the systematic, widespread and indiscriminate use of chemical weapons against the Kampuchean people, show still more clearly, first, the barbaric nature of the present war of aggression against Kampuchea; secondly, the policy of genocide being pursued by the aggressor against the Kampuchean people; and, thirdly, the total impasse into which the aggressor has been driven by the increasingly powerful struggle of the people and the national resistance forces of Kampuchea. The aggressors in Kampuchea have intensified their use of chemical weapons to make up for their shortage of troops in Kampuchea or to reinforce their troops, who are overcome by defeatism and demoralization and who are about to suffer their final defeat on the battlefield of Kampuchea.

379. As the people of Kampuchea have been victims of the use of chemical and biological weapons, my delegation wishes more than anyone else to see the earliest possible adoption of the convention on the prohibition of the development, production and stockpiling of all chemical weapons and on their destruction. In this regard, we should like to reiterate our profound gratitude to all friendly countries which have shown their sympathy for the plight of the Kampuchean people and which have been making serious and sincere efforts towards the adoption of the convention. However, among the list of sponsors of the draft we find the name of the country which has more than 200,000 troops occupying Kampuchea and resorting to barbaric chemical warfare against the people of Kampuchea.

380. The Assembly is aware of the number of times the authorities of that country have used the Organization as a platform to slander the international community, to justify their acts of aggression and to attack other peace-loving countries throughout the world. They continue to this day to defy the insistent appeals of the international community, which has asked them to withdraw their troops from Kampuchea and to allow the Kampuchean people to decide their own destiny without any foreign interference.

381. We cannot but view this sponsorship as part and parcel of the diplomatic manoeuvres which are constantly used by those authorities to show that they are the champions of peace and thus to justify their invasion and occupation of Kampuchea, to induce the international community to tolerate the crimes they have committed and are still committing against the people of Kampuchea and to assist in a fait accompli in Kampuchea.

382. The presence of that country among the sponsors of the draft resolution we have just adopted is not only an insult to the peace-loving and justice-loving countries which have given sincerely of their time and their energy to ensure the triumph of right and justice but also an insult to the memory of those who have perished and those who are still struggling for their national liberation. It is not by becoming a sponsor of this draft but rather by putting an end to its war of aggression in Kampuchea and an end to the use of chemical and bacteriological weapons against the Kampuchean people that Viet Nam can contribute positively to the early adoption of the convention.

383. My delegation would like to enter very serious reservations on this score and to request that they appear in the records of the General Assembly.

384. The PRESIDENT: Finally, we turn to the report of the First Committee on agenda item 142 [A/39/760]. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to take note of this report?

It was so decided (decision 39/415).

The meeting rose at 9.10 p.m.

1. Mr. MOJTAHED (Islamic Republic of Iran) (Rapporteur of the Fifth Committee): Today I have the honour to introduce ten separate reports of the Fifth Committee. The first six of these deal with agenda item 17 (a) to (f), concerning appointments to fill vacancies in subsidiary organs and other appointments.

2. The report of the Fifth Committee on sub-item 17 (a), concerning the appointment of members of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, is contained in document

---

A/39/725. The recommendation of the Committee appears in paragraph 6 of the report.

3. The next report relates to sub-item 17 (b), concerning the appointment of members of the Committee on Contributions, and is contained in document A/39/726. The Committee's recommendation appears in paragraph 5 of the report.

4. The third report relates to sub-item 17 (c), concerning the appointment of a member of the Board of Auditors, and is contained in document A/39/727. The Committee's recommendation is in paragraph 5 of the report.

5. The fourth report of this series relates to sub-item 17 (d), concerning the confirmation of the appointment of members of the Investments Committee, and is contained in document A/39/728. The recommendation of the Committee appears in paragraph 4 of the report.

6. Next, I wish to draw the attention of the General Assembly to the report of the Fifth Committee which relates to sub-item 17 (e), dealing with the appointment of members of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal, and is contained in document A/39/729. The Committee's recommendation appears in paragraph 4 of the report.

7. Finally, as regards appointments, I submit for consideration by the General Assembly the Fifth Committee's report on sub-item 17 (f), concerning the appointment of members of the International Civil Service Commission and the designation of the Vice-Chairman of the Commission; the report is contained in document A/39/820. The recommendation of the Committee appears in paragraph 11 of the report.

8. Allow me now to call the attention of the General Assembly to the report of the Fifth Committee which deals with agenda item 108, concerning the financial reports and audited financial statements, and reports of the Board of Auditors. The report is contained in document A/39/618 and the recommendations of the Fifth Committee appear in paragraphs 12 and 13. In paragraph 12, the Committee recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of two draft resolutions, I and II. Draft resolution I concerns the financial reports and audited financial statements and reports of the Board of Auditors, while draft resolution II deals with the catering operation at United Nations Headquarters. Paragraph 13 of the Committee's report contains the text of a draft decision recommended by the Committee on the subject of the Internal Audit Division.

9. The two draft resolutions and the draft decision recommended were adopted by the Fifth Committee without a vote.

10. The Fifth Committee's report on agenda item 114, concerning the pattern of conferences, appears in document A/39/730. Paragraph 9 of this report contains four draft resolutions, A to D, which the Committee recommends to the Assembly for adoption. These deal, respectively, with the report of the Committee on Conferences, the shortening of sessions or adoption of a biennial cycle for sessions of United Nations organs, the pattern of conferences and the control and limitation of documentation. The four draft resolutions were adopted by the Committee without a vote.

11. The next report which I have the honour to introduce comprises part II of the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 117, concerning the United Nations common system. The report appears in document A/39/718/Add.1 and contains, in paragraphs 9 and 10, the recommendations of the Fifth Committee in the form of a draft resolution and a draft decision which were adopted by the Committee without a vote.

12. I come now to the last report of the Fifth Committee to be considered by the General Assembly at this meeting. I refer to the report on agenda item 119 (b), concerning the financing of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon. The report appears in document A/39/767 and contains, in paragraph 9, the recommendation of the Fifth Committee in the form of three draft resolutions, I and II A and B.

13. Draft resolution I concerns the review of the rates of reimbursement to the Governments of troop-contributing States. It was adopted by the Fifth Committee by a recorded vote of 89 to 11, with 5 abstentions.

14. Draft resolutions II A and B concern the financing of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon. They were adopted by the Fifth Committee by a recorded vote of 88 to 12, with 3 abstentions.

15. I have the honour, on behalf of the Fifth Committee, to recommend to the General Assembly for approval the various reports to which I have referred.

Pursuant to rule 66 of the rules of procedure, it was decided not to discuss the reports of the Fifth Committee.

16. The PRESIDENT: Statements will therefore be limited to explanations of vote. The positions of delegations regarding the various recommendations of the Fifth Committee have been made clear in the Committee and are reflected in the relevant summary records.

17. May I remind the members of the Assembly that in paragraph 7 of its decision 34/401 the General Assembly decided that when the same draft resolution was considered in a Main Committee and in plenary meeting, a delegation should, as far as possible, explain its vote only once, that is, either in the committee or in plenary meeting, unless that delegation's vote in plenary meeting was different from its vote in the committee. May I also remind members that, in accordance with the same decision, explanations of vote are limited to 10 minutes and should be made by delegations from their seats.

18. I first invite the members of the General Assembly to turn their attention to the report of the Fifth Committee on sub-item 17 (a) [A/39/725].

19. The Fifth Committee, in paragraph 6 of its report, recommends to the General Assembly the appointment of Mr. Even Fontaine-Ortiz, Mr. Jobst Holborn, Mrs. Virginia Housholder, Mr. Igor Vasilevich Khalevinski and Mr. Rachid Lahlou as members of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions for a three-year term beginning on 1 January 1985. May I take it that the Assembly adopts this recommendation?

It was so decided (decision 39/317).

20. The PRESIDENT: We come now to the report of the Fifth Committee on sub-item 17 (b) [A/39/726]. In paragraph 5 of this report, the Fifth Committee recommends to the General Assembly the appointment of Mr. Amjad Ali, Mr. Ernesto Battisti, Mr. Javier Castillo Ayala, Mr. Anatoly

Semënovich Chistyakov, Mr. Dominique Souchet and Mr. Wang Liansheng as members of the Committee on Contributions for a three-year term beginning on 1 January 1985, and the appointment of Mr. Yasuo Noguchi as a member of the Committee for a one-year term beginning on 1 January 1985. May I take it that the Assembly adopts this recommendation?

It was so decided (decision 39/318).

21. The PRESIDENT: I now invite the members of the General Assembly to turn their attention to the report of the Fifth Committee on sub-item 17 (c) [A/39/727]. In paragraph 5 of this report the Fifth Committee recommends to the General Assembly the appointment of the Auditor-General of Ghana as a member of the Board of Auditors for a three-year term beginning on 1 July 1985. May I take it that the Assembly adopts this recommendation?

It was so decided (decision 39/319).

22. The PRESIDENT: I now invite the members of the General Assembly to turn their attention to the report of the Fifth Committee on sub-item 17 (d) [A/39/728]. The Fifth Committee, in paragraph 4 of the report, recommends to the General Assembly the confirmation of the appointment by the Secretary-General of Mr. Jean Guyot, Mr. George Johnston and Mr. Michiya Matsukawa as members of the Investments Committee for a three-year term beginning on 1 January 1985. May I take it that the Assembly adopts that recommendation?

It was so decided (decision 39/320).

23. The PRESIDENT: We come now to the report of the Fifth Committee on sub-item 17 (e) [A/39/729]. In paragraph 4 of the report the Fifth Committee recommends to the General Assembly the appointment of Mr. Luis Maria de Posadas Montero and Mr. Endre Ustor as members of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal for a three-year term beginning on 1 January 1985. May I consider that the Assembly adopts that recommendation?

It was so decided (decision 39/321).

24. The PRESIDENT: Finally, we turn to the report of the Fifth Committee on sub-item 17 (f) [A/39/820].

25. In paragraph 11 of the report, the Fifth Committee recommends to the General Assembly the appointment of Mr. Amjad Ali, Mr. Michael O. Ani, Mr. Omar Sirry, Mr. Valery Vasilyevich Tsybukov and Mr. M. A. Vellodi as members of the International Civil Service Commission for a four-year term beginning on 1 January 1985; and the appointment of Mr. Carlos S. Vegega as a member of the Commission for a two-year term beginning on 1 January 1985. Furthermore, the Fifth Committee recommends to the Assembly the designation of Mr. Carlos S. Vegega as Vice-Chairman of the Commission for a two-year term beginning on 1 January 1985. May I take it that the Assembly approves these recommendations?

It was so decided (decision 39/322).

26. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now consider the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 108 [A/39/618].

27. The General Assembly will now take a decision on the recommendations of the Fifth Committee contained in paragraphs 12 and 13 of its report. In paragraph 12 the Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of two draft resolutions, I and II. Draft resolution I is entitled "Financial reports and audited financial statements and reports of the Board of Auditors".

28. The Fifth Committee adopted draft resolution I without a vote. May I consider that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution I was adopted (resolution 39/66).

29. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution II, entitled "Catering operation at United Nations Headquarters", was also adopted by the Fifth Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution II was adopted (resolution 39/67).

30. The PRESIDENT: In paragraph 13 of the report, the Fifth Committee recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of a draft decision entitled "Internal Audit Division". The Committee adopted that draft decision without a vote. May I consider that the Assembly wishes to do likewise?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/416).

31. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now consider the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 114 [A/39/730].

32. The Assembly will take a decision on draft resolutions A to D recommended by the Fifth Committee in paragraph 9 of its report, under the general title "Pattern of Conferences". Draft resolution A is entitled "Report of the Committee on Conferences". May I consider that the General Assembly wishes to adopt draft resolution A?

Draft resolution A was adopted (resolution 39/68 A).

33. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution B, entitled "Shortening of sessions or adoption of a biennial cycle for sessions of United Nations organs", was adopted by the Fifth Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to adopt draft resolution B?

Draft resolution B was adopted (resolution 39/68 B).

34. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution C is entitled "Pattern of conferences". The Fifth Committee adopted this draft resolution without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution C was adopted (resolution 39/68 C).

35. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution D is entitled "Control and limitation of documentation". It was adopted by the Fifth Committee without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt draft resolution D?

Draft resolution D was adopted (resolution 39/68 D).

36. The PRESIDENT: We will now consider part II [A/39/718/Add.1] of the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 117.

37. The General Assembly will first take a decision on the draft resolution recommended by the Fifth Committee in paragraph 9 of the report. That draft resolution is entitled "United Nations common system: report of the International Civil Service Commission (Chaps. IV-IX)" and was adopted by the Fifth Committee without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/69).

38. The PRESIDENT: In paragraph 10 of the report, the Fifth Committee recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of a draft decision entitled "Statute of the International Civil Service Commission". The Fifth Committee adopted that draft decision without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly decides to do likewise?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/417).

39. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, who has asked to make a statement.

40. Mr. VISLYKH (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (interpretation from Russian): Under this agenda item the Soviet delegation believes it necessary to state its views on the demonstration by the so-called Staff Union that took place yesterday morning while the General Assembly was working intensively.

41. We view these actions, whatever words are used to describe them, as an attempt by the Staff Union to place itself above Member States and an open defiance of States. In essence, the international civil servants have challenged the right of States to resolve all matters relating to the staff of international organizations, including questions of remuneration. This approach runs counter to the appropriate provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and General Assembly resolutions.

42. The Soviet delegation would stress that the Staff Union has no right to place itself above Member States and to challenge decisions adopted by main bodies of the United Nations. We should like to express our categorical objection to attempts by the Staff Union to turn itself into a political body and to exert pressure on Member States and intergovernmental bodies during their consideration of matters related to staff, in particular remuneration.

43. The delegation of the USSR describes these actions by the Staff Union as illegitimate and prejudicial to the work of the Organization and the United Nations system.

44. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now consider the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 119 (b) [A/39/767].

45. I call on the representative of Albania, who wishes to speak in explanation of vote before the vote.

46. Mr. PAPAJORGJI (Albania): The Albanian delegation will vote against the draft resolutions on the financing of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon which appear in document A/39/767 and which the Fifth Committee recommends to the General Assembly for adoption. We should like to reiterate that our negative vote is in conformity with the position always taken by us in votes taken on the financing and dispatching of different United Nations forces to various parts and regions. The Albanian delegation has always clearly explained its attitude before the General Assembly or in the Fifth Committee and will not now repeat it in detail.

47. The PRESIDENT: The recommendations of the Fifth Committee are contained in paragraph 9 of its report in the form of three draft resolutions, I and II A and B.

48. First I put to the vote draft resolution I entitled "Review of the rates of reimbursement to the Governments of troop-contributing States". A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Congo, Costa Rica, Cyprus, Democratic Kampuchea, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Morocco, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Portugal, Qatar, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United Republic of Tanzania, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Afghanistan, Albania, Bulgaria, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Poland, Syrian Arab Republic, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Viet Nam.

Abstaining: Benin, Democratic Yemen, Iraq, Maldives, Romania, Yemen.

Draft resolution I was adopted by 119 votes to 15, with 6 abstentions (resolution 39/70).[1]

49. The PRESIDENT: I now put to the vote draft resolutions II A and B grouped under the general title "Financing of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon". A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Congo, Costa Rica, Cyprus, Democratic Kampuchea, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lebanon, Liberia, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Morocco, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United Republic of Tanzania, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Afghanistan, Albania, Bulgaria, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Poland, Syrian Arab Republic, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Viet Nam.

Abstaining: Iraq, Maldives, Yemen.

Draft resolutions II A and B were adopted by 121 votes to 15, with 3 abstentions (resolutions 39/71 A and B).[2]

AGENDA ITEM 31

Policies of apartheid of the Government of South Africa (continued):*

(a) Report of the Special Committee against Apartheid;

(b) Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against Apartheid in Sports;

(c) Report of the Secretary-General

50. The PRESIDENT: I shall call first on those representatives who wish to introduce the draft resolutions.

31. Mr. GARBA (Nigeria), Chairman of the Special Committee against Apartheid: I have the honour to introduce the first two draft resolutions on the item. Draft resolution A/39/L.28, entitled "Comprehensive sanctions against the apartheid regime and support to the liberation struggle in South Africa", is sponsored by 31 countries.

52. Draft resolution A/39/L.29, entitled "Programme of work of the Special Committee against apartheid", is sponsored by 44 countries.

53. Draft resolution A/39/L.28 is essentially a restatement of the firm commitment of the United Nations to the elimination of apartheid in South Africa and of its concern for the oppressed majority in that country, and a reaffirmation of the call for the isolation of the criminal racist régime and of full support for the oppressed people and their national liberation movements in their legitimate struggle for a non-racial democratic society. It is based on resolutions adopted by the General Assembly by overwhelming majorities in past years.

54. The draft resolution takes into account the grave aggravation of the situation in South Africa, resulting from the imposition by the racist régime of a constitution designed to entrench apartheid and dispossess the indigenous African people, who constitute 73 per cent of the population; the escalation of repression by that régime and its killing of innocent men, women and children; and the growing resistance by the people against all manifestations of apartheid.

55. It is a call to the international community to respond to the inescapable moral challenge posed by apartheid, a renewed request to the Security Council to discharge its responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations, and an appeal to the major Western Powers to desist from protecting the racist régime and to facilitate comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against it. It is a rejection of the propaganda and actions of the collaborators with apartheid, who seek to bestow respectability on the despicable racist régime in Pretoria, and a recognition of the need for more effective action to destroy apartheid.

Mr. Helgason (Iceland), Vice-President, took the Chair.

56. I will not refer to all the provisions of the draft resolution, as they are clear and simple, but will only draw special attention to some paragraphs which relate to developments in the past year.

57. For instance, in the fourth preambular paragraph and in paragraph 2, the draft resolution refers to the declarations of four important conferences organized by the Special Committee against Apartheid in its untiring efforts to promote action by all Governments and organizations for the elimination of apartheid.

58. In the fifth preambular paragraph and paragraph 3, the draft resolution draws attention to the escalation of repression and violence by the racist régime, which has even deployed armed forces against African townships and indiscriminately murdered many men, women and children.

59. In the sixth and nineteenth preambular paragraphs the draft resolution condemns the so-called new constitution, rejected by the great majority of the people of South Africa. The General Assembly and the Security Council have indeed already denounced that constitution, and declared it null and void. The present régime in South Africa, emerging from the obnoxious constitution, can therefore be accorded no recognition whatsoever.

60. Consequently, in paragraphs 10, 12 and 29, the draft resolution calls for the exclusion of that régime from the United Nations and its specialized agencies and for the denial of any legitimacy to that régime by any State.

61. While deploring and condemning the growing collaboration of certain Western States and Israel with the apartheid régime, despite repeated appeals by the General Assembly, the draft resolution expresses grave anxiety, in particular, over the increased collaboration by the Government of the United States of America in pursuance of its policy of so-called "constructive engagement". It condemns that policy in paragraph 15, and in paragraph 18 it appeals to all Governments and organizations to exert their influence to persuade the United States Government, and others concerned, to co-operate in international action for the elimination of apartheid.

62. On the other hand, the draft resolution commends Governments and organizations, cities and local authorities, and the numerous individuals who have contributed to the international campaign against apartheid, often at great sacrifice.

63. The purpose of the draft resolution is to ensure maximum pressure on the apartheid régime, to promote all appropriate assistance to the oppressed people and their national liberation movements in their legitimate struggle for a non-racial, democratic society and to mobilize world opinion in support of United Nations action for the elimination of apartheid. To that end it lays down guidelines for concrete and effective action by the Security Council, by Member States, by intergovernmental organizations, by non-governmental organizations and by individuals.

64. While we regard the provisions of this draft resolution as the minimum action required of the international community to discharge its inescapable moral responsibility, I am aware that they are regarded by some delegations as controversial. Some Western States which are basically supportive of the international efforts against apartheid have found it difficult to accept some of the formulations. We shall continue patiently to explain our views and to try, we hope, to persuade them.

65. A few delegations, however, are opposed to the thrust of this draft resolution because they are anxious to continue and to expand collaboration with the apartheid régime. They advocate a so-called consensus text which would involve no action against apartheid, except for verbal condemnations. We cannot accept any such consensus, which not only would be meaningless but would be a betrayal of our responsibility to the millions of people struggling for the principles of the United Nations.

66. We see no merit whatsoever in the argument that a request for effective action against apartheid by all organizations and institutions within the United Nations system is inappropriate for the reason that it "politicizes" specialized institutions. Apartheid is universally recognized as a crime, a negation of the fundamental purposes of the United Nations and its family of agencies. We cannot, therefore, see how action against the crime of apartheid constitutes "politicization" of the agencies.

67. In this connection, I wish to inform the Assembly that I have received assurances from the IAEA that South Africa is no longer a member of any IAEA technical working groups. In the light of those assurances, the Assembly may wish to omit from draft resolution A/39/L.28 the last part of paragraph 31, which reads: "and, in particular, to exclude South Africa from all its technical working groups".

68. We cannot accept the argument that the exclusion of the Pretoria régime violates the principle of universality of the United Nations. That régime, resulting from a constitution denounced by the Security Council and the General Assembly as null and void, has no legitimacy whatsoever, and is rejected by the great majority of the people of South Africa. Acceptance of that régime as the voice of South Africa would be repugnant to the principle of universality.

69. I am aware also that some delegations express opposition to the recognition of the right of the oppressed people of South Africa to engage in armed struggle for liberation. Many of those delegations represent countries which attained their own independence by armed struggle and which, indeed, resorted to armed struggle against Nazi oppression. How, then, can they deny the right of armed struggle to the black majority in South Africa when the racist régime is resorting not only to arbitrary and ruthless repression but also to indiscriminate killings and massacres? We have pleaded again and again for a peaceful and just solution, and the General Assembly has on numerous occasions called for sanctions against the apartheid régime as the only effective means towards that end. When United Nations action is paralysed by the intransigence of some Powers and when the apartheid régime has escalated its violence, what other alternatives do the oppressed people have than to struggle by all available means?

70. We must place the blame for violence and conflict where it belongs—that is, on the apartheid régime—and press for effective sanctions against that régime as the only way to minimize that violence and eliminate that conflict.

71. Finally, some delegations express opposition to the naming of some countries which are sustaining the apartheid régime. In this connection, I should like to refer to the amendments proposed by the United States of America. It gives me no pleasure to express distress at the policies of the United States, with which my country, Nigeria, maintains, and seeks to maintain, friendly relations. But when we deal with the great moral challenge of apartheid, which affects the honour and dignity of the continent of Africa, we feel duty-bound to speak the truth without fear or favour.

72. The policy of so-called "constructive engagement" is diametrically opposed to the repeated appeals of this Assembly. It means more collaboration with the apartheid régime instead of sanctions against it. It means hostility to the national liberation movements instead of support for them. It means propaganda for inaction on the issue of apartheid.

73. Who can deny that this misguided policy of constructive engagement pursued by a great Power has encouraged the apartheid régime and thereby caused immense suffering to the black people in South Africa? The apartheid régime has expressed great satisfaction at that policy, while the oppressed majority has described it, in the words of Bishop Tutu, as immoral, evil and an unmitigated disaster for the black people.

74. We are encouraged that the conscience of the United States has been outraged by the fruits of that policy and that calls for meaningful action have come from leaders of both political parties and from churches, trade unions and other segments of society. I was gratified that the President of that great country has in the past few days condemned apartheid as repugnant. But even as he was speaking on Human Rights Day, the apartheid régime was charging six patriots with treason. Let me say that treason against a racist régime is not only an honour but a duty for African patriots, and we cannot stand idly by when the racists seek to sentence them to death.

75. The United States is a great Power and a leader of an alliance. It can make a crucial contribution to the elimination of apartheid. In his statement last month to the General Assembly, the representative of the United States said: "We in the United States have asked ourselves what more we can do . . . to work towards greater justice and peace in southern Africa." [69th meeting, para. 261.]

76. Let me offer some suggestions for their benefit. First, the United States should abandon the outdated and discredited policy of constructive engagement; secondly, it should prevail on the South African régime to release Nelson Mandela and other political prisoners and detainees; thirdly, it should prevail on the Botha régime to stop all forms of repression and political trials and instead embark on meaningful negotiations with the leaders of the oppressed people in South Africa; and lastly the United States should harmonize its policies with those of the overwhelming majority of States Members of the United Nations and join in the concerted action against apartheid. Only then can the obnoxious system of apartheid be eliminated. We are all waiting to see whether the United States Government will match President Reagan's words with action.

77. Members of the Special Committee have given very careful consideration to the amendments proposed by the United States of America in document A/39/L.43. We feel that a divisive vote on these amendments at this time, when the apartheid régime is escalating violence and oppression in South Africa, would be most unfortunate. With all due respect, therefore, I move, under rule 74 of the rules of procedure, that any debate on the United States amendments be adjourned and that the Assembly proceed to vote on the draft resolutions without delay.

78. Let me say from this rostrum that neither the Special Committee against Apartheid nor my country seeks confrontation with any Member State of the Organization. We seek consultations and dialogue with all Governments so that there can be effective and concerted action by the international community for the elimination of apartheid.

79. As Chairman of the Special Committee, I have had extensive consultations with a number of Western countries on a draft resolution to promote such action. I would like to express my great appreciation to the delegations concerned for their co-operation and commitment, and I hope that the draft resolution which will soon be introduced by my colleague, the representative of Sweden, will receive the widest support.

80. The second draft resolution which I have the honour to introduce, A/39/L.29, is on the programme of work of the Special Committee against Apartheid. I need hardly persuade the members of the Assembly of the vital role played by the Special Committee in its constant efforts to inform world public opinion of the situation in South Africa and to promote action by Governments, organizations and individuals in accordance with the relevant United Nations resolutions.

81. I have had the honour to serve as Chairman of the Special Committee this year, and I wish to express my gratitude to all those delegations which have commended the work of the Special Committee at a difficult and critical time for southern Africa.

82. I trust that the draft resolutions will receive unanimous support.

83. The PRESIDENT: I now call upon the representative of Barbados, Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against Apartheid in Sports, to introduce draft resolution A/39/L.31.

84. Mr. MAYCOCK (Barbados), Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against Apartheid in Sports: On the behalf of its sponsors, including my own delegation, I have the honour to introduce to the Assembly draft resolution A/39/L.31, entitled "Apartheid in sports".

85. This draft resolution is aimed at extending the mandate of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against Apartheid in Sports for another year, in order to permit the Committee to present the final draft to the General Assembly at its fortieth session. As is elaborated in the report of the Committee [A/39/36], progress has been achieved. This progress will I hope continue during the next year in order that the Committee may finalize its work.

86. The Committee intends to intensify further its contacts with Governments and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations with a view to overcoming any remaining obstacles.

87. The task before us is very important and deserves the support of the Assembly. The convention we are about to finalize will contribute to the international campaign to fight apartheid in sports and to ensure the isolation of the racist régime of South Africa from international sporting events. I sincerely hope that the Assembly will approve the draft resolution by an overwhelming majority.

88. My delegation submitted the amendment to this draft resolution, contained in document A/39/L.41. By that amendment the Assembly would request the Secretary-General to send the text of the revised draft convention and its amendments to all Member States for their comments and views. That proposal was contained in the recommendations of the Ad Hoc Committee, and it is considered important for the future work of the Committee. It is hoped that this amendment will be accepted and that comments will be submitted by 31 March 1985 in order to enable the Committee to conclude its work with dispatch.

89. Finally, next year we will celebrate the fortieth anniversary of the establishment of the United Nations. We are looking forward to presenting the draft convention to the Assembly as a contribution to the struggle against apartheid and racism on that important occasion.

90. The PRESIDENT: I now call upon the representative of the Lao People's Democratic Republic to introduce draft resolution A/39/L.30.

91. Mr. SAIGNAVONGS (Lao People's Democratic Republic) (interpretation from French): On behalf of the 32 delegations which sponsored it, including my own delegation, it is my honour to introduce to the Assembly draft resolution A/39/L.30, entitled "Relations between Israel and South Africa".

92. The collaboration between Israel and South Africa needs no further proof. In its report [A/39/22/Add.1] the Special Committee against Apartheid has stressed that that collaboration is constantly increasing and becoming more and more important in all fields, particularly the military and nuclear fields. This is very disturbing for neighbouring African countries, particularly the front-line States, in the light of the aggressive and hegemonistic nature of the racist régime of Pretoria.

93. The Special Committee has furthermore stressed that Israeli-South African relations are becoming closer and are extending to the bantustans, entities that the international community has rejected because they are merely instruments of the apartheid policy of Pretoria.

94. We all know that, despite United Nations decisions and almost unanimous condemnation by the international community, South Africa is persisting in its apartheid policies, continuing its illegal occupation of Namibia and pursuing its aggressive policies against its neighbours.

95. Israel's collaboration, in addition to the collaboration of some Western countries, particularly the "constructive engagement" of the United States Government, which is linked with Israel by a strategic co-operation agreement, merely strengthens Pretoria's position and encourages it arrogantly to pursue its criminal apartheid policy and to persist in its intransigence.

96. At various international meetings and during the debate in plenary meetings of the General Assembly on the policies of apartheid of the Government of South Africa, an overwhelming majority of delegations have expressed their indignation about this collaboration and condemned it because it poses a threat to the peace and stability of southern Africa and to international peace and security. Therefore, in formulating this draft resolution, the sponsors have taken into account, on the one hand, the general feeling expressed during those deliberations and, on the other, ideas already accepted by the General Assembly last year in resolution 38/39 F.

97. In other words, the wording of this draft resolution is identical to that of resolution 38/39 F, except for the addition of the following two new points. First, the third preambular paragraph takes note of the declaration and resolutions of the Conference of Arab Solidarity with the Struggle for Liberation in Southern Africa, held at Tunis from 7 to 9 August 1984 [A/39/450, annex], in which more than 130 delegations from various countries and international organizations participated. Secondly, paragraph 1 states that the General Assembly commends the Special Committee against Apartheid for publicizing the growing relations between Israel and South Africa and promoting public awareness of the grave dangers of the alliance between those two countries as regards international peace and security.

98. The sponsors hope that the draft resolution, like that of last year, will be adopted by the General Assembly without difficulty and without any reservations.

99. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of India, who will introduce draft resolution A/39/L.32.

100. Mr. KRISHNAN (India): On behalf of the sponsors, I have the honour to introduce to the Assembly for consideration and adoption draft resolution A/39/L.32, entitled "Public information and public action against apartheid".

101. The first Prime Minister of India, Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru, stated in the Indian Parliament in 1958:

> "In South Africa, it is the deliberate, acknowledged and loudly proclaimed policy of the Government itself to maintain this segregation and racial discrimination. This makes South Africa's case unique in the world. It is a policy with which obviously no person and no country which believes in the Charter of the United Nations can ever compromise, because it uproots almost everything the modern world stands for and considers worthwhile, whether it is our ideas of democracy or human dignity."

102. That the policy of apartheid should persist in this day and age is, to most people, quite unthinkable. It is indeed incredible that a Government should continue, in spite of almost universal condemnation, to persist in the institutionalized practices of apartheid. Today, on the eve of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations, we are no nearer the objective declared decades ago to be rid of this evil. In fact attempts are being made further to entrench the apartheid system in South Africa, along with efforts to break the international isolation of South Africa. Rarely has oppression been so well organized or betrayal made to appear so respectable.

103. Information must be used effectively in the struggle against the apartheid régime to convince freedom-loving people all over the world that apartheid cannot be reformed; it must be ended. In this context, it is absolutely imperative that the international community be kept informed about developments in South Africa by continuously exposing the evil and cruelty of the apartheid régime and correspondingly ensuring concerted public action against the apartheid régime which would help and encourage all those who are struggling for freedom in South Africa.

104. The text of the draft resolution needs no elucidation. The international community is well aware that public information and public involvement can be used as a very effective means for the elimination of apartheid. In view of the enormous resources of the apartheid régime and its collaborators that are devoted to nefarious propaganda, it is essential that the Secretary-General take all appropriate steps to ensure full co-operation by the Department of Public Information, UNESCO and all United Nations offices and agencies with the Special Committee and the Centre against Apartheid. The Department of Public Information, in particular, should ensure the widest dissemination of information on the activities of and the crimes committed by the apartheid régime. There is an appeal to all Governments, information media, non-governmental organizations, trade unions, religious bodies, individuals, intellectuals, artists, athletes and public leaders to arouse the conscience of the world against apartheid and to intensify further the international campaign for the release of Nelson Mandela and all other South African political prisoners and detainees.

105. In order to strengthen the aforementioned efforts, the Special Committee against Apartheid and the Centre against Apartheid are encouraged to intensify their activities designed to inform world public opinion of the situation in South Africa and promote public action in support of the just struggle of the oppressed people and the objectives of the United Nations. In order that this task may be carried out effectively, an appeal is made to all Governments to contribute generously to the Trust Fund for Publicity against Apartheid and to information activities of non-governmental organizations engaged in programmes against apartheid.

106. On behalf of the sponsors, including my own delegation, I express the sincere hope that the draft resolution will receive the unanimous support of all the delegations present here representing countries which cherish freedom, equality and human dignity.

107. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Denmark, who wishes to introduce draft resolution A/39/L.33.

108. Mr. BIERRING (Denmark): On behalf of the sponsors, I have the honour to introduce draft resolution A/39/L.33, entitled "United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa".

109. The principal objective of the United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa, which the General Assembly established in 1965, is to alleviate the suffering caused by the policy of apartheid of the Government of South Africa and to assist the victims of apartheid. The Fund is made up of voluntary contributions from States, organizations and individuals. Since its inception, the Fund has been able to give assistance for the following purposes: first, legal assistance to persons persecuted under the repressive and discriminatory legislation of South Africa; secondly, relief to such persons and their dependants; thirdly, the education of such persons and their dependants; fourthly, relief for refugees from South Africa; and, fifthly, relief and assistance to persons persecuted under the repressive and discriminatory legislation in Namibia.

110. The fight against apartheid is one of the few issues on which the international community stands united. We are gravely concerned about the continued and increased repression against opponents of apartheid and racial discrimination in South Africa. Increased humanitarian assistance to those persecuted under repressive and discriminatory legislation is essential.

111. The international community has responded positively to the growing need for such assistance. However, there is a continuing need for contributions, and we would like to appeal to all Member States to contribute generously to the Fund. Furthermore, the sponsors hope that the General Assembly will again this year demonstrate its solidarity with the victims of apartheid by adopting this draft resolution unanimously.

112. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the representative of Sweden, who will introduce draft resolution A/39/L.36.

113. Mr. FERM (Sweden): I have the honour to introduce draft resolution A/39/L.36, entitled "Concerted international action for the elimination of apartheid", which is sponsored by 22 countries.

114. This is a new draft resolution on apartheid. During previous years my delegation had the honour to introduce a draft resolution on investments in South Africa. There is now urgent need for increased and effective pressure on South Africa. In this new draft resolution we call for such action against the background of a situation in South Africa of grave concern to us. We note in particular the recent killings, arbitrary arrests and detention of members of mass organizations opposing apartheid. We consider that the so-called reforms in South Africa have had the effect of further entrenching apartheid. We are convinced that the use of force by the South African authorities will lead to ever-increasing resistance by the oppressed people in South Africa and to increased tension, which will have far-reaching consequences for southern Africa and the world.

115. While in this resolution the Security Council is once again urged to consider without delay effective mandatory sanctions, the sponsors also appeal to all States, pending such action, to consider unilateral measures from an extensive range of options in such fields as investments, financial loans, trade promotion, military and nuclear collaboration. These would, in our opinion, be effective measures to bring about a peaceful solution.

Mr. Lusaka (Zambia) resumed the Chair.

116. Furthermore, the sponsors wish to express their solidarity with all those who at great sacrifice legitimately struggle for a non-racial, democratic society and for lasting peace in South Africa. We consequently appeal for increased assistance to all those individuals, liberation movements and States that are the victims of the oppressive and aggressive policies of apartheid.

117. The draft resolution is the joint effort of primarily some African and Western Group States, including the five Nordic countries. The objective of our joint effort has been to present a draft resolution that addresses the wide spectrum of issues involved in the question of apartheid in South Africa. We have sought to approach this in a firm but at the same time constructive way. When formulating the operative part of the resolution, we have also been guided by the desire to ensure, in an unambiguous way, broad support from a wide range of countries for this draft resolution. Such broad support would be a clear signal to South Africa that the world community at large considers that the apartheid system has no place in today's world and that we are prepared to take concrete measures to bring about its abolishment.

118. The draft resolution now introduced should be seen as a new approach and as a concerted international effort to bring about an end to the apartheid system through peaceful means before that approach is too late. In this spirit, and against the background of a deteriorating situation in South Africa, we commend this draft resolution for adoption by the General Assembly.

119. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the representative of the United States of America, who wishes to introduce amendments to draft resolutions A/39/L.28 and L.30.

120. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): Given the universally shared opposition of all Member States to apartheid, we deeply regret and strongly deplore the fact that again this year unfair, unjustified and hostile references to the United States are contained in the draft resolutions before us. We have proposed amendments to these texts to delete these references which violate long-established practices of the United Nations and which contravene the very spirit of concern for fair and just treatment that is the foundation of our common opposition to the unjust apartheid system.

121. The issue posed by the amendments we propose has nothing to do with the issue of justice in South Africa. It has everything to do with the issue of justice in the General Assembly. It has nothing to do with our common condemnation and abhorrence for the abusive treatment of black South Africans by the South African Government. It has everything to do with whether or not the Assembly means to encourage and perpetuate abusive treatment of individual Member States. The same sense of justice that fuels our outrage against the abuses of apartheid should be applied here in the relations among Member States. As justice should be for all in South Africa, so it must be for all in the General Assembly.

122. As we are unanimous in our view that injustice in South Africa must end, so we must be clear in our belief that justice in the international community begins here in the General Assembly, among these united nations. We appeal to all members of the General Assembly to let that simple sense of justice govern their actions today. We ask them to cast their votes in favour of our amendments. We ask them to vote against any manoeuvre that would deprive the General Assembly of an opportunity to declare its unequivocal support for basic fairness in its own proceedings and resolutions. We ask them to take a firm stand that will make clear to all the world that justice cannot be credibly preached unless all efforts are made to assure that it is consistently practised here, now, in this body.

123. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Nigeria on a point of order.

124. Mr. GARBA (Nigeria): Nigeria feels that a divisive vote on these amendments at this time, when we all know that the apartheid régime is escalating violence and repression in South Africa, would be most unfortunate.

125. I move that no action be taken at this time on the United States amendments and that the Assembly proceed to vote on the draft resolutions as presented.

126. The PRESIDENT: The representative of Nigeria has moved, in accordance with the terms of rule 74 of the rules of procedure, that no action be taken on the amendments submitted by the representative of the United States of America. Rule 74 reads:

> "During the discussion of any matter, a representative may move the adjournment of the debate on the item under discussion. In addition to the proposer of the motion, two representatives may speak in favour of, and two against, the motion, after which the motion shall be immediately put to the vote."

127. In accordance with the motion proposed by Nigeria, if the motion is carried no further action will be taken by the Assembly with respect to the amendments contained in documents A/39/L.43 and L.44.

128. Does any representative wish to speak for or against the motion by Nigeria?

129. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): The United States delegation objects in the strongest possible terms to the motion to avoid discussion and vote on our amendments.

130. There are situations where it is undoubtedly in the interests of the Assembly not to take a decision on a particular subject, but there are clearly other situations in which this body has an interest in the consideration of a question.

131. We believe our amendments are proper subjects for discussion, debate and decision. They are not an attempt to solve long-standing disputes by indirect means, but instead are entirely germane to the proper consideration of the texts before us and to a proper affirmation of our fundamental principles and procedures.

132. In these circumstances, where the United States delegation has put forward directly relevant amendments in an effort to delete clear and hostile references to us, the effort to gag debate can be seen only as part and parcel of the same objectionable injustice which our amendments are meant to counter. Fundamental considerations of fairness should allow a country so mentioned and so abused to ask that the General Assembly declare itself on this matter.

133. We therefore hope that even those who prefer to see these draft resolutions remain as they are will be prepared to allow the Assembly its right to consider the question fully. In addition, we ask that a recorded vote be taken on this motion.

134. The PRESIDENT: Does any other representative wish to speak for or against the motion by Nigeria?

135. I see none. I now put to the vote the motion of the representative of Nigeria, that no action be taken on the amendments proposed by the representative of the United States of America. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Bahrain, Benin, Botswana, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Congo, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Ethiopia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Hungary, India, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mali, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Poland, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Luxembourg, Mauritius, Netherlands, New Zealand, Niger, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Philippines, Portugal, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Togo, Turkey, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Argentina, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Bolivia, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Burma, Cyprus, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Indonesia, Jamaica, Kenya, Lebanon, Liberia, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Nepal, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, Rwanda, Senegal, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Venezuela.

The motion was rejected by 56 votes to 50, with 28 abstentions.

136. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran on a point of order.

137. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): My delegation's understanding is that the issue under consideration is apartheid. The resolutions against apartheid are so many, and there is only one reason for the sanctions against the régime of South Africa and that is apartheid.

138. Apartheid has rightly occupied the time of the Assembly for years, and the South African régime has been expelled from the General Assembly on the charge of apartheid. Therefore apartheid, to my understanding, is a very important issue, if not the most important issue of all.

139. It being the most important issue, on the basis of Article 18 of the Charter of the United Nations, my delegation requests a two-thirds majority, and I hope that this even-handedness will be maintained, because yesterday's issue was not any different from today's issue.

140. The PRESIDENT: Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter reads:

> "Decisions of the General Assembly on important questions shall be made by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting. These questions shall include: recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security, the election of the non-permanent members of the Security Council, the election of the members of the Economic and Social Council, the election of members of the Trusteeship Council in accordance with paragraph 1(c) of Article 86, the admission of new Members to the United Nations, the suspension of the rights and privileges of membership, the expulsion of Members, questions relating to the operation of the trusteeship system, and budgetary questions."

141. Rule 85 of the General Assembly rules of procedure reads:

> "Decisions of the General Assembly on questions other than those provided for in rule 83, including the determination of additional categories of questions to be decided by a two-thirds majority, shall be made by a majority of the members present and voting."

142. I call on the representative of the United States of America to speak on a point of order.

143. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): The United States opposes, and opposes unequivocally and strongly, the proposal by the representative of Iran to require a two-thirds majority for the adoption of the United States amendments to the draft resolutions on apartheid. There is no provision in the rules of procedure that would call for any special majority for resolutions dealing with the subject of apartheid. The procedural situation is entirely different from that which the General Assembly considered yesterday [97th meeting] when it considered the Namibia resolutions and amendments. There is a special rule on the required Namibia resolutions, that is, that such resolutions and amendments require a two-thirds vote, but there is no special rule concerning resolutions on apartheid.

144. The only way that a special two-thirds majority could be required for apartheid texts is through such a motion as that which has been made by the Iranian delegation under Article 18, paragraph 3, of the Charter and rule 85 of the rules of procedure.

145. We vigorously oppose this motion. Such a motion could only have as its purpose an effort to deny the United States a fair vote on the United States amendments to these resolutions. Such a motion would be an abuse of the rules, for partisan and unfair objectives. None of the countries that might support such a motion has ever before suggested that anything other than a simple majority is needed to adopt apartheid resolutions or amendments thereto. The effort to invoke the "important question" technique has no justification in this case.

146. In addition, let me reiterate that, as I stated in introducing these amendments, the issue before us is not the issue of our common condemnation and abhorrence of apartheid. The issue before us is a fundamental issue of fairness to the United States, a fundamental issue of whether or not the General Assembly intends to affirm its basic treatment of the principles of fair and civil treatment in its deliberations.

147. We urge all members to join with us in voting against any motion to depart from the simple majority test that has traditionally been applied in these instances.

148. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran to speak on a point of order.

149. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): I just want to correct a very, very small—let us say, mistake—on the part of the representative of the United States. The issue is not fairness to the United States; the issue is fairness towards the continued support of the United States for apartheid. If people want to be fair to that, that would be unfair. From our point of view, the issue is still apartheid, and I think the General Assembly is the master of its own rules. Therefore we ask—I request—the Assembly to decide whether apartheid is an important issue or not.

150. The PRESIDENT: Does any other representative wish to speak for or against the motion as proposed by the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran? There appears to be none. I shall therefore ask the Assembly to take a decision. I shall put to the vote the motion as proposed by the representative of Iran that apartheid is an important question.

151. I call on the representative of the United States to speak on a point of order.

152. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): We have asked that a recorded vote be taken on this motion.

153. The PRESIDENT: Indeed, a recorded vote was requested.

154. I call on the representative of Ireland on a point of order.

155. Mr. McDONAGH (Ireland): I would welcome some clarification of the matter that we are being asked to vote upon. Are we being asked to vote that apartheid is an important question, or are we being asked to vote that resolutions or amendments on apartheid should be decided by a two-thirds majority?

156. The PRESIDENT: I shall ask the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran to clarify the matter.

157. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): I should like to reiterate the exact wording of the motion. It is as follows: Is apartheid an important issue or not?

158. We believe apartheid is an important issue; we believe apartheid has already been recognized as a crime against humanity. We hope that the General Assembly will agree with us that apartheid is an important issue. I hope it is understood.

159. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the United States of America to speak on a point of order.

160. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): If I may address the issue that has been raised by our colleague from Ireland, we believe that it is obvious that in the history of our treatment of the apartheid question it has never before been considered an important question requiring a two-thirds majority, within the meaning of the rules on that issue. It is clear that in this instance what motivates the suggestion is not a question of whether apartheid is important or whether the General Assembly's deliberations on that question are important. That is obviously the case. What motivates this move at this time is clearly a political desire to deprive the United States of a fair decision on the amendments which we have placed before the Assembly. We believe that it is crucial that the members of the Assembly should not be confused about this issue. The issue is not the issue of the importance of apartheid, for clearly throughout the history of our treatment of this question we have understood apartheid to be an important issue to which we all devote a great deal of our time, attention and effort, both in this hall and elsewhere. The question is a basic issue of fairness and whether we consider the affirmation of those important questions and principles of fairness to be a necessary and absolutely indispensable part of our work here.

161. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Democratic Yemen to speak on a point of order.

162. Mr. AL-ASHTAL (Democratic Yemen): If the delegation of the United States thinks that apartheid is an important question, then I do not think that we have a problem. All resolutions regarding apartheid will have to be voted on the basis of Article 18 of the Charter, by a two-thirds majority. I have asked to speak in order to explain my understanding of the Iranian motion. I believe that we are on the verge of a very important decision of the General Assembly, one which is similar to the very important decision taken in 1954 regarding Namibia [resolution 844 (IX)]. I therefore believe that the wording of the motion is exactly in consonance with special rule F of annex III regarding Namibia of the General Assembly rules of procedure, but in this case it has to do with apartheid. Therefore our understanding of the motion is as follows: decisions of the General Assembly on questions relating to reports and petitions concerning apartheid shall be regarded as important questions within the meaning of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations.

163. I have found it necessary to explain this point so that there should be no confusion after the intervention of the representative of Ireland.

164. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the United States on a point of order.

165. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): I think it is clear to all the extent to which some will go in order to attempt to distort the procedures, positions, principles and traditions of this General Assembly in order to achieve their own narrow and vindictive ends.

166. I believe that the issue before us is quite clear. It is not an issue that can be decided by attempting to apply one rule to a situation in which that rule is not applicable, violating therefore the very fundamental principle that we should not change the rules in the middle of the game. I believe that it is important to keep in mind this very fundamental principle of fairness, since what is at stake in an issue of this sort is not simply a substantive question with regard to our deliberations here today. At stake in an issue of this sort are the very foundations for the possibility of what we do here, whether we can come together and, despite our differences, discuss, disagree, but always know that there will be a basic civility and an acknowledgement of the fundamental rules of justice. If that is not to be the case today, if that is not to be the case in the General Assembly, my delegation believes that this point of order raises very serious questions and casts a very serious shadow over the future of the Organization as an open forum for open discussion and exchange and for true and fair consideration of the issues brought before us.

167. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the United Kingdom on a point of order.

168. Mr. MILES (United Kingdom): Since a number of different points of view have been expressed on this proposal already in this impromptu debate, I think that it would be helpful to the Assembly if you, Mr. President, could give us a ruling on the procedural implications of the decision we are being invited to take, both for the present issue, the motion which we are being asked to vote on later this morning, and for other future questions concerning apartheid.

169. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran on a point of order.

170. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): Although the pros and cons on the issue have been given, and although several delegations have spoken on this matter, the views have not been very different: there are only two views. Although they worded it differently, some representatives want to indicate that apartheid is not an important matter. My delegation believes that apartheid is a very important matter in exactly the same sense as that mentioned by the representative of Yemen. As is obvious to all, the peace and security of Africa have been and will remain threatened simply because of the policies of apartheid.

171. I therefore propose that the debate on this matter be adjourned and that my motion be put to a vote.

172. The PRESIDENT: It is my understanding that the General Assembly is being called upon to determine that the question of apartheid and all resolutions and amendments relating thereto are to be decided by a two-thirds majority of representatives present and voting under rule 85 of the rules of procedure. That is my understanding with regard to this motion that the Assembly is being called upon to determine. I hope I have answered the representative of the United Kingdom.

173. I call on the representative of the Congo on a point of order.

174. Mr. GAYAMA (Congo) (interpretation from French): I do not know whether your ruling, Mr. President, has put an end to the debate, but my delegation would like to stress its view that this is more than a procedural matter. If we were to decide in this hall whether apartheid is an important question or not, my response would be a positive one, because it is an African—indeed, a universal—position.

175. The Assembly has declared apartheid a crime against humanity; that is the least than can be said. To take a principled stand today on whether or not apartheid should be considered an important question is to commit ourselves totally. Rather, we should limit ourselves to declaring that apartheid is a very important issue, regardless of the procedural aspects that may be invoked in this hall.

176. The PRESIDENT: We shall now proceed to the vote on the motion by the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran. Let me repeat my understanding of the motion: The General Assembly is being called upon to determine that the question of apartheid and all resolutions and amendments relating thereto are to be decided by a two-thirds majority of representatives present and voting under rule 85. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Chad, China, Congo, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Ecuador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guinea, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Central African Republic, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, Dominica, Fiji, Finland, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Paraguay, Portugal, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Spain, Sweden, Togo, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Argentina, Belize, Burma, Cyprus, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Gabon, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Ireland, Jamaica, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Venezuela.

The motion was adopted by 81 votes to 33, with 18 abstentions.[3]

177. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives who wish to speak in explanation of vote.

178. Mr. de PINIÉS (Spain) (interpretation from Spanish): I should like to point out to the Assembly that for my delegation, apartheid is of course an important issue. What in the view of our delegation is not important is the submission of amendments, that those amendments should be adopted by a two-thirds vote, for if someone decides that a sentence in a draft resolution should be submitted to amendment, it means that that could be deleted if a two-thirds vote were required.

179. Mr. PFIRTER (Argentina) (interpretation from Spanish): My delegation has no doubt that apartheid is an extremely important question. That is why we supported the adoption in the Security Council of urgent, binding, wide-ranging sanctions against South Africa. None the less, on this occasion my delegation cannot fail to note the relation between the fact that the Assembly is asked to recognize apartheid as an important issue for the purposes of a two-thirds vote and the fact that approval of the motion means that a Member State is being deprived of the right to have its amendments put to a vote in the Assembly.

180. For this reason, because we cannot fail to ignore the fact that this is a completely politicized vote, my delegation abstained.

181. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): I shall begin my very brief point of order again with the name of God. I prayed to God that my motion would win the support of the General Assembly. I congratulate you, Sir, on this victory that was won under your presidency. I should like to request only that you reiterate your understanding, because some of the explanations of vote are creating ambiguity even for me.

182. So we decided that it is not an important issue psychologically; it is an important issue in the sense that apartheid and all resolutions and amendments related to it require a two-thirds majority. My motion does not prevent anybody from presenting any amendment or motion. Indeed, all amendments, motions and draft resolutions can be presented. The only issue that has been decided upon is that they will be decided by a two-thirds majority. That is all. There is no deprivation for anybody.

183. The PRESIDENT: I shall read out my understanding on which the General Assembly has voted. I said, a moment ago: "It is my understanding that the General Assembly is being called upon to determine that the question of apartheid and all resolutions and amendments relating thereto are to be decided by a two-thirds majority of representatives present and voting under rule 85." That was my understanding before I put the motion to the vote, and the General Assembly has now taken a decision. I shall continue calling on those who wish to speak in explanation of vote on the motion.

184. Mr. ALBÁN-HOLGUÍN (Colombia) (interpretation from Spanish): There can be no doubt that my delegation has always considered apartheid to be a question of the highest importance. We have always supported peoples in their struggle against apartheid. On the question of Namibia, we have always supported and encouraged actions aimed at the attainment of independence for that country.

185. As you explained, Sir, this is an issue related to a vote, not to the substance of the issue of apartheid, but voting procedure, and that is how my delegation understood it. For that reason, our vote should be understood exclusively as a reference to the system that will be used for voting on draft resolutions and amendments related to apartheid.

186. It seemed to me inappropriate that issues related to apartheid should be taken out of the general norms applying to United Nations resolutions, because that can turn against those of us who are waging the struggle against apartheid. There will be new obstructions in the way of draft resolutions that attempt to eliminate that crime. I believe that today in the Assembly we have made a mistake in approving this motion for a two-thirds vote.

187. The PRESIDENT: I see by the clock that it is past the hour. I have a long list of speakers before me on the motion just adopted by the General Assembly. It appears as I look at the list of speakers before the vote on the draft resolutions just introduced this morning that what is being said may be repeated when representatives are called upon to explain their vote before the vote on the draft resolutions. For our deliberations to run smoothly, I appeal to the Assembly that perhaps we could defer our explanations of vote on the decision that has just been taken on the motion by Iran until such time as we come to explain the votes either before or after the vote. That is the appeal I am making to the General Assembly. The Assembly may reject my appeal, since it is master of its own decisions. It is past the hour, and I thought members might wish to go for lunch and then explain in stronger terms their positions with regard to the item under discussion.

188. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): My delegation does not propose to take a position on the appeal you have just made. However, we do think that it would be important as members think about that appeal to consider the fact that the decision we have just taken, procedural although it may have seemed, was a decision that touched upon the most fundamental principles of our relationships with one another here and of the possible further usefulness of this body as a forum for fair and just discussion.

189. It does seem to us that an issue of this kind is perhaps somewhat more important than our lunches. Perhaps not, since perhaps the attitude expressed in the vote today is one towards the character of the Organization that might suggest that lunch might be of higher priority to many. We do not necessarily subscribe to that view, and that is why we fought against this motion and in favour of certain fundamental principles of fairness.

190. We believe that it is important, given the fact that we had decided such an important issue, for Member States to go on record with their understanding of why they chose to violate those procedures, why they chose to violate those principles or, on the contrary, why they had the courage to stand up for them.

191. However, as you have suggested and as has been demonstrated today, this General Assembly is indeed the master of its own fate. It will also determine what the character of that fate will be, and I believe that it has taken a step in the wrong direction in that regard today.

The meeting rose at 1.10 p.m.

NOTES

[1] The delegation of Colombia subsequently informed the Secretariat that it had intended to vote in favour of the draft resolution.

[2] The delegation of Colombia subsequently informed the Secretariat that it had intended to vote in favour of the draft resolutions.

[3] The delegations of Egypt and Yemen subsequently informed the Secretariat that they had intended to vote in favour of the motion and the delegation of Malaysia, that it had intended not to participate in the vote.

United Nations

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

THIRTY-NINTH SESSION

Official Records

99th PLENARY MEETING

Thursday, 13 December 1984,
at 3.35 p.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

AGENDA ITEM 31

Policies of Apartheid of the Government of South Africa (continued):

(a) Report of the Special Committee against Apartheid;

(b) Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against Apartheid in Sports;

(c) Report of the Secretary-General

1. The PRESIDENT: May I remind representatives that when this morning's plenary meeting was adjourned, we had heard several explanations of vote on the motion presented by the delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran. The following speakers remain to be heard on that subject: Ecuador, Chile, Saint Lucia, Uruguay, Yemen, France, Bolivia, Ivory Coast and Ireland. I should like to request that other representatives wishing to speak this afternoon in explanation of their vote on that motion should kindly advise the Secretariat as soon as possible so that the General Assembly may proceed with its work in an orderly manner.

2. Mr. ALBORNOZ (Ecuador) (interpretation from Spanish): This morning, according to your ruling, Mr. President, we were asked to vote on whether we should consider apartheid as an important question and whether all the draft resolutions or amendments on that question should be subject to the provisions of rule 85 of the General Assembly rules of procedure which require a two-thirds majority for adoption; that is, there have been votes on two different matters.

3. The delegation of Ecuador voted in favour of the motion because obviously apartheid is an important question, and, as everybody knows, it has been declared a crime against humanity. But it was not our intention in voting this way to agree that any Member State be deprived of the right to have its proposals accepted by a simple majority. An exclusion of this kind might have serious implications for the democratic stability of the world Organization and for the principle of free debate, which all of us should defend, support and strengthen.

4. Mr. INFANTE (Chile) (interpretation from Spanish): Chile has always felt that respect for human beings without any discrimination as to race is an essential principle of life among men and a sine qua non for the establishment of justice and equality. For this reason, in our constitutional and legal texts we give maximum importance to rejection of racial discrimination and, consequently, of apartheid. My country is absolutely convinced that the struggle against racial discrimination is the most important issue in which the United Nations is involved.

5. My delegation believes that in the vote which took place this morning the issue was not whether the rejection of apartheid was of major or minor importance, for if that were so, there is no question but that we would have voted against the universal scourge of racial discrimination. Our understanding was that this morning the Assembly was consulted on a procedural matter, and our vote was cast in accordance with that understanding. We regret that at the beginning of the vote, without prior notice, a matter was raised which lent itself to a dual interpretation, and it was a matter of major importance in respect of which Chile, as already stated, has a position which does not lend itself to doubt. Furthermore, my delegation fears that the procedure established, rather than assisting the struggle against apartheid in the future, might be harmful to it.

6. Mr. FLEMMING (Saint Lucia): It will take increased and sustained world-wide pressure finally to eliminate the scourge of apartheid from our midst.

7. While the General Assembly remains perpetually seized of the question of apartheid, domestic anti-apartheid movements in various countries have historically been subject to cyclical, indeed even episodic, patterns. Today at a time when once again there is a rising crescendo of anger against apartheid, the General Assembly, by the callous and politically inspired motion adopted earlier today, can only alienate many of the ardent supporters of the anti-apartheid movement and therefore hasten the deflation of that now ballooning movement, which is finally beginning to show signs of some permanency. That the motion was politically motivated and without serious concern for the people of South Africa, who continue to labour under the crushing boot of apartheid, is evidenced by the fact that resolutions on apartheid have traditionally been adopted by the Assembly with more than a two-thirds majority. Hence there was no need to adopt such an immutable rule.

8. The motion has created a de jure condition of literary intransigence vis-à-vis apartheid resolutions and in essence has given the final word on anti-apartheidism to a small and select few whose own actions often belie their words.

9. Further, in these times of mounting foreign policy pragmatism, my delegation fears that the motion adopted will force some States which heretofore eagerly supported anti-apartheid resolutions to reassess their position. For those reasons, my delegation did not support the motion.

10. Mr. LASARTE (Uruguay) (interpretation from Spanish): My delegation's vote on the second procedural debate with regard to the requirement of a two-thirds majority in the General Assembly on the policy of apartheid should be interpreted strictly within the context of the proposal, meaning that it was a procedural motion proposed in very special circumstances. On the substance of the subject, my delegation has already stated and states again today, clearly, that it categorically rejects the policies of apartheid and opposes any form of discrimination; within the international community there is no doubt that there is a consensus on rejection of such policies.

11. Mr. LOUET (France) (interpretation from French): The French delegation is well aware of the importance of the question of apartheid. Indeed, on many occasions we have condemned the policies of apartheid in all its aspects; but my delegation could not agree to the procedure followed a short time ago.

12. Article 18 of the Charter of the United Nations gives the list of important questions justifying a two-thirds majority. In our view, it is clear that the question put to the Assembly relating to the amendment presented by the United States was not part of this list.

13. Coming directly after the failure of the motion to prevent the Assembly from dealing with those amendments, the Iranian motion was obviously aimed at obstructing the adoption of the American amendments.

14. We regret that the Assembly deemed it appropriate to accept that diversion of its proper procedure.

15. Mrs. CARRASCO MONJE (Bolivia) (interpretation from Spanish): The question of apartheid has always received much attention from the Republic of Bolivia. For this reason, we have supported all resolutions condemning this horrible crime against humanity. Consequently, in the voting this morning, my delegation cast an affirmative vote on the understanding that we were reiterating the basic substance of our condemnation of apartheid.

16. If the vote had been as indicated on the voting paper, my delegation would have abstained. But, because it is difficult to draw a qualitative distinction between substance and procedure in the question of apartheid, as the President of the Assembly said, my delegation voted in keeping with the traditional position of Bolivia, which is to reject all forms of racial discrimination, in particular apartheid.

17. My delegation would also like to make it clear that we respect and support the right of any delegation to introduce amendments to draft resolutions being considered by the General Assembly.

18. Mr. ESSY (Ivory Coast) (interpretation from French): Is apartheid an important question or is it not? Can such a question even be put to an African State? I do not think so, for the reply is obvious.

19. The Ivory Coast voted against the Iranian motion because this was merely a procedural ploy to bind the hands of certain States, with obvious political aims.

20. The Ivory Coast is an African country, and as blacks we have suffered more than any other continent from the humiliating effects of apartheid. In this complex, serious problem, where entire populations are daily suffering physically, we are not trying here to adopt resolutions just to ease our conscience. We are trying to produce solutions, and for this reason we are prepared to examine any possibility of moving closer as soon as possible to the common goal, which is the complete elimination of apartheid in South Africa.

21. In reality, the draft amendments which gave rise to this ad hoc procedure do not in most cases basically change the substance of the problems dealt with in the draft resolutions on apartheid. In the resolutions adopted by the Assembly, the demand for the withdrawal of foreign troops, instead of including the name of the great Power, which everyone knows, changes absolutely nothing as regards substance.

22. That is why my delegation will consider all amendments before the Assembly in the light of the substantive issue involved.

23. Mr. McDONAGH (Ireland): My delegation abstained in the vote on the motion before us this morning relating to the adoption of draft resolutions and decisions on apartheid by a two-thirds majority.

24. We felt that we could not vote for a motion in terms related to rule 85 of the rules of procedure, the obvious effect of which would be to introduce a voting criterion clearly directed towards particular draft amendments.

25. Yet we did not feel we could vote against the motion, since it was so clearly indicated in the Assembly that it was being related to the issue of whether apartheid was an important question, as it undoubtedly is. In the circumstances, we abstained. We felt that we simply could not indicate our positions on two separate issues by one positive or one negative vote.

26. Mr. BANGO BANGO (Zaire) (interpretation from French): Zaire has no doubt that apartheid is an important question because apartheid—that policy condemned by all countries, that policy which the General Assembly has called a crime against humanity, that policy which debases the black man and reduces him to the level of an animal—has frequently been condemned by the Assembly, and South Africa, the promoter of these policies, has been expelled from the Assembly.

27. Obviously then, Zaire could only vote in favour of the question whether apartheid is or is not an important question. But Zaire is also of the opinion that certain passages in the various draft resolutions before the Assembly are inappropriate and unfair to certain States Members.

28. The condemnation found therein tends to be selective. Zaire believes that certain countries should not be favoured over others in the General Assembly. It is not a question of the degree of estimation of the gravity of co-operation with the heinous apartheid régime.

29. In the resolutions we have adopted on this subject, it is nowhere suggested that it is appropriate to assess the degree of co-operation of a country with South Africa. For this reason, Zaire, although it voted in favour of the motion, wishes to say that the amendments submitted were not irrelevant and it was unfair to the country that submitted them not to consider them. Selective condemnation hardly contributes to the common struggle against apartheid.

30. Mr. AKYOL (Turkey) (interpretation from French): The views of my Government on the policy of apartheid and racial discrimination in South Africa were set forth in detail in the statement we made on 20 November in the General Assembly [68th meeting].

31. On that occasion, we reaffirmed our commitment to efforts being made to eliminate that policy. That is why my delegation voted this morning in favour of the motion determining the political importance of that problem.

32. However, my delegation would have preferred this decision not to have been taken in connection with certain amendments, all of which deserved consideration and a vote in the Assembly. It would have been more fair, and certainly more democratic, not to use procedural techniques which have somewhat distorted the outcome of a debate that began on 20 November last [ibid.], well before this morning's motion.

33. Mr. KNIPPING-VICTORIA (Dominican Republic) (interpretation from Spanish): I am grateful for this opportunity to explain my vote on the motion adopted by the Assembly this morning.

34. First of all, I should like solemnly to reiterate the constant and unswerving position of the Dominican Republic in condemning and rejecting the policies of apartheid, which we consider an affront to the conscience of mankind and a crime against humanity.

35. For the Government of the Dominican Republic, apartheid is a very important question; there can be no doubt about that in this hall. We would also state that this unequivocal position of principle is the very essence of our sense of nationhood. Our country, after all, is made up of a mixture of different races, and we are very proud of that.

36. The Dominican Republic abstained in the voting in the belief that the issue of whether apartheid was an important question and needed a two-thirds majority was procedural and emotions were running high. We felt it inappropriate that opinions here should be divided on a subject that deserved resolute unanimity on the part of the international community and to reflect clearly the universal sentiment that this most important subject deserves.

37. Mr. SUYOI (Brunei Darussalam): My delegation had not intended to speak in explanation of vote, but in view of what happened this morning we feel compelled to explain our position. My delegation decided not to participate in the voting on the motion of the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran. However, this should not be interpreted as meaning that my delegation does not consider the apartheid issue important. It is important, and my delegation will always support efforts to end apartheid in South Africa. But the introduction of procedural motions in the Assembly as to whether apartheid is an important issue or not leads my delegation to ask if the apartheid policy of the Government of South Africa has ever been treated as a less than important issue. My delegation would like to believe that it has not. My delegation believes that the Assembly has consistently considered the eradication of the policies of apartheid of South Africa to be very important, and we are here to consider measures to end those policies of apartheid.

38. My Government has intended to vote for all of the draft resolutions now before the Assembly, and it will do so whether they are amended or not, as we feel that grave injustices have been done the black people of South Africa and that until the apartheid and racist policies of the Government of South Africa have been eliminated, none of us here should consider our work completed. It is no doubt a sad fact that not all delegations could agree to the formulations of the draft resolutions, but this should not prevent us from continuing our work to eradicate apartheid and racism in South Africa and wherever they may exist.

39. Mr. HERRERA CÁCERES (Honduras) (interpretation from Spanish): This morning, in connection with the sovereign right to present amendments to draft resolutions, it being understood that all States Members of the Organization have an equal right to present such amendments, especially when the general intention is to avoid ambiguity, a procedural question was raised as to whether it was appropriate to adopt certain amendments by a two-thirds majority or a simple majority. This ambiguity led to politicization of the vote and disrupted the unity we have enjoyed in face of the opprobrious policy of apartheid. Because of its very nature, apartheid has always been considered an important question, and there has never been any need to raise procedural questions which, at bottom, because of the intention behind them, reduce the importance of the expected vote on this item.

40. We abstained in the voting because, although we were well aware that the motivations behind the proposals were counter-productive, we did not want to leave any trace of doubt about Honduras' firm rejection of any form of racial discrimination. Our abstention implies complete rejection of such procedural quibbles, which are at variance with the principle of mutual respect that should prevail in the Assembly.

41. Given this explanation, it must be understood that our abstention in the vote implies a complete rejection of this sort of procedural sophistry, which is harmful to the harmony and mutual respect that should be maintained in the Assembly and to a serious approach to the items on our agenda.

42. Mr. WOOLCOTT (Australia): Mr. President, I am conscious of your appeal that delegations speak in explanation of vote only once, but we regard this issue as so important that I regret I feel obliged to intervene on this specific question. I should like to explain the Australian delegation's vote on the Iranian amendment, the adoption of which I believe was a serious mistake that will have wide-ranging ramifications for this body. That amendment was based on Article 18 of the Charter. Let me reiterate briefly the questions enumerated under that Article which require a two-thirds majority: recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security, the election of the non-permanent members of the Security Council, the election of the members of the Economic and Social Council, the election of members of the Trusteeship Council, the admission of new Members to the United Nations, the suspension of the rights and privileges of membership, the expulsion of Members, questions relating to the operation of the Trusteeship system and budgetary questions. The Iranian proposal fell under none of these items, and my delegation voted against it.

43. Apartheid is obviously a very important issue among the issues before the Assembly. The overwhelming majority of this body regards apartheid with repugnance, and that has been made plain on many occasions. That is incontestible; but what we were being asked to decide was whether it was an important item in terms of Article 18 of the Charter and rule 85 of the rules of procedure. My delegation's view was that it was not. If apartheid was not treated procedurally as an important question in 1981, 1982, 1983 and before that, why suddenly should it be so treated? The answer is obvious. The Assembly's decision this morning is regrettable. It was an attempt to circumscribe debate and stifle criticism.

44. In rejecting the amendment of the representative of Nigeria, the Assembly indicated its willingness to address the amendments before us. The Iranian motion was a substantial and political motion in the guise of a procedural measure, and in the terms in which it was moved, it commanded the support of the majority in this hall. We believe that decision was short-sighted and may have far-reaching effects for the future conduct of the Assembly's proceedings. Resolutions on apartheid have regularly been carried by a two-thirds majority or more. This morning's decision was therefore unnecessary, as well as being ill-advised. It was politically motivated to stifle the free flow of debate and was therefore objectionable to my delegation.

45. Today the General Assembly decided that apartheid was an important issue, basically with the purpose of avoiding consideration of amendments. What decision shall we take tomorrow, and what issues shall we make important in the future, and what will the effects of this be on the workings of the Assembly? I would just like to pose those questions in explaining why my delegation voted against the Iranian proposal.

46. Mr. OSMAN (Somalia): In order that our non-participation in the voting on the motion relating to the question whether apartheid matters require a two-thirds majority not be misconstrued or misinterpreted, I would like to reaffirm in explicit terms the firm and unequivocal opposition of my Government to the policy of apartheid, racism and racial discrimination. The policy of apartheid is one that really deserves international condemnation and as such is a matter of great importance, being a subject that has time and again been placed not only before the Assembly but also before various international forums.

47. Having said this, we also believe that proposals and amendments that are placed before the Assembly should be given the possibility of being considered and debated purely on their merits, so that any outstanding problems can be resolved in order to reach a consensus on the texts placed before the Assembly.

48. Mr. MOSELEY (Barbados): My delegation is second to none in its resolve that the heinous crime of apartheid shall sooner rather than later perish from this earth. However, my delegation considers that there is a real danger that from motives born of conflicting political ideologies or nationalistic instincts the real issue, namely, the destruction of apartheid, may become clouded and watered down. In my delegation's view, there should be no cloud on the right of every Member State to make an input towards a solution of the real problem. Procedural motions based on motives open to question in our view do nothing but weaken the main thrust, namely, the eradication of apartheid, and for that reason we refused to participate in the vote.

49. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): It was quite clear from the manoeuvres that were employed this morning that the amendments put forward by the United States had the support of the majority of this body, and that explains why it was necessary to resort to procedural manoeuvres in order to avoid having a decision taken by that majority.

50. However, in the light of the events that took place this morning we believe that these amendments at this time could not be fairly considered, and we therefore withdraw our amendments contained in documents A/39/L.43 and L.44. I repeat, we withdraw these amendments.

51. In addition, the United States requests that separate votes be taken on four paragraphs in draft resolutions A/39/L.28 and L.30. I will specify these paragraphs. We ask that in draft resolution A/39/L.28 separate votes be taken on the twenty-sixth preambular paragraph and paragraphs 15 and 18. And we ask that in draft resolution A/39/L.30 a separate vote be taken on the fifth preambular paragraph.

52. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their vote before the vote on any or all of the seven draft resolutions. Representatives will also have an opportunity to explain their vote after all the votes have been taken.

53. I should like to remind the Assembly that under rule 88 of the rules of procedure: "The President shall not permit the proposer of a proposal or of an amendment to explain his vote on his own proposal or amendment."

54. Mr. McDONAGH (Ireland): I wish to make a statement on the draft resolutions on behalf of the 10 member States of the European Community.

55. The Ten, in their common statement in the course of the debate on agenda item 31, unreservedly condemned the practice of apartheid and reiterated their conviction that it must be eradicated and must give way to a society based on genuine representative democracy. The Ten continue to urge the Government of South Africa to respond to the wishes of the majority of its citizens and of the international community as a whole by introducing rapid and fundamental changes in South Africa to end apartheid before the opportunities for peaceful change have passed. They believe that the United Nations has a role of primary importance to play in the efforts exerted to eliminate apartheid.

56. Apartheid is an evil system which violates the fundamental rights of the majority of the citizens of South Africa. The general debate on the item has demonstrated the unanimous opposition of the Assembly to apartheid. It is regrettable therefore that, as last year, objectionable elements have been maintained in some of the draft resolutions.

57. The Ten wish to reaffirm their commitment to the principle of universality of membership of the United Nations. The specialized agencies should also retain their universal character and their statutes should be taken properly into account.

58. The Ten maintain that, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, the division of competences between the General Assembly and the Security Council must be respected.

59. The Ten do not consider the situation in South Africa to be a problem of decolonization. Their opposition to the practice of apartheid in South Africa is aimed at the establishment there of a society based on freedom, equality and social justice for all South Africans, irrespective of race or colour.

60. The Ten have condemned the use of violence from any quarter to solve the problems of southern Africa, including the violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of States neighbouring South Africa. The Ten are deeply concerned about the plight of refugees from South Africa.

61. The attitude of the member States of the European Community towards endorsement of armed struggle in resolutions of the General Assembly is well known. They are conscious that the continued existence of apartheid policies in South Africa suggests to many that these policies will be ended only through armed struggle. They believe, however, that the United Nations has above all the obligation to encourage peaceful solutions.

62. The Ten consider that demands to cut off all relations with South Africa are counterproductive to our common objective in this Assembly, which is the total eradication of apartheid. In the view of the Ten, channels of communication with South Africa should remain open in order to permit the outside world to continue to impress on South Africa its unequivocal rejection of the abhorrent and morally unacceptable system of apartheid and that there is an urgent need for the introduction of rapid and fundamental change.

63. The Ten remain dedicated to the Olympic ideal of non-discrimination and reject any form of apartheid in sports. They must point out, however, that sport is organized on a private basis in their countries. Their sporting organizations are aware of their Governments' opposition to sporting contacts in violation of the Olympic ideal. The Governments of the Ten will continue firmly to discourage sporting contacts involving racial discrimination.

64. The Ten reject all arbitrary and unjustified attacks on Member States or groups of countries.

65. The 10 member States of the Community regret that, for the reasons which I have pointed out, they will not be able to support all of the draft resolutions on this item before the Assembly. They reaffirm that they will continue to use their collective weight to influence the Government of South Africa to put an end to the abhorrent system of apartheid and to establish a society in which everybody, without exception, will enjoy equality, freedom and justice.

66. Mr. BARBOSA de MEDINA (Portugal) (interpretation from French): First, I should like to refer to the vote taken this morning on the procedural motion put forward by the Iranian delegation. I should like to emphasize that my delegation pronounced itself at that time on a very precise procedural motion dealing with specific amendments in the context of specific draft resolutions.

67. My delegation obviously considers the question of apartheid as an important one in the sense of Article 18 of the Charter of the United Nations, like many other delegations which have also explained their vote before me. I should therefore like to emphasize that nothing in our vote should in any way be construed as contradicting that understanding.

68. In the course of this debate, my delegation has frequently expressed Portugal's opposition to all forms of racism and to the principles inherent in any society which is based on racial exclusivity or superiority. We have also reiterated on a number of occasions our support for any initiative whose purpose is to promote the necessary structural changes for the creation of a social system that might eliminate the tensions created by a régime based on the systematic and institutionalized practice of discrimination.

69. That opposition and support are the very basis of the position taken on apartheid by Portugal, which was the precursor of an age-old rejection of racism as a violation of a fundamental principle of law, universally recognized and enshrined in our Constitution. Portugal's vote in favour of resolution 39/2—which was adopted earlier at this session [13th meeting]—is a reflection of that profound conviction of the need to abolish the policies of apartheid and bantustanization, with all the risks of violence and conflict that they entail.

70. In this matter, where it is not simply a question of securing a modification of the prevailing system in South Africa but of undertaking fundamental changes, my Government has always worked to obtain that end by peaceful means. Portugal also believes it essential that all armed conflict and any kind of destructive violence be ruled out because we fear the disastrous consequences that would be visited upon the South African people and the dramatic effects they would have on neighbouring independent States.

71. Portugal could not support so-called piecemeal solutions that would be vain attempts to deal with a global issue. Nor, on the other hand, could we agree that resort to indiscriminate violence is a valid way of turning South Africa into a free, democratic and multiracial society and at the same time bringing peace and prosperity to southern Africa.

72. Likewise, my Government does not believe that the total isolation of South Africa can serve our essential purpose of bringing about the fundamental changes that we have called on that country to make. Indeed, Portugal is profoundly convinced that there is need to keep the international community in a state of mobilization in its efforts against racism, and we are also aware of the fact that the effective eradication of that phenomenon will hinge on a change in mental attitude capable of promoting a feeling of community and equality among the various ethnic elements. It is a fact of history that lack of movement, rather than evolution, is what keeps a country outside the community of nations.

73. The regional arrangements that have taken place might help, in certain circumstances, to demonstrate the value of a policy of keeping in contact—one which Portugal pursues. Keeping in contact should not be confused with acts of assistance or solidarity with the apartheid régime, because they permit acts of aggression and destabilization against neighbouring States in flagrant violation of international law. Owing to historical and cultural links, my delegation would like here to confirm its solidarity with those States, and particularly with the peoples of Angola and Mozambique, which are victims of the present unstable situation prevailing in southern Africa.

74. In this context, my delegation will not substantially change the vote it has so often cast in the General Assembly. While we have reservations about certain aspects of these draft resolutions which encourage violence and contain discriminatory references or certain imprecise language—in particular, paragraphs 5, 7 and 9 of draft resolution A/39/L.36—we will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.29 and L.31 to L.33. My delegation hopes that it can thus make a realistic contribution to the efforts to find a lasting, just and peaceful solution to the problems which beset southern Africa.

75. Mr. KORHONEN (Finland): I have the honour to speak on behalf of the five Nordic countries, Denmark, Iceland, Norway, Sweden and Finland.

76. The Nordic countries' condemnation of apartheid and all forms of racial discrimination has been voiced in the Assembly on many occasions. The entire system of apartheid must be eliminated and give way to a system based on genuine representative democracy. This rejection is based on the Nordic concepts of justice, freedom and democracy and on our belief in the equality and dignity of every human being.

77. Our commitment to these goals is demonstrated by the measures taken by the Nordic countries in accordance with the Joint Nordic Programme of Action against South Africa. The Nordic countries have consulted with relevant parties, especially the front-line States, on how to co-ordinate our efforts in the fight against apartheid. It is against that background that we joined in sponsoring a new draft resolution concerning concerted international action for the elimination of apartheid. We will again support most of the resolutions concerning the apartheid policy of the South African Government.

78. In view of the attitude of our countries towards the apartheid system, we regret that we are not able to vote in favour of all the draft resolutions. Some of them again cause us substantial difficulties. These difficulties concern questions of principle, some of them encountered in more than one draft resolution. I shall briefly describe them.

79. First, the Nordic countries consider universality one of the basic principles of international organizations. We cannot therefore accept any formulation that in one way or another seems to put that principle in doubt.

80. Secondly, the United Nations has above all the obligation to encourage peaceful solutions to international problems. Therefore, we cannot accept endorsement by the United Nations of the use of armed struggle.

81. Thirdly, the Nordic countries deplore the inappropriate and arbitrary singling out of individual countries and groups of countries. This procedure makes it all the more difficult to maintain the international consensus in the struggle against apartheid.

82. Fourthly, because of the strict adherence of the Nordic countries to the provisions of the Charter, we must generally reserve our position with regard to formulations which fail to take into account that only the Security Council can adopt decisions binding on Member States.

83. Fifthly, the implementation of some of the resolutions would encroach upon the constitutional freedoms and rights of Nordic citizens and private organizations.

84. Sixthly, the Nordic countries consider that only a free democratic process based on universal suffrage can determine who can represent the South African people.

85. These are the considerations on which most of our reservations are based. In particular, they apply to draft resolution L.28 concerning sanctions against South Africa, and draft resolution A/39/L.30 concerning relations between Israel and South Africa.

86. Humanitarian assistance to the refugees and the victims of apartheid also forms an important part of the measures taken by the Nordic Governments in accordance with the Joint Nordic Programme of Action against South Africa. We have again this year introduced resolutions reflecting those policies. In so doing, we demonstrate that our commitment actively to combat the evil of apartheid remains firm.

87. The Nordic countries voted against the motion to require a two-thirds majority on the apartheid resolutions and amendments before us, for one reason: because the purpose was to deprive the Members of the General Assembly of their legitimate rights to express their detailed reasons and to properly influence the decisions of the General Assembly. The negative vote of the Nordic countries does not, of course, relate to the well-known Nordic position vis-a-vis apartheid.

88. Count YORK von WARTENBURG (Federal Republic of Germany): Mr. President, you have appealed to us to explain our vote on the motion to require a two-thirds majority on all decisions on apartheid in connection with the explanations on the pertinent resolutions themselves.

89. My delegation believes, as indeed do all delegations, that apartheid is an important issue. We have nevertheless voted against the motion presented by the delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran because it was not clear to us what the objective of that motion really was. Was it to give to our common condemnation of apartheid a stronger expression? Or was its purpose in reality directed against a particular proposal put forward by the United States? We deeply deplore the fact that the latter seems to be true. We strongly oppose any action that would make the important question of apartheid an instrument to prejudice the position of another member State in the Assembly, and this in a manner which was clearly unfair.

90. I would now like to explain our vote on the draft resolutions that are before the Assembly. The representative of Ireland, speaking on behalf of the 10 member States of the European Community, has already commented on the draft resolutions we are about to vote on, recalling essential political principles shared by those countries, including my own.

91. The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, as is well known, rejects strongly the apartheid policy of South Africa as an institutionalized system of racial discrimination. We condemn and repudiate the apartheid system because this system violates human rights and disregards human dignity. The results of the latest parliamentary-chamber election and the continued violence in South Africa reinforce the concern felt by my Government that the majority of those affected fail to see the new South African constitution either as a constructive step forward or as a sufficiently large political concession. Furthermore, the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany has been greatly concerned that the constitutional reform contains no measures aimed at granting political rights to the black majority.

92. Peaceful changes in favour of the oppressed majority of South Africa are urgent and necessary for the benefit of all parts of the population of that country. In a dialogue with all relevant forces, the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany endeavours to defuse by its peace policy the tense situation in South Africa and to contribute towards the establishment of an equitable and lasting order. In so doing, the Federal Government strictly adheres to the arms embargo imposed on South Africa by the Security Council. Anyone claiming the contrary does so against his own better knowledge.

93. My Government agrees with the main thrust of the above-mentioned draft resolutions. It is therefore with much regret that, because of certain formulations in the draft resolutions, my Government is not in a position to support all of them. In particular, we strongly reject the unfounded criticism directed against the Western countries, suggesting that they are encouraging South Africa to escalate violence and oppression against the oppressed people in South Africa and to commit acts of aggression and destabilization against independent African States.

94. My delegation will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.29, L.32 and L.33, in spite of certain objectionable formulations, specifically in A/39/L.29 and L.32. With regard to draft resolution A/39/L.29, my delegation has concerns about some recommendations contained in the report of the Special Committee against Apartheid [A/39/22] relating to its programme of work. If my delegation is voting for draft resolution A/39/L.29 contrary to the position it took last year, it does so because it believes in its main concern. Furthermore, my delegation hopes that the Special Committee against Apartheid will display a more equitable and balanced position towards the Federal Republic of Germany and other Western States in its publications. Also, my delegation would like to place on record its reservations as to the financial implications inherent in this draft resolution as well as in draft resolution A/39/L.32.

95. Moreover, my delegation would like to emphasize that we strongly object to the mentioning of any country by name in the text of the resolutions. That is why my delegation would have strongly supported all amendments aiming at deleting the names of countries in these texts.

96. Finally, let me express the firm hope of my delegation that the General Assembly will be able, at its fortieth session, to deal with resolutions which will eventually be supported by all members of this body.

97. Mr. STEFANINI (Italy): Let me first clarify our position on the motion presented by the Iranian delegation and voted on this morning.

98. Italy shares the concern expressed by many other delegations on this divisive vote which was forced on the Assembly by the Iranian motion. We believe that apartheid is indeed a question of primary importance. There can be little doubt about it in anybody's mind. In fact, it is given the highest priority, as it deserves, in the United Nations. We are convinced that it must continue to receive such priority.

99. We voted against the Iranian motion because the issue at stake was not the importance of apartheid but the importance of the respect for the rules of procedure of the Assembly—in other words, the very fairness of our decisions. What happened this morning was an unfortunate event which we may all regret in the future.

100. Let me now turn to the draft resolutions before us. In his earlier statement, the representative of Ireland expressed the views of the 10 member States of the European Community on those draft resolutions. Italy entirely supports his remarks.

101. My delegation wishes to specify further some points which are particularly significant to us. In our view, the Special Committee against Apartheid deserves respect and support for carrying out a demanding and essential task. Its role is extremely useful in order for us to achieve the goal we all share: the complete eradication of apartheid. To signify once again our support, we shall vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.29 on the programme of work of the Special Committee, in spite of some reservations. Such reservations do not stem from the text before us but are related to the report of the Special Committee against Apartheid [A/39/22]. In this connection, Italy wants to put on record that its vote in favour of the draft resolution does not imply acceptance or endorsement of all the conclusions and recommendations of the report. Indeed, my delegation views many of them with some concern.

102. Let me now turn to draft resolution A/39/L.36 concerning concerted international action for the elimination of apartheid. We do share this goal; we believe in the need for the international community to maintain and increase its pressure on South Africa towards this end. Moreover, we welcome the initiative of the sponsors of this draft resolution—among which there are three member States of the European Community—in so far as they have avoided the inclusion of extraneous elements and presented us with the kind of clear-cut and straightforward text we would like to find in all resolutions. We fully support the call for political freedom and the abolition of the apartheid structures; we agree on many other provisions of the draft resolution. However, we have reservations on some formulations and, in particular, we cannot support paragraphs 5 and 9 and some of the elements in paragraph 7. Therefore, Italy will abstain in the vote on draft resolution A/39/L.36.

103. Mr. WARD (New Zealand): New Zealand rejects South Africa's policy of apartheid in all its manifestations. As we said in our statement in the general debate on the item [70th meeting], the apartheid system is an offence against the dignity of mankind and a travesty of the principles underpinning the Organization. Apartheid is contrary to the New Zealand way of life and the values of the multiracial society we are building.

104. My delegation's votes on the draft resolutions before us will leave no one in any doubt about New Zealand's rejection of racism. My Government believes that the international community should consider applying a range of selective measures that would bring home to the South African Government the fact that their policies and practices have no place in today's world. For this reason we have co-sponsored the draft resolution A/39/L.36. For the same reason, my delegation will abstain in the vote on draft resolution A/39/L.28, even though we have reservations about some of its rhetoric and sweeping demands. My delegation cannot agree with the endorsement of armed struggle by the General Assembly, nor with the selective criticisms that mar this text. New Zealand would have supported the amendments proposed in documents A/39/L.43 and L.44.

105. New Zealand will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.31 on apartheid in sports. My Government actively discourages New Zealand sports people from having contacts with South Africa until apartheid is abolished and South African teams are wholly representative. New Zealand's policy largely accords with the goals sought by the Ad Hoc Committee, though legal obstacles might preclude New Zealand's adherence to an international convention on the lines at present proposed.

106. We have reservations about some aspects of draft resolution A/39/L.29 on the programme of work of the Special Committee against Apartheid, but to demonstrate our support for the objectives of the Special Committee's work, we will vote for that draft resolution. Our willingness to work with the international community in practical ways for the elimination of apartheid is also demonstrated by our support for draft resolutions A/39/L.32 and L.33.

107. Mr. LOUET (France) (interpretation from French): The French delegation would like to add to the statement made on behalf of the 10 European Community countries by the representative of Ireland, by way of making the following remarks.

108. France, as everyone knows, condemns outright the policy of apartheid of the South African Government. We have said this on a number of occasions quite clearly, and we have proved this by our deeds. This position of France was given solemn expression once again by Mr. Cheysson, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, at the meeting organized in his honour on 9 October this year by the Special Committee against Apartheid.

109. Recalling the historic role of France in the struggle against racism, Mr. Cheysson declared in the statement he made on that occasion:

> "Therefore, my country categorically, unreservedly and unambiguously denounces institutionalized racism and the practices which derive from it. As far as we know, the only form of legal racism still existing in the world is in South Africa, and it is the apartheid régime, which we condemn."

110. My country firmly supports all those who work to establish justice and to ensure that the dignity of one and all is recognized in South Africa. It fully supports the Special Committee in continuing its mission of providing information about and denouncing everything that affects the policy of apartheid, as indicated by the presence of the Minister for Foreign Affairs of France at that exceptional meeting held on 9 October.

111. It is for that reason that the French delegation will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.29, which endorses the programme of work of the Special Committee, although we do not approve of all the points contained in it.

112. Likewise, my delegation will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.32, which encourages the United Nations to promote public information and public involvement in international action to eliminate apartheid. The French Government has proved its keenness on providing public information on apartheid matters. Through its Minister for Foreign Affairs, it sought recently to underline its commitment in this area by announcing a contribution, for the first time in 1985, to the United Nations Trust Fund for Publicity against Apartheid.

113. Furthermore, while reserving its position on the contents of any future draft convention, France intends to give its support to draft resolution A/39/L.31, in order to indicate its rejection of any discrimination in sports.

114. As the representative of Ireland did before me when he spoke on behalf of the 10 European Community countries, I should like to express my regret that France is unable to give its support to all the draft resolutions presented under this agenda item. The French delegation very strongly voices the hope that the sponsors of draft resolutions on apartheid will in future take account of the position of several delegations in connection with formulas which weaken the impact of certain draft resolutions and do not make it possible for them to be supported by all members of the Assembly.

115. Apartheid is unanimously condemned by the Assembly. Let us together try to find, wherever possible, formulations which make it possible for us to reflect this unanimity in our voting. My delegation is convinced that this goal can be reached without at the same time weakening the condemnation, thereby enhancing the impact of the resolutions, which is something we hope to see.

116. Mr. ALBORNOZ (Ecuador) (interpretation from Spanish): Ecuador unswervingly rejects any form of racial discrimination, especially its most reprehensible form, apartheid, which is considered a crime against mankind. This position is not based on passing circumstances nor on national or international political pressure. It comes from Ecuador's convictions as a country with mixed ethnic origins, proud of its human resources, which grew from a crucible of many races who live together in equality, based on the principles of freedom and democracy.

117. The political Constitution of Ecuador, which arose from a popular referendum, states in Article 4: "The Ecuadoran State condemns all forms of colonialism, neocolonialism and racial discrimination or segregation. It recognizes the right of peoples to liberate themselves from these oppressive systems."

118. In Article 19, paragraph 4, the Constitution states: "All forms of discrimination for reasons of race, color, sex, language, religion, filiation, political or other opinions, social origin, economic position or birth are forbidden."

119. Ecuador for this reason is a party to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination [resolution 2106 A (XX), annex]. We were the first State to accede to the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid [resolution 3068 (XXVIII), annex].

120. For these reasons, my country, together with other Latin American States, for more than 20 years has always joined in the support for our brothers in Africa expressed in resolutions on the subject which reflect a painful tragedy for the people of South Africa and a universal concern to find solutions.

121. Ecuador does not agree with a selective approach to human rights, and we believe that all States disregarding United Nations resolutions should be condemned, be they great or small. For this reason, we will vote in favour of all the draft resolutions on the subject of apartheid solely because of the anti-discriminatory principles mentioned, but we do not agree that some countries should be singled out and not others in similar circumstances. We would have preferred that racism should be condemned, but in lofty language, without descending to formulas which are themselves discriminatory in nature.

122. In the case of draft resolutions A/39/L.28 and L.30, Ecuador supports any policy aimed at the elimination of racial discrimination, no matter where it may occur—that is, a universal condemnation—but we do not agree with certain selective paragraphs in the texts which are worded inappropriately and will not bring about a solution to the problem. Instead, an attempt should be made to bring about an understanding rather than heightening already existing tensions.

123. My delegation reiterates its support for the struggle of the African peoples against any situation of neo-colonialism or discrimination and in favour of democracy, human rights and justice throughout the world.

124. Mr. MEESMAN (Netherlands): In the debate on the question of apartheid [69th meeting], my delegation has already expressed the view that the abolition of this system of institutionalized racial segregation remains one of the most important tasks confronting the international community. The Netherlands Government has consistently condemned the racial policies practised by South Africa. The apartheid laws, each of which contradicts fundamental human rights, add up to a repressive system that deprives the majority of South Africa's people of a life in dignity and freedom. The recent wave of violence and oppression in South Africa has demonstrated once more the urgent need to replace apartheid by a truly democratic society in which all South Africans, irrespective of race, colour, sex or creed, enjoy equal political and economic rights.

125. In its efforts to contribute to the early elimination of apartheid, my Government continues to give priority to concerted international action within the framework of the United Nations. The debate on this question has shown that the Members of the Organization agree in their judgement that this should be our common goal and that collective action offers the best prospects for bringing to bear effective pressure on the Government of South Africa. One would have expected therefore that draft resolutions before the Assembly would have been drafted with a view to translating this broad consensus into a statement of principles and a programme of concrete action to which all Members of the United Nations could subscribe. We note with regret, however, that once again some of the draft resolutions before us contain elements which are more likely to stir up controversy and mutual recrimination than to contribute to our common cause.

126. In his statement on the resolutions on behalf of the Ten, which we fully endorse, the representative of Ireland has already set forth a number of principles commonly adhered to by the member States of the European Community. We firmly reject the practice of name-calling and arbitrary criticism against certain States or groups of countries. For that reason, and that reason only, my delegation intended to vote in favour of the amendments introduced by the United States. We deeply deplore the fact that these amendments were not put to the vote as a result of a procedural move, ostensibly on the question of apartheid, but which had no other objective than the retention of wording in the draft resolutions which was not only objectionable to the United States but, in the view of my delegation, not justified. My delegation therefore voted against the Iranian motion to apply to the question of apartheid the two-thirds majority rule. Furthermore, the Netherlands objects to the expressions of support for the concept of armed struggle, which is incompatible with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations. In our view, the situation in South Africa is not a colonial one. From this it follows that although the Netherlands supports the efforts of the African National Congress of South Africa [ANC] and the Pan Africanist Congress of Azania [PAC] as anti-apartheid movements, we do not recognize them as liberation movements. Also we continue to have reservations about the applicability of the prisoner-of-war status under the Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War of 12 August 1949[1] and Additional Protocol I of 1977.[2]

127. All these considerations apply to the draft resolution on comprehensive sanctions. My delegation deeply deplores the truly alarming spirit of hostility to one particular group of States displayed in this text. Member States may differ in their choice of policies aimed at the elimination of apartheid, but to seize upon these differences to excoriate certain countries is a practice which strikes at the very roots of the Organization and must be repudiated. However, we also disagree with the general thrust of the draft resolution. We shall therefore vote against it. The Netherlands Government fears that the total isolation of South Africa and comprehensive sanctions against that country will gravely exacerbate existing tensions and will inflict intolerable suffering on the people of South Africa and neighbouring States. The Netherlands has therefore adopted a two-track policy, aimed at increasing the political and economic pressure on the South African Government while using existing channels of communication to encourage forces of peaceful change in South Africa's society. Apart from these reservations, however, it is our opinion that the selective, mandatory sanctions mentioned in paragraph 11 point the way to possible future collective action against the Government of South Africa.

128. This brings me to the draft resolution on concerted international action for the elimination of apartheid. We greatly value this constructive attempt to present a broad platform for concrete common measures, and we will vote in favour of it. In previous years, my Government has already advocated or implemented many of the steps proposed in this draft resolution. For instance, the Netherlands has declared itself in favour of an oil boycott against South Africa based on the mandatory decision by the Security Council and has also expressed its support for the efforts of the oil-exporting and -producing countries to ensure the effective implementation of their voluntary embargo.

129. The Netherlands scrupulously adheres to the existing mandatory arms embargo established by Security Council resolution 418 (1977). As a member of the Security Council, the Netherlands has actively urged the adoption of measures to strengthen the embargo and to enhance its effectiveness, notably by a mandatory ban on the import of arms produced in South Africa. Furthermore, we fully subscribe to the demands enumerated in paragraph 4. With regard to the appeal made in paragraph 8, I wish to recall that the Netherlands is a major donor of assistance to victims of apartheid, the front-line States and the Southern Africa Development Co-ordination Conference, and we have extended support to the ANC and the PAC with the previously mentioned reservation. Yet we cannot endorse all aspects of the draft resolution. Some of our reservations are related to the general principles which I outlined earlier in my statement. We also have reservations concerning paragraph 7. We would welcome a mandatory decision by the Security Council to restrict investments in South Africa. However, in the sphere of national action, my Government does not wish to prejudge the outcome of its consultations with employer organizations and trade unions to consider in what way investments by Dutch companies in South Africa can be influenced as effectively as possible. Furthermore, the Netherlands shares the view that South Africa must be denied any military nuclear capability. But rather than an appeal to cease all nuclear co-operation with South Africa, we would have preferred a call on South Africa to accede to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons [resolution 2373 (XXII), annex] or, alternatively, to accept full-scale safeguards on all its nuclear installations.

130. I now turn briefly to some of the remaining draft resolutions. My delegation will vote in favour of the draft resolution on the programme of work of the Special Committee against Apartheid, in spite of reservations regarding certain elements in the Special Committee's report. In our view, the means for the implementation of this programme must be found within the resources of the regular budget.

131. Finally, the Netherlands will continue to abstain in the voting on the draft resolution concerning apartheid in sports. The introduction of visa requirements for South Africans has enabled my authorities, inter alia, to restrict South African participation in sporting events in the Netherlands. However, we cannot accept some provisions of the proposed international convention against apartheid because they are incompatible with certain constitutionally guaranteed freedoms in my country.

132. Mr. AKYOL (Turkey) (interpretation from French): My delegation will vote in favour of all the draft resolutions on the policies of apartheid of the South African Government. These draft resolutions appear in documents A/39/L.28 to L.33 and L.36. We are also pleased to be one of the sponsors of the draft resolution in document A/39/L.33, on the United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa.

133. Our firm support of these draft resolutions reflects our desire to take part in the efforts of the international community to eliminate apartheid. However, we do have reservations regarding some of the paragraphs in these draft resolutions. As regards draft resolution A/39/L.28, we believe that the thirteenth, twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth preambular paragraphs and paragraphs 14 and 15 are not worded in a balanced manner.

134. Generally speaking, we do not think reference should be made to certain countries or groups of countries, since it is difficult to take a final stand on the respective responsibilities. More specifically, we have reservations as to references to Western countries, mentioned individually or as a group, in several paragraphs of the draft resolutions in question.

135. Miss DEVER (Belgium) (interpretation from French): This morning my delegation voted against the motion introduced by the delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran. We did so unhesitatingly. Our vote cannot be misinterpreted: the unreserved opposition of the Belgian Government and people to apartheid is well known to everyone. In the context in which this motion was introduced, it did not apply to the importance of the question of apartheid, but instead was a procedural ploy to obstruct the adoption of amendments submitted by a Member country after the rejection of another motion aimed at preventing a vote on those amendments. Such techniques are regrettable, for they undermine the effectiveness of the work and disrupt the atmosphere of the Assembly.

136. Draft resolutions A/39/L.29 and L.32, on the programme of work of the Special Committee against Apartheid and on public information and public action against apartheid, meet with the approval of my delegation, for we believe that everything should be done to ensure the proper allocation of available resources.

137. As regards specifically document A/39/L.29 on the programme of work of the Special Committee, the favourable vote of my delegation does not imply, as we would stress, full approval of the entire report referred to in the only preambular paragraph.

138. My delegation will also vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.31, which concerns apartheid in sports, and of draft resolution A/39/L.33 on the United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa.

139. My delegation regrets that it is unable to vote in favour of the other three draft resolutions on the policies of apartheid. The representative of Ireland, in the statement just made on behalf of the member countries of the European Community, has already very clearly reflected the concerns of my country on this subject. Belgium unreservedly takes part in the universal condemnation of the system of apartheid, but we are all the less disposed to depart from our normal standards of conduct since the concessions that would thus be required do not seem to us likely to achieve the goals being pursued. Belgium cannot at one and the same time call for a peaceful solution and give direct or indirect encouragement to armed struggle. Our attitude is consistent and responsible, and in keeping, we believe, with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the mission of the Organization.

140. If the reactions of the Pretoria Government to the pressing appeals of the international community have been continually disappointing to us, my country still cannot subscribe to the statement that that Government, with the support of some Western countries, is pursuing a hegemonistic policy in southern Africa. We cannot accept individual criticism levelled at certain Western countries, in particular those who present a policy of constructive engagement, in an entirely negative manner. That is why my delegation would have voted in favour of the amendments introduced by the delegation of the United States if they had been maintained.

141. Belgium cannot agree that a special resolution should be devoted to relations between South Africa and another State for reasons not directly related to the problem of apartheid. My country remains convinced that the widespread boycott of South Africa would have effects contrary to those being sought here by the international community and that the maintenance of channels of communication between it and the Government of South Africa is necessary if we want the weight of existing pressure to lead to a peaceful dismantling of the institutional structures of apartheid.

142. Finally, as regards the participation of specialized agencies in the struggle against apartheid, my delegation is more than ever convinced that in the permanent interest of international co-operation, their jurisdiction should remain essentially technical and their universal nature should not be undermined.

143. For these reasons, my delegation will be obliged to vote against draft resolutions A/39/L.28 and L.30, and we must abstain in the voting on draft resolution A/39/L.36, on concerted international action for the elimination of apartheid. On the subject of this latter draft resolution, we recognize that an appreciable effort has been made by the sponsors to bring about a consensus. It is, however, the opinion of my Government that some of the language contained in this draft resolution continues to convey ideas which we cannot support.

144. Mr. CARLSON (Canada): My delegation opposed the Iranian motion. We do not consider the proposal consistent with the language and intent of Article 18 of the Charter of the United Nations. We are concerned that a regrettable precedent may have been established which could limit future debate and stifle the will of the majority of the membership.

145. The representative of Canada clearly outlined and enunciated my country's policy on the vital issue of apartheid at the 67th meeting. We will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.36 as a further demonstration of our total rejection of the system of apartheid. We also recognize that the text of this draft resolution has been carefully prepared to take into account various considerations. We congratulate the sponsors for their efforts.

146. My delegation must, nevertheless, register its reservations with respect to some elements of this resolution. Regarding paragraph 5, Canada supports effective measures to eliminate apartheid and recognizes the right of the Security Council, under the Charter of the United Nations, to decide questions regarding mandatory sanctions. It is not readily apparent to us which new forms of mandatory sanctions might be relevant or effective at this time. For this reason, we have some doubts about the timeliness of this recommendation.

147. Regarding paragraph 7, the Canadian Government does not lend funds or extend official credit to South Africa. A series of measures has been taken to terminate the official promotion of trade, including the end of export credits and the abrogation of the Canada-South African trade agreement. These measures do not prevent, by law, Canadian individuals or companies from pursuing trade in peaceful goods or pursuing investment opportunities. That is a matter for individual judgement.

148. Regarding paragraph 8, Canada does not support armed struggle as a means to effect change in South Africa. We do, however, extend considerable financial help to the victims of apartheid inside South Africa and to refugees. Grants are accorded to voluntary organizations supporting community development and training. Exiles are assisted through the Commonwealth, the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa, UNDP and other means. We do not support, or intend to support, movements which seek to achieve their objectives through violent means.

149. Regarding paragraph 9, while we reject initiatives and contacts that would support the apartheid régime, we do not consider that open and frank exchanges have, or need to have, this effect. We do not favour the complete isolation of South Africa and do not interpret this paragraph, as worded, to endorse the termination of all contacts. Societies which are isolated find it more difficult to change. We do not change peoples' minds by refusing to talk to them.

150. This having been said, the Canadian delegation wishes to emphasize once again that we fully support the evident intent of this resolution, which is to muster support for concerted international action. The struggle against apartheid is one which we espouse. It must be continued until apartheid is ended and there is justice for all.

Mr. Gbeho (Ghana), Vice-President, took the Chair.

151. Mr. WOOLCOTT (Australia): I have already explained the Australian delegation's opposition to the Iranian motion this morning, and I wish now to address briefly the draft resolution before us. As my delegation stated in the general debate on this item [67th meeting], the present Australian Government totally rejects all forms of apartheid, all forms of racism and, in particular, the repugnant policy of apartheid.

152. My Government views apartheid as the root cause of the tensions, instability and confrontation in southern Africa. Australia therefore supports international efforts to censure South Africa where these have the support of the international community and is prepared to take measures to bring effective pressures to bear on South Africa to end apartheid.

153. Despite our strong support for effective international action to terminate apartheid, we find ourselves once again faced with a number of resolutions containing elements which we are unable to accept. It was for this reason that my delegation welcomed the opportunity to co-operate with a number of other Western and African delegations in sponsoring draft resolution A/39/L.36, which we believe contains an effective blueprint for action against apartheid. In relation to the other resolutions, I wish to make the following observations.

154. My delegation is opposed to the endorsement of armed struggle as a means of bringing about an end to apartheid. The settlement of disputes by peaceful means is one of the most cherished principles of the United Nations, and we do not believe that it is appropriate to endorse armed struggle.

155. Having said this, however, I should add that, as I said yesterday [97th meeting] in respect of Namibia, we do understand the frustrations that have led many countries and peoples to take the view that if peaceful methods do not produce the necessary results, force may inevitably occur as a last resort to end institutionalized discrimination in southern Africa.

156. We are also opposed to the selective and arbitrary condemnation of individual Member States and to the often extravagant language in which these criticisms are voiced. For this reason, we would have voted in favour of the amendments contained in documents A/39/L.43 and L.44, and for that reason we shall vote against those paragraphs on which the United States has requested a separate vote.

157. The Australian delegation is also committed to the principle of universality of membership of international organizations, and we cannot accept the calls in these resolutions for the expulsion of South Africa from the United Nations and its family of organizations. It is through its participation in such bodies that South Africa can be brought face-to-face with the full strength of international opposition to apartheid.

158. A further element in these draft resolutions which my delegation is not able to accept is the proclamation of South African liberation movements as the authentic representatives of the people of South Africa. Only free democratic elections based on universal suffrage can really determine who represents the people of South Africa.

159. Consistent with the attitude of the Australian delegation in relation to the need for strict control of United Nations expenditures, we also have some reservations about the nature and extent of the programme of work of the Special Committee against Apartheid.

160. The presence of these elements in a number of the draft resolutions before us has meant that my delegation will abstain on draft resolution A/39/L.28 and will vote against draft resolution A/39/L.30. We shall, however, vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.29, L.31 to L.33 and L.36.

161. Ms. MOSELE (Botswana): My delegation will abstain in the voting on draft resolution A/39/L.28 and will vote in favour of the rest of the draft resolutions under consideration, while reserving our position on any of their paragraphs which enjoin us to participate in the imposition of economic sanctions against South Africa. We are not in a position to support the imposition of economic sanctions, let alone an oil embargo, against South Africa.

162. Mr. MAKEKA (Lesotho): My delegation as a matter of principle fully supports all United Nations efforts to put an end to the inhuman practices of apartheid and racial discrimination in South Africa. Therefore my delegation will vote in favour of the draft resolutions now before us. However, in view of our usual position regarding our difficulties over sanctions, my delegation will abstain on draft resolution A/39/L.28. It follows, therefore, that my delegation has difficulties with paragraphs pertaining to sanctions in other draft resolutions, as Lesotho is not in a position to implement them.

163. Mr. LEVIN (Israel): As we stated in the course of the debate on the agenda item before us [69th meeting], Israel categorically and unequivocally rejects racism, racial discrimination, bigotry and intolerance in any form. This position has been made clear by us on numerous occasions in the Assembly. It has also been repeatedly communicated by us to the Government of South Africa. Nevertheless, the sponsors of draft resolution A/39/L.30, as well as of some of the other draft resolutions before us, have intentionally ignored official communiqués from my Government which are contained in official documents of the United Nations and have prepared to rely on mendacious, tendentious and unsubstantiated allegations based on speculative press reports and on previous one-sided resolutions. In so doing, the sponsors of these draft resolutions have sought to divert attention from the real problems of apartheid, thus gravely undermining the purpose of the debate on this subject and subverting the genuine concern for the victims of bigotry and racial prejudice.

164. It is high time for a serious assessment of the relentless perennial incantations against my country to take place and for a single, honest and impartial standard to be set and applied with regard to the just struggle against racism and racial discrimination in all its manifestations. Israel has once again been singled out in this item as the only country in the world for specific condemnation based on patent falsehoods. For this reason, as for other reasons raised by my delegation on previous occasions, the delegation of Israel will vote negatively on draft resolution A/39/L.30.

165. Mr. MILES (United Kingdom): The representative of Ireland, speaking on behalf of the 10 States members of the European Community, has already expressed views shared by my Government and I need therefore comment only briefly on why the United Kingdom does not feel able to support most of the draft resolutions now before the Assembly.

166. No member of the Assembly can be in any doubt of the strength of opposition of successive British Governments to apartheid or of the efforts they have made consistently, through pressure and persuasion by all available means, to induce the South African Government to abandon the cruel, morally unacceptable and degrading system of apartheid. But, as we have consistently made clear at recent sessions of the General Assembly, we had hoped that this body would approach the apartheid question in a realistic and effective manner and work for draft resolutions that would allow all delegations to express their unanimous opposition to apartheid. We are saddened that the impact of the draft resolutions adopted has been diminished by their being used for manifestly divisive ends. The effectiveness of the Assembly's efforts to oppose apartheid would be enormously enhanced if the position of some Member States were not misrepresented or abused and if strict regard were paid to the truth.

167. For example, with regard to draft resolution A/39/L.29, we particularly regret the nature of the report presented to the Assembly by the Special Committee against Apartheid [A/39/22]. The report is slanted, inaccurate and in several places seriously misrepresents my Government's position. It contains an extraordinary number of tendentious attacks upon Member States, including the United Kingdom and several of our partners in the European Community. It will be entirely counterproductive, as it can bring comfort only to those who do not genuinely wish to see the problems of South Africa resolved rapidly, justly and without further bloodshed. Similar considerations apply to draft resolutions A/39/L.28 and L.30.

168. The most effective way in which the international community can assist the people of South Africa to dismantle apartheid lies not through isolation, comprehensive sanctions or other measures which would entrench the South African Government's stance and have serious consequences for neighbouring countries, still less through violence, but through the maintenance of dialogue and channels of communication. Through these channels my Government will continue to impress upon the South African Government our unwavering refusal to tolerate apartheid.

169. Mr. PHIRI (Malawi): In considering the draft resolutions before the plenary Assembly, my delegation would like to reiterate that the Government of the Republic of Malawi remains resolutely averse to the policies of apartheid and all the methods used to enforce them.

170. On 23 October last, the President of my country and the President of the People's Republic of Mozambique issued a joint communiqué in which they unreservedly condemned the practice of apartheid in South Africa and called for an early end to the apartheid policies.

171. My Government's rejection of the policies of apartheid cannot therefore be in doubt. It was in support of this aversion to apartheid that my delegation voted in favour of the Iranian motion. However, my delegation holds the view that some of the measures called for in the draft resolutions under consideration may not contribute to the early achievement of our objective of eliminating apartheid. Moreover, my delegation joins those delegations that hold the conviction that the problems we are facing require practical approaches that are implementable.

172. We wish to reiterate that we do not support the practice of singling out a few Member States for condemnation or criticism, which is in conflict with the principle of universality. We all know that published records point to several other Member States that would be candidates for any such criticism in this regard.

173. In these circumstances, my delegation will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.29 and L.31 to L.33, but will abstain on draft resolutions A/39/L.28, L.30 and L.36.

174. My delegation's abstention in the votes on those draft resolutions is the result of historical and geographical factors over which my country has no control.

175. My delegation finds it difficult to reconcile the idea that many countries deal directly or indirectly with South Africa and yet are not singled out for mention or condemnation.

176. In conclusion, my delegation wishes to appeal to the Government of South Africa to establish constructive dialogue and fruitful communication with the black majority in South Africa.

177. Mr. WIJEWARDANE (Sri Lanka): In the vote on the Iranian motion this morning, Sri Lanka voted in favour because we hold that the question of apartheid is of the utmost importance. We must reiterate that it is our firm view that every Member of the Organization has an equal right to be heard in the Assembly, and if it deems it necessary, to introduce resolutions and seek amendments.

178. My delegation firmly supports the thrust of the draft resolutions contained in documents A/39/L.28 to L.33 and L.36. We intend to vote in favour of all those draft resolutions when each of them is put to the vote as a whole.

179. Sri Lanka's consistent policy at the United Nations on all issues has been that we have not favoured the condemnation or denunciation by name of countries with which we have diplomatic relations. Our carrying out that policy in United Nations voting, however, does not imply any diminution of our strong opposition to the policies of apartheid of the Government of South Africa, as indicated in our statement in the general debate on this item [67th meeting].

180. Sri Lanka will not be able to support the twenty-sixth preambular paragraph and paragraph 15 of draft resolution A/39/L.28—on which separate votes have now been requested—in view of its consistent policy.

181. Mr. KAM (Panama) (interpretation from Spanish): The policy of apartheid of the racist régime in South Africa has been condemned and categorically rejected by my country in the United Nations and other international forums. We have never balked at describing apartheid as a crime against humanity and a disgrace to the human race, since Panama is a country which is a model crucible of races living together in harmony.

182. We reaffirm our support to the oppressed people of South Africa and their liberation movements in their just struggle to eliminate apartheid and bring about a democratic, non-racial society which guarantees human rights and fundamental freedoms for the whole population.

183. We should like to reiterate our support for the ANC and the PAC in their heroic struggle against the racist minority régime in South Africa to bring about the total elimination of apartheid and transform South Africa into a democratic society, free from racism and discrimination.

184. My delegation reiterates its solidarity with the front-line States and expresses its gratitude for the valuable contribution they have made to the struggle against the racist régime in South Africa and for elimination of colonialism in Africa.

185. We believe that the repeated acts of aggression by the racist régime of South Africa against independent African States, the persistence and recrudescence of its policy of oppression against the people of South Africa and its continued illegal occupation of Namibia, represent serious threats to international peace and security. That is why an end should be put to those policies.

186. In the light of what I have just said, we shall vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.28, L.29, L.31 to L.33 and L.36, which essentially are in keeping with my country's foreign policy in this respect. Nevertheless, we would like to enter reservations in connection with certain paragraphs that are drafted in such a way as to make selective condemnations by naming countries with which Panama has diplomatic relations.

187. In the light of that latter comment, my delegation will abstain in the vote on draft resolution A/39/L.30. However, our abstention and reservations should not in any way be construed as any kind of approval for or consent to the sort of collaboration that many countries undertake with the racist régime in South Africa, which strengthens that régime and encourages it in its policies of apartheid and oppression

188. I should like to explain my delegation's vote this morning in connection with the proposal made by the representative of Iran requesting a two-thirds majority to approve draft resolutions or amendments on the question of apartheid. We want to make it abundantly clear that apartheid is an important question for the United Nations and the entire international community. That is why a substantive consideration of this matter should deserve the highest priority in the Organization and be dealt with in the most serious way possible.

189. We consider that the context in which the vote was taken this morning was not the most appropriate one for delegations clearly to state their position on whether the definition of apartheid should be regarded as an important question in the United Nations. On the contrary, it was somewhat damaging to the unanimous expression of the political will of our countries in this matter, because the question was linked with procedural matters and the vote was affected by amendments proposed by the United States before the decision was taken.

190. We think it was counterproductive for the Iranian motion to have been put forward at the time it was, since it gave the impression that it would directly affect the voting process on the United States amendments and that we were not following the relevant rules.

191. We have no doubt about the substance of the issue; nevertheless, since we had very serious reservations about the propriety and intentions underlying the Iranian proposal, my delegation abstained thereon.

192. Mr. INFANTE (Chile) (interpretation from Spanish): My delegation would like to reiterate its position of principle: it rejects racial discrimination and any form of apartheid. Nevertheless, we regret that in some of the draft resolutions before us elements were introduced that are extraneous to the fundamental principles that must inspire us—that is, the reaffirmation of our rejection of apartheid, whatever form it may take.

193. In certain paragraphs of some of these draft resolutions it appears that a selective criterion was used which does not contribute to our common goal in this matter, but rather tends to politicize a problem with deep underlying humanitarian concerns. That is why my delegation hopes that in the future such paragraphs which imperil a consensus will disappear so that unanimous support in the condemnation of all forms of apartheid is possible.

194. Mr. BERMUDEZ (Honduras) (interpretation from Spanish): My delegation will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.28, L.29, L.31 to L.33 and L.36 on the policy of apartheid followed by the Government of South Africa. Honduras is categorically opposed both to this policy of oppression, which is an enemy of social coexistence, and to any resort to violence, either domestic or international, including oppression or terrorism in any part of the world.

195. Nevertheless, as we stated on 5 December last year, and indeed yesterday in explaining our vote on the question of Namibia [97th meeting], we cannot support selective references directed against States other than South Africa. That is why Honduras will vote in favour of the deletion of those specific references in the paragraphs concerned and will abstain in the voting on draft resolution A/39/L.30.

196. Mr. ADJOYI (Togo) (interpretation from French): Yesterday, and once again today, we have been confronted by situations which at least have had the merit of revealing clearly the fierce stubbornness of certain countries with regard to accepting the way the world is developing. How can we explain otherwise the fact that yesterday the international community, amnesiac since 11 October 1954, miraculously found its memory and realized that it had adopted resolution 844 (IX)? How can we otherwise explain what delegations are pleased to call "procedural wrangles" if we were not prompted by the sole desire to overcome others and bring them to their knees? How can we explain that in the same situation this morning we were faced by two procedural motions; and furthermore, one of these motions, in the eyes of my delegation at least, concerned a false problem?

197. In fact, it is not up to the Assembly to determine whether the question of apartheid is important or not. We all condemn apartheid, and the international community has judged it to be such a serious practice, therefore so important, that it has termed it a crime against humanity.

198. My country, Togo, has always condemned, condemns and will always condemn apartheid. My delegation views this as such a serious issue that it believes it is not through certain procedural manoeuvres that we should effect a determination as to whether this is an important question or not, all the more because this is not the first time that the General Assembly has considered this item. We have always dealt with it according to rules which should not suddenly be reversed or altered the way they have been.

199. For my delegation, the second motion this morning seemed to be a calculated political artifice underlying a procedural motion, the clear purpose of which was to prevent all those struggling against apartheid from obtaining the required majority to condemn this odious practice. Furthermore, in the eyes of my delegation this issue is of such importance that it is constantly being discussed at all levels. It is essentially a human problem. Therefore, we cannot reasonably expect that a question of daily life, a problem of human existence, should become an important political issue in the sense of being an important question as defined in Article 18 of the Charter of the United Nations. For all these reasons, my delegation voted against the procedural motion of Iran.

200. The matter of apartheid is of concern to us all. Various approaches have been adopted in order to try to end this scourge. Account has to be taken of how the situation has developed to try to determine the best strategy to be used hereafter. This is what has been requested by certain States.

201. For its part, the delegation of Togo does not believe it necessarily follows that simply because a certain country has taken a certain attitude in the past, it will always have the same attitude now or in the future. Politics is essentially a question of human beings, and given that human beings are in a constant state of change, it is quite conceivable that politics can vary in one way or another according to what is going on in the political world, the foundation of which is defending interests, which are, in this particular case, a common interest—that is, the battle against apartheid.

202. Instead of fighting each other in "procedural battles", let us face up squarely to the actual situation in the world and ask if we are really doing the right thing to solve the question of apartheid. Let us indeed condemn all those countries which collaborate with the South African racist régime. Let us not be selective in our approach; let us condemn all those States, if that is our intention.

203. The Government of Togo is convinced that no country should be named unless an exhaustive list can be given of all countries which collaborate with South Africa. That is a question of justice.

204. In the light of all that I have said, therefore, my delegation will give favourable consideration to the United States position on the vote which we are about to take.

Mr. Lusaka (Zambia) resumed the Chair.

205. Mr. HEPBURN (Bahamas): The Bahamas delegation did not participate in the procedural vote this morning regarding the importance of the question of apartheid since it is convinced that having to take a decision on such an obvious and fundamental fact can only serve to diminish its importance and significance.

206. The Bahamas delegation will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.29 to L.32 and L.36 and will abstain on L.28.

207. The Bahamas delegation remains committed to the just and legitimate cause of the black majority of South Africa attempting to free itself from the bondage of apartheid, which the General Assembly has justly labelled a crime against humanity. It notes with concern, however, that the determined struggle of the black majority continues to be countered by calculated initiatives on the part of the Government of Pretoria to strengthen its ruthless, baseless policy of racial segregation and hatred, in defiance of the Charter of the United Nations and the resolutions and decisions of the Organization.

208. Its most recent act of defiance and contempt, the so-called new constitution, serves only to clarify the intent of that racist régime to exclude the black majority from participation in all areas, including the political arena, and to ensure that total power remains concentrated in the hands of the white minority. The new constitution, an old policy in poor disguise, has not deceived the community of nations. It merely enforces bantustanization, repression and economic, political and cultural deprivation as the only realities for the black majority of South Africa.

209. The frustration of the majority of the international community with South Africa's continued intransigence regarding international standards and principles and the determination to challenge the system of apartheid until it is dismantled and replaced by a just, multiracial society are, the Bahamas believes, reflected in the draft resolutions before the Assembly.

210. Based on what it perceives its obligation and that of the international community to be, the Bahamas reiterates its solidarity with the black majority of South Africa and its confidence in United Nations efforts for this just cause. It therefore supports the thrust of the draft resolutions, in particular those provisions which call for continued material and moral support for the oppressed people of South Africa and for non-involvement with South Africa in the economic, military, political and cultural spheres.

211. Yet the Bahamas has always held, and continues to hold, that greater progress is achieved with less confrontation and more co-operation, which can be achieved through genuine understanding, good intentions and political will. The struggle should not be between opposing sides in the Assembly; rather, the international community as a whole should seek to implement decisions taken against the racist régime of South Africa. It therefore appeals to sponsors and opposers of draft resolutions submitted for adoption to search for a more selfless approach to the structure of future texts, for without a serious revision of the position taken on all sides there can be no appreciable solution to this tormenting problem.

212. Despite the affirmative vote of my delegation for the draft resolutions mentioned, the Bahamas reiterates for the record its concern over the language and formulation of draft resolutions A/39/L.28 and L.30 in particular. The former has several conflicting elements and selective naming of States detracts from its efficacy; the latter, because of its lack of balance, is less constructive. Nevertheless, this observation does not detract from support for the main thrust of the texts, which call attention to the root cause of the evil of apartheid. My delegation trusts that majority support will serve as a catalyst in bringing about positive developments on the question in the future.

213. Mr. ZAIN (Malaysia): This morning, my delegation voted in favour of the procedural motion presented by the delegation of Iran. In the circumstances that prevailed at the meeting, my delegation did not have the opportunity to examine the matter in all its underlying ramifications and complexities and, above all, its implication for the struggle against apartheid itself and for wider support for the liberation movements in South Africa. We voted in favour because obviously apartheid is an important question and has been so regarded.

214. Certainly the opposition of the Malaysian Government to the policies of apartheid—the contemporary version of nazism, as we have called it—ever since our independence has been total, complete and unequivocal. Bearing in mind, however, the particular context in which the proposal was put forward, my delegation wishes it to go on record that our position on that voting should now be read as non-participation.

215. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): We have got only this planet. The super-Powers might have thought of going to their satellites, but we have no satellites, and since we have only this planet, we have to live on it peacefully, if we want to live at all.

216. We strongly adhere to and believe in justice, peace and fairness—what the representative of the United States pleads for. We, too, believe in resolving differences peacefully, but from the start, not when the enemy has exhausted all its unpeaceful means, because then there is no peace to talk about. We do not think that those who have the military power to intimidate each one of us individually and even collectively, as the United States representative did this morning, can present a fair definition of fairness. That the super-Powers can intimidate those who disagree with their definition of fairness is not really fair at all.

217. We think the oppressed—the South Africans, the Angolans, the Palestinians, the Ethiopians—the barefoot and the hungry, are more sincere in their plea for fairness than those that have the atomic bombs, supersonic aircraft and all the deadly weapons with which to impose their fairness on others. I have a few questions to ask both super-Powers. When have they been fair at all, and where? On what basis are they making appeals for fairness? Is it not true that it is always the third world countries which have asked for fairness? Is it not true that the Group of 77, in its negotiations on the transfer of technology and other subjects, called for fairness? Have we attained any at all?

218. We, too, believe in fairness, but we think the definition of fairness, from the super-Powers to the third-world countries, changes significantly. That is why what those that have all the means of imposing their opinions upon others consider fair might seem absolutely unfair to us.

219. My delegation, therefore, will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.28, L.33 and L.36, on the basis of fairness. I also make this very important commitment: whenever we observe a basic change in the foreign policy of the United States towards the South African indigenous population, we shall be the first to propose to delete all those phrases condemning the United States for its co-operation with South Africa. Therefore, inasmuch as the policies of the United States are as they are, I think our position remains as it is.

220. Mr. VAN LIEROP (Vanuatu): Cancer, heart disease, sickle cell anaemia and other dreaded diseases kill, cripple and destroy without warning. They strike at their immediate victims and at those who love, cherish and respect victims of those dreaded diseases. Condemning these plagues upon mankind is not enough. All of us recognize the need to support and fund research into the causes of and cures for these ailments. No one would today argue that we have done enough in this regard; nor can anyone say that merely condemning apartheid is enough.

221. Apartheid is also a cancer. It is a sickness as vile and serious as any of the other diseases that kill, maim, destroy and prevent human beings from realizing their full potential.

222. It is our belief that no effort should be spared in examining the causes of and searching for cures for this perverse illness. Just as we are not prepared to tie the hands of medical researchers engaged in battle against medical disease or restrict the resources available to them, we are similarly not prepared to tie the hands or restrict the efforts of those engaged in the struggle against the social and political disease called apartheid. We and the vast majority of the States represented here love, cherish and respect the people of South Africa as we love, cherish and respect all peoples. Therefore, we will vote in favour of the draft resolutions on apartheid.

223. Just as one cannot truly comprehend the pain and suffering of the terminally ill, we do not believe that any of us can truly comprehend the magnitude and extent of the pain and suffering endured by the vast majority of South Africa's people. To them there is no such thing as inappropriate language with respect to the excesses of the Pretoria régime. To them our word will never be as strong as the police state which confronts their existence every single minute of every single day. To them the least—and it is the very least—we can do, all of us, is to distance ourselves even further from the greatest example of inhumanity existing today.

224. While we might have chosen different language in some sections of the draft resolutions, we feel that this is relatively unimportant in the larger picture. The Special Committee against Apartheid is charged with primary responsibility in this area, and if its language is less than perfect, at least its effort, its compassion and its commitment are exemplary. We commend its chairman for his zeal and vigorous advocacy on behalf of all human beings.

225. We believe that the international community has over the years shown considerable restraint and been very accommodating. Who here today could possibly dare to suggest that Pretoria has responded in kind? Who here today could possibly suggest that we have done enough to combat apartheid or that we have tried everything we can? Let us not forget that every gesture or concession made to South Africa has been taken by that régime as an act of acquiescence or a sign of approval. That régime's arrogance has bred an almost unparalleled myopia. It does not believe that we really mean what we say when we condemn apartheid. We have heard the voices of those who will not be able to support these draft resolutions. We understand their difficulties. However, we have also heard the voice of South Africa's people. Their difficulty is even easier to understand, for we speak the same language and share the same dreams and the same frustrations. We trust that those who cannot support the draft resolutions will understand our need to support them.

226. Once again we state that we are voting not against any other State, but against the Republic of South Africa and its apartheid policies. Let no one be mistaken: it is relatively easy to engage in verbal denunciations of apartheid. Any of us can do that. What we must do now is take a step, no matter how small, and signal some sign of hope to South Africa's embattled people.

227. Perhaps the draft resolutions are in some aspects too selective, but at some point in time the search for a cure for any disease must focus somewhere. In this case we might not agree with all of the emphasis, and we would prefer a broader scope. We will work for a wider and more precise focus in the future, but we are most certainly not prepared now to sit on the sidelines and thereby acquiesce in an erosion of support for those who stand most firmly against the sickness of apartheid and, symbolically, in the front lines as soldiers of the United Nations.

228. Mr. MOSELEY (Barbados): My delegation, as a general principle is opposed to selective name-calling, since this tends to exacerbate rather than to conciliate. We feel that the absence of conciliation is contrary to the spirit and intent of the Charter of the United Nations. Logically, therefore, intemperate language combined with selective name-calling is more likely to be counter-productive than otherwise. If the aim is to defeat apartheid, then clearly the appropriate strategy must be to mobilize all resources for the fight.

229. My delegation has very serious doubts as to the extent to which Member States trade with South Africa. What States, for example, sell oil to South Africa, purchase diamonds from South Africa and otherwise bolster the South African economy? Why single out one or two Member States?

230. But there is another side of the coin. Where selective name-calling occurs, my delegation deplores it as a serious blemish and an unfair tactic. However, where the evil complained of is not enough to vitiate a resolution as a whole, then so keenly does my country feel about the question of apartheid that my delegation can go no further than to abstain. Inevitably there will be difficulties. Thus my delegation, although supporting the main thrust of the draft resolutions as a whole, must register its very great dissatisfaction at the biased and intemperate language that appears in the twenty-sixth preambular paragraph of the draft resolution contained in A/39/L.28. We cannot support the policy of constructive engagement, but we cannot in all conscience attribute to that policy the vices recited in the twenty-sixth preambular paragraph. My delegation will support the draft resolutions, but with reservations as to certain paragraphs.

231. The PRESIDENT: We have heard the last speaker in explanation of vote before the voting. Before proceeding to the vote, I would like to announce that other states have become sponsors of draft resolutions on the question of apartheid: draft resolution A/39/L.28: 5 states; draft resolution A/39/L.29: 11 states; draft resolution A/39/L.30: 8 states; draft resolution A/39/L.31: 13 states; draft resolution A/39/L.32: 12 states; draft resolution A/39/L.33: 5 states; draft resolution A/39/L.36: 7 states.

232. The General Assembly will now begin the voting process and take a decision on the various draft resolutions. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of these draft resolutions is contained in document A/39/787.

233. We turn first to draft resolution A/39/L.28 and Add. 1, entitled "Comprehensive sanctions against the apartheid régime and support to the liberation struggle in South Africa". In this connection, I wish to inform Members that in his introductory statement made at this morning's plenary meeting, the representative of Nigeria, in his capacity as Chairman of the Special Committee against Apartheid, revised the last part of paragraph 31 of draft resolution A/39/L.28 and Add. 1, by deleting the following words: "and, in particular, to exclude South Africa from all its technical working groups".

234. I should like to remind Members that the representative of the United States of America has formally moved that the Assembly proceed to hold separate votes on the following paragraphs: the twenty-sixth preambular paragraph, paragraphs 15 and 18 of draft resolution A/39/L.28 and Add. 1, as well as the fifth preambular paragraph of draft resolution A/39/L.30 and Add. 1.

235. In this connection, I should like to quote rule 89 of the General Assembly rules of procedure:

> "A representative may move that parts of a proposal or of an amendment should be voted on separately. If objection is made to the request for division, the motion for division shall be voted upon. Permission to speak on the motion for division shall be given only to two speakers in favour and two speakers against. If the motion for division is carried, those parts of the proposal or of the amendment which are approved shall then be put to the vote as a whole. If all operative parts of the proposal or of the amendment have been rejected, the proposal or the amendment shall be considered to have been rejected as a whole."

236. If I hear no objection, the Assembly will vote separately on the aforementioned paragraphs.

237. I shall first put to the vote the twenty-sixth preambular paragraph of draft resolution A/39/L.28 and Add. 1. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Bahrain, Benin, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, China, Comoros, Congo, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Mozambique, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Poland, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Vanuatu, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

The draft resolution was adopted by 146 votes to 2, with 6 abstentions (resolution 39/72 G).

250. The PRESIDENT: In the light of the decisions just taken by the General Assembly, the Chairman of the Special Committee against Apartheid, Mr. Garba of Nigeria, has asked to make a statement. I take it that there is no objection to my calling on him.

251. Mr. GARBA (Nigeria), Chairman of the Special Committee against Apartheid: It has been traditional for the Chairman of the Special Committee against Apartheid to make a statement at the conclusion of the discussion of apartheid in the Assembly. I know that there are some delegations which wish to explain their vote, but I do have some very pressing engagements and I am grateful that you have allowed me to speak at this time.

252. First of all, I should like to express my gratitude to the many delegations here for their kind words about the work of the Special Committee. I am also gratified at the appreciation expressed by the General Assembly for the efficient and devoted services by the staff of the Centre against Apartheid.

253. Secondly, I must say that I am distressed that the General Assembly has been diverted for some time from addressing the main problem before us, namely, the grave situation in South Africa and the responsibility of those who have allowed the apartheid régime to become a menace to the world.

254. This morning I proposed that the Assembly avoid unnecessary divisive votes. There was no need to vote on amendments when the Assembly could vote on provisions of the draft resolutions and each delegation could record his views. I regret that we did not have the time to explain our view to all delegations, but let me say that I had no intention of preventing a fair vote. In fact, it is important that the oppressed people of South Africa and the whole world should know the attitude of the United States and its supporters.

255. The oppressed people of South Africa are observing Christmas this year as "black Christmas" in order to mourn for the hundreds of men, women and children who have been killed and the many others who have been maimed by the racist police.

256. They cannot celebrate the joyous season because they have faced and continue to face untold suffering because they reject, as every decent person must, the evil system of apartheid. Their leaders are in prison, and eight courageous leaders of the United Democratic Front have just been charged with high treason. Thousands of workers have been summarily dismissed and deported, and whole communities have been devastated.

257. By choosing to suffer in struggle rather than surrender to racism, they are fighting not only for their own freedom and the future of all the people of South Africa, but for the purposes and principles of the Organization. They do not ask for pity, but they demand and deserve our solidarity.

258. But the issue is wider than that.

259. The racist clique in Pretoria is arrogant with power. After its largest military manoeuvres last September, its so-called Minister of Defence boasted, "With what we witnessed yesterday we could go right through to Cairo".

260. The struggle against apartheid is not merely a struggle of the black people of South Africa, but the struggle of Africa for self-defence and of the United Nations for international peace and security.

261. No amount of equivocation and propaganda and no lobbying and pressure in the Assembly can cancel out before history the responsibility of those who have sustained the apartheid régime with military, economic and political support and, indeed, protection.

262. We know, and the oppressed people of South Africa know, that we have a difficult task. But the oppressed people of South Africa will fight, and Africa will fight, despite the temporary difficulties we now face, until South Africa is liberated, whatever the odds, because we have no choice.

263. We seek the support of all Governments and all men and women of conscience, and we expect support because our cause is just.

264. The draft resolutions adopted today must not remain just paper but should lead to action.

265. Let me make special mention of the draft resolution on concerted international action for the elimination of apartheid, which has been adopted by an overwhelming vote. I should like to thank the Nordic and other Western countries which have cosponsored this draft resolution as an act of faith and a demonstration of their commitment.

266. This resolution is above all a commitment for action, and I trust that all Governments which voted in favour will give urgent attention to the implementation of its provisions.

267. I appeal to those who today failed to vote in favour to reconsider their attitudes. I appeal to public opinion, especially in Western countries, to lend its support to the resolution, which represents a minimum of action that is urgently required.

268. The Special Committee against Apartheid, while holding extensive consultations with Governments to encourage them to take action, will continue to devote special attention to reaching the people at the grass-roots level and the leaders of public opinion—political and religious leaders, cultural personalities, sportsmen and others—to persuade them to join the campaign of conscience and action against apartheid.

269. We are greatly encouraged by the response this year, and we wish to express our appreciation to the many Governments, organizations and individuals concerned. I would like again to commend Sweden for its initiative in strengthening its law against new investments in South Africa, and I hope that other countries concerned will consider similar action.

270. I cannot fail to express our great appreciation of the actions taken by the Government of New Zealand, under the leadership of Prime Minister David Lange. Actions like these send clear signals to the people of South Africa.

271. But I am even more encouraged by actions being taken daily by cities and States, by trade unions and religious bodies, by students and faculties, by universities and other institutions and by individuals all over the world. I have in mind the tens of thousands of people who demonstrated against Botha's visit to Europe, the shop-workers in Dublin who have been on picket lines for six months because they refuse to sell South African goods, the dock-workers who refuse to unload South African exports, sportsmen and singers who reject offers of apartheid blood money. I have in mind the thousands of Americans who are demonstrating in front of the apartheid régime's offices in the United States and the many leaders who have gone to gaol demanding the liberation of South African leaders and an end to collusion with apartheid.

272. I trust that these actions of conscience will soon develop into a world-wide movement powerful enough to fulfil the purposes of the United Nations and enable the people of South Africa to attain their liberation.

273. At this session, the General Assembly has made a very significant decision by declaring at last that apartheid is an important matter.

274. As I indicated at the beginning of this debate, the title of the agenda item is anachronistic. We can no more speak of the "Government" of South Africa, for there is no Government in that land, but an illegitimate, illegal and criminal racist clique of oppressors. The issue is the destruction of apartheid and the liberation of South Africa.

275. As an African, I am all too conscious of the difficulties that our continent faces today. But let no one take advantage of that and perpetuate the humiliation of Africa. I have no doubt that the people of Africa will rather starve than accept humiliation of black men and women.

276. I appeal to you, Mr. President, and everyone here for solidarity at this critical time. The Special Committee against Apartheid for its part pledges its utmost efforts to promote concerted action by Governments and peoples in the noble cause of eliminating one of the gravest affronts to human dignity, to enable the people of South Africa to establish a non-racial, democratic society and to help the continent of Africa to complete its emancipation.

277. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their votes.

278. Mr. KORHONEN (Finland): The delegation of Finland did not vote against draft resolution A/39/L.28 and Add.1; yet I must emphasize that we have strong reservations on several of its paragraphs. Paragraphs 10 and 29 are contradictory to the principle of the universality of membership of the Organization. The same is true of paragraph 11. They are not in accordance with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations on the mandate of the Security Council. Our views on the recommendation of armed struggle are well known.

279. We are also, as a matter of principle, against singling out some Member States. We deeply regret that this year the resolution seems to include an increased number of references totally unacceptable to many delegations. We do not believe that a resolution of this kind will enhance the chances for success in our common struggle against the evil of apartheid.

280. Mr. FISCHER (Austria): Austria has consistently condemned the policy of apartheid as a particularly grave violation of human rights. We believe that it is a continuing challenge to the United Nations to contribute to the elimination of that abhorrent system of racial discrimination. For those reasons, we find ourselves in agreement with the general thrust of the texts submitted under this item.

281. However, there are a number of provisions in the draft resolutions which Austria cannot support. In particular, it has always been our position that the United Nations should concentrate all its efforts on bringing about political and social change by peaceful means and should not endorse armed struggle. We also oppose any provision which runs counter to the goal of universality of membership in the United Nations and its specialized agencies. Moreover, Austria believes that the General Assembly should respect the prerogatives of the Security Council with regard to coercive measures and therefore we cannot support any provisions which could be understood as an obligation to curtail relations with South Africa. We also wish to reiterate once again Austria's view that the arbitrary singling out of Member States in General Assembly resolutions is unjustified and does not promote the cause of the oppressed people of South Africa.

282. In the light of those considerations, the Austrian delegation had to abstain in the vote on draft resolution A/39/L.28 and Add.1 and vote against draft resolution A/39/L.30 and Add.1. However, we took a positive position on draft resolutions A/39/L.29 and Add.1, L.31 and Add.1, L.32 and Add.1 and L.33 and Add.1. In view of our strong opposition to apartheid, we also supported draft resolution A/39/L.36 and Add.1, in spite of reservations regarding some of its formulations in the operative part. Our vote on these draft resolutions is meant as an expression of our full support for the efforts to achieve a just and democratic society in South Africa based on the equal participation of all South Africans, regardless of the colour of their skin.

283. In conclusion, let me briefly explain our vote on the procedural motion that apartheid should be considered an important question. As far as the substance of the issue is concerned, we fully share the view that apartheid is indeed an extremely important question deserving special attention. In fact, it has always been considered as such by the international community. But, as a tactical manoeuvre, we had to oppose the proposal, since it is not in line with the requirements of equal and fair treatment of all amendments and proposals submitted by Member States.

284. Mr. McDONAGH (Ireland): I should like to explain the vote of the Irish delegation on the draft resolutions on the policies of apartheid which were placed before us today.

285. Ireland's attitude to apartheid has been expressed on many occasions in the Assembly. My Government considers that the policies of institutionalized racial discrimination practised by white South Africa are morally wrong; they are dangerous; they cause immense human suffering; and they directly contradict the fundamental values which we hold. Ireland does not have diplomatic relations with South Africa, nor do we have trade agreements, economic co-operation or cultural agreements with it. It is the policy of the Irish Government not to seek through official actions to promote trade with South Africa, and it has also acted firmly to discourage sports links.

286. On no other issue in the Assembly is there such unanimity as exists on apartheid. Irrespective of ideological or political differences among us, we all condemn it unreservedly. Yet, after more than 30 years of this unequivocal condemnation, the policy of apartheid remains intact.

287. It is true that the system has changed in some respects, but the changes have not affected the central issue, the policy of separate development. Ireland believes that the international community has rightly judged the new constitution of South Africa to be a sham. We are convinced that it is no more than an attempt by South Africa to encourage the compliance of Coloured peoples and Indians with the exclusion of the black majority from the political process and thus to further entrench the apartheid system.

288. The constitutional innovation is an example of how South Africa has twisted and turned its policies over the years in an attempt to counter and appease the indignation of the world community. It is further evidence that South Africa has never favoured justice. It has only been buying time to adapt and ensure the survival of the old policies in new circumstances. Today, South Africa remains what it was: a society where human rights are systematically violated, where minority rule is ruthlessly imposed, where freedom of political expression is relentlessly stifled, where basic political rights are persistently denied, and where the dignity of man is affronted on a daily basis. But while all of this is thoroughly reprehensible and we condemn it, South Africa under apartheid is, to its shame, even more than this. It is the only society in the world today which openly, explicitly and as a matter of public policy has built its political system on race. It is a society where skin pigment alone determines destiny, and since a man cannot change the colour of his skin, apartheid offers the black man no hope.

289. Ireland believes that those who control the political activities of South Africa today may just still have it in their power to determine that change will come by peaceful means. If they have fears, those fears are the product of their own policies. The way to hope and confidence must be the path of peaceful change, for change is inevitable. Black South Africans cannot be asked or expected to endure forever a repression which stifles all aspects of their lives and condemns their children to the same hopeless destiny.

290. My Government believes that if change in South Africa is not to come through violence, we have a clear obligation to promote peaceful change there in such other ways as are open to us. However gloomy the outlook may seem, we believe that it is of the utmost importance for the whole international community to try to find ways to bring white South Africa to face reality and the dangers of its present course before it is too late.

291. Ireland has frequently indicated in the Assembly and elsewhere that it would favour the imposition of a series of graduated sanctions against South Africa. We think these sanctions would have to be imposed by the Security Council, which alone has the power to adopt mandatory sanctions on behalf of the international community. The sanctions should be carefully selected and, once adopted, they should be fully implemented by all. Specifically, we feel that the existing arms embargo should be strengthened and more carefully monitored; that a mandatory oil embargo should be formally imposed; and that loans to and new investments in South Africa should be banned. If properly handled and carefully directed, the international pressure we might bring to bear on South Africa can, we believe, be made effective.

292. Until such time as South Africa can be brought to change, however, my Government believes it of the utmost importance to promote humanitarian and legal assistance to those who suffer under South Africa's discriminatory legislation and to give assistance to their families and to refugees from South Africa.

293. In keeping with the views of my Government on apartheid which I have just expressed, the delegation of Ireland was pleased to co-sponsor two of the seven draft resolutions which were placed before us today, that is, A/39/L.33 and Add.1 on the United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa and A/39/L.36 and Add.1 on concerted international action for the elimination of apartheid.

294. Ireland voted in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.29 and Add.1 on the programme of work of the Special Committee against Apartheid. Of course, our attitude to the recommendations in the report of the Special Committee must be understood in accordance with the general policy of my Government on apartheid outlined in this and previous statements of our position.

295. Ireland also voted in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.31 and Add.1, which requests the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against Apartheid in Sports to continue its work with a view to submitting the draft convention to the General Assembly at its fortieth session. We will, of course, examine the convention with interest. It is our hope that its terms will not give rise to problems of a legal or constitutional nature for my Government.

296. Ireland supported draft resolution A/39/L.32 and Add.1 on public information and public action against apartheid. My Government believes it is extremely important that information on the abominable practices of apartheid should have the widest possible dissemination. We are also deeply concerned about the plight of political prisoners in South Africa, and we will continue to give our support to all appropriate efforts for their release.

297. I turn now to those resolutions which my delegation was unable to support. Ireland voted against draft resolution A/39/L.28 and Add.1 on comprehensive sanctions against the apartheid régime and support to the liberation struggle in South Africa. We did so because there are many elements in the draft resolution which do not accord with the approach of my Government to the problem. My Government's commitment to the principle of universality of membership of the United Nations is well known. We also believe that the complete severance of all contacts with South Africa under a policy of total isolation, as called for by this draft resolution, would only have the effect of abandoning black South Africans still further to the whim of the South African authorities, who, without the reprobation of the international community, would then be even freer from restraints on their treatment of the black majority. Under a policy of total isolation, the outside world would have increased difficulty in continuing to monitor the situation of blacks. In such circumstances, Ireland would have the gravest fears for the welfare of black South Africans, especially in view of the tragic events which the world community has witnessed in South Africa in the past few weeks.

298. As I indicated earlier, Ireland supports the application by the Security Council of certain selective measures against South Africa; and we will be able to support many of the specific measures itemized in paragraph 11 of this draft resolution which are in accord with the policy of sanctions favoured by us. We have doubts, however, about the wisdom of calls for comprehensive sanctions at the present juncture. We believe that the right policy for the international community is one of steady and graduated pressure for change through carefully chosen, selective sanction measures which would be properly implemented by all.

299. We also cannot accept the explicit endorsement of the armed struggle in this resolution. We have made it clear in the past that we do not wish to see the Assembly endorse violence. Even if we can understand the sense of growing hopelessness and bitter frustration from which such violence might spring, my Government cannot condone it.

300. My delegation, as in previous years, voted against the draft resolution on relations between Israel and South Africa. In our view, this text singles out one Member State of the Assembly for selective condemnation in an inappropriate manner.

301. Mr. BAYONA MEDINA (Peru) (interpretation from Spanish): The delegation of Peru voted in favour of all of the draft resolutions on the question of apartheid in accordance with its position of firm rejection and condemnation of the system of apartheid and because it considers it necessary that the United Nations concentrate its efforts on achieving the definitive elimination of apartheid. However, it was not possible for my delegation to support the paragraphs of draft resolutions A/39/L.28 and Add.1 and L.30 and Add.1, which were put to a separate vote, because these contained selective references of condemnation of certain Member States.

302. We also wish to state that the delegation of Peru does not share the feeling that we should look for solutions to international problems by means of violence. We feel that this is not in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter. For this reason, my delegation expresses its reservations with respect to those paragraphs of draft resolution A/39/L.28 and Add.1 in which, directly or indirectly, encouragement is given to armed struggle.

303. Mr. DOS SANTOS (Mozambique): My Government's commitment to the struggle for the eradication of apartheid is well known. There is no need for further elaboration. Besides measures the international community can and must take to eradicate the abhorrent system of apartheid, it is up to the people of South Africa to choose ways and means to do so. We would have wished to see that doors to peaceful change are not closed. Each country or group of countries will choose the best ways to support that struggle.

304. We, for our part, reaffirm our political, moral and diplomatic support to the ANC in its struggle for the total eradication of apartheid and for the establishment of a non-racial and democratic society based on majority rule.

305. My delegation would like to reiterate the fact that the People's Republic of Mozambique is not in a position to apply economic sanctions against South Africa. Our voting pattern was dictated solely by our deeply-felt abhorrence to and repudiation of the policies of apartheid and everything stemming from them. It in no way signifies that we are in agreement with every word, wording or phrases in the resolutions. Our action is dictated by the sight of school children being crushed by military tanks, by the agonizing cries of helpless prisoners being tortured and by the brutal herding of 24 million people into concentration camps. Apartheid is not just evil; it is evil itself. These are the only reasons—there are no others—that dictate our voting pattern.

306. Mr. AOKI (Japan): Japan is firmly and steadfastly opposed to the practice of apartheid and extends maximum co-operation to United Nations efforts for the elimination of apartheid. Accordingly, my delegation has consistently tried to take a positive stance on the various draft resolutions proposed on this item, and it is in this spirit that we supported five draft resolutions, namely, A/39/L.29 and Add.1, L.31 and Add.1, L.32 and Add.1, L.33 and Add.1 and L.36 and Add.1. Indeed, we co-sponsored draft resolution A/39/L.33 and Add.1 on the United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa, whose efforts we value highly. Unfortunately, however, my delegation could not support the two remaining resolutions because we consider them to be excessively confrontational and unproductive.

307. My delegation voted against draft resolution A/39/L.28 and Add.1 because it contains many elements, such as those in paragraphs 10, 14, 15, 19 to 22 and 29 to 31, which my Government cannot support. My delegation cannot support other elements in the resolution as well, such as the singling out of a particular country for blame. In this connection, we join many other speakers in deploring what has happened this morning. We firmly believe that the manoeuvre and subsequent confusion we just witnessed will not serve to advance our cause in the fight against apartheid and risk being detrimental to the credibility of the Organization. We hope that this will not recur. Neither can we support the call for comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa. My country does not believe that comprehensive sanctions would in fact be an effective and expeditious means for achieving a peaceful solution to the question of apartheid.

308. Let me next turn to draft resolution A/39/L.36 and Add.1. My delegation supported this resolution because it is in line with Japan's basic position of applying maximum pressure, through peaceful means, to induce South Africa to abandon its apartheid policy and of giving moral and humanitarian support to those who struggle for the eradication of apartheid. My delegation wishes, in particular, to commend the authors of this resolution for their efforts to avoid introducing unnecessary and controversial elements so as to gain as wide support as possible. We welcome this new attempt and hope that this approach will continue in the years to come.

309. However, my delegation has reservations on some of the various concrete measures proposed in the resolution. For example, paragraph 5 goes beyond the allocation of responsibilities provided for in the Charter. Furthermore, paragraph 7 contains an element whose implementation my country cannot ensure. With reference to sub-paragraph 8 (b), my delegation would like to reiterate its conviction that the solution of the problem of apartheid should be sought in a peaceful manner through dialogue between the parties concerned.

310. Finally, I should like to refer briefly to draft resolution A/39/L.29 and Add.1, which has just been adopted. In paragraph 3 of this resolution, the Assembly endorses the report of the Special Committee against Apartheid [A/39/22]. Although my delegation has voted in favour of the resolution, we cannot accept some of the conclusions and recommendations contained in paragraphs 284 through 418 of the report. My delegation is also concerned about paragraphs 4 and 5, which give the Special Committee against Apartheid an excessively wide margin of discretion. We earnestly hope that the Special Committee will manage its budget efficiently. In particular, we hope that the Special Committee will report back to the General Assembly on how it spent the $400,000 allocated to it under paragraph 5.

311. Mr. AYE (Burma): In keeping with Burma's firm stand against the policies of apartheid, my delegation has just cast positive votes on all the draft resolutions before us on this question. However, we regret to note that some paragraphs in draft resolutions A/39/L.28 and Add.1 and A/39/L.30 and Add.1 have selectively singled out specific countries for condemnation. Accordingly, my delegation would like to express its reservations as to the language in this respect. With regard to the vote taken earlier today on this subject of whether the question of apartheid requires a two-thirds majority, my delegation would like to clarify that our abstention in the vote on this subject does not in any way detract from our consistent and continuing stand against the policies of apartheid. But my delegation is of the view that the vote taken this morning on the motion was influenced by motivations that are extraneous to the anti-apartheid struggle.

312. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): Let me begin by expressing our appreciation to all those Member States who supported the elimination of hostile references to the United States from these resolutions. The United States has repeatedly made clear its abhorrence for the system of apartheid, whose racist premises and practices we condemn. In the light of the principles of equal rights and equal justice, which are the foundation of our way of life, there can be no justification for a political system that deprives the majority of South Africa's citizens of their political and civil rights.

313. In his proclamation on Human Rights Day this week, President Reagan made clear the strong desire of the American people to see an end to the manifest injustices of the apartheid system of racial discrimination in South Africa. The abusive practices arising from that system have once again led to violence in South Africa which has claimed the lives of scores of its black citizens. Clearly, all members of this body, and in particular the United States, passionately demand urgent steps to bring the apartheid system to an end and to relieve all South Africans of the burdens of this tragedy. Should we encourage an approach that exacerbates the potential for violence and destruction? Should we follow a course of destructive disengagement that will isolate black South Africans from the concrete support and aid of other members of the international community? Or should we seek to build a future even as we destroy apartheid, by making effective use of the levers of change that offer black South Africans the economic, technical and organizational base they need in order to pursue their struggle for justice.

314. The United States believes that only the latter course effectively fights against present injustice without sacrificing future hopes and possibilities. We believe that many aspects of the resolutions before us would undermine the basis for building that future and deprive black South Africans of the powerful tools for change present in the South African economy. We are opposed to destroying those tools through a policy of economic sanctions that would deprive black South Africans of the wages, skills and organizational base they need in their quest for justice. We believe that effective means must be employed to assure that those tools will be available and will be used to oppose the apartheid system and the abusive practices that flow from it. Because of these beliefs, we have voted against those resolutions which are inconsistent with them.

315. The PRESIDENT: The representative of the Pan Africanist Congress of Azania has asked to make a statement in reply. I call on the representative in accordance with the decision taken by the General Assembly at its 3rd meeting of the present session.

316. Mr. MAKHANDA (Pan Africanist Congress of Azania): On behalf of the dispossessed, oppressed, exploited and discriminated against struggling masses of Azania and on behalf of the Pan Africanist Congress of Azania, the custodian of their genuine aspirations, allow me, Sir, in this our humble intervention to make a few observations on the statement made this morning by the representative of the United States.

317. The representative of the United States appealed to the sense of justice and fairness of the General Assembly in considering its amendments which would delete certain references to the United States in the resolutions dealing with my country. Had I been the representative of the United States, I would have couched the appeal differently. I would certainly not have used the words "justice" and "fairness" in this international forum, for to do so would be further to expose that country's double standard approach to international issues, especially the issues of apartheid.

318. As the guardian of international peace and security, in what area has the United States Administration shown fairness and justice? Massacres have been perpetrated against human lives in the Middle East, in southern Africa and in Latin America, areas where the United States of America could have made a difference if it believed in justice and fairness. In Azania, hundreds of schoolchildren were massacred in 1976 in what has come to be known as the Soweto uprising. On which side was the United States—that of justice and fairness, or big business interests? Since September this year, our people have been burying their dead, killed by the racist régime, and have been arrested. Just today this was mentioned by the Chairman of the Special Committee of the members of the United Democratic Front and also members of the National Forum Committee. Others have been detained, others have been tortured, and still others are languishing in the dungeons of Robben Island. One of our leaders, Zephania Mothopeng, who has been to Robben Island three times, will have a total of over 40 years in gaol if he lives. Six teenagers, schoolchildren of the PAC were sentenced to natural life imprisonment in 1963 for upholding the principles on which the United States of America is founded and is no longer practising. Is the present Administration invoking these principles of justice and fairness in its policy of constructive engagement towards Azania to stop the above? Indeed, one may ask the representative of the United States: is there a principle of justice and fairness in the representation of the blacks and other minorities? I use the term "blacks" very guardedly, since in the language of the PAC we do not recognize the compartmentalization of peoples, but believe in one human race. However, since it is within the framework of the system here, I will use it. I ask: is there any fairness and justice, for instance, in the representation of the blacks in this country? Statistics just released have shown that the people of African descent in the United States are disproportionately represented, and one would be hard pressed to define the system under which they live as a democratic one. If justice and fairness were a concept not dependent on God, we in Azania would have long since given up our struggle. We are struggling, and will continue to do so, because it is His justice and fairness we are struggling for in Azania and not that defined by the representative of the United States and others.

319. On a different level, one would have expected the representative of the United States to understand what it means to be denationalized, to be insecure from the cradle to the grave, to be persecuted and tagged and branded like an animal because of the pass laws, coming as he does from a people that has had to endure all of these dehumanizing acts.

Mr. Farah Dirir (Djibouti), Vice-President, took the Chair.

320. Last but not least, may I take this opportunity, Mr. President, through you to reply to the assertion of the representative of Australia that the national liberation movements of Azania do not represent the people under apartheid. I would say only that his negation of the intelligence of the oppressed and dispossessed masses of Azania is to be regretted and that the statement he has made on this issue is unfortunate indeed. My people is a democratic people, my people subscribes to the ideals of the Pan Africanist Congress, my people subscribes to the ideas of the African National Congress and other groups such as the National Forum Committee, of which Bishop Tutu is a member, and the United Democratic Front.

AGENDA ITEM 34

Law of the Sea: Report of the Secretary-General

321. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, who will introduce draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1 entitled "Law of the Sea".

322. Mr. HYERA (United Republic of Tanzania): The Assembly has before it draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1, sponsored by 35 States. On behalf of the delegations of sponsoring States, I have the honour, for which I am grateful, to introduce the draft resolution. As usual, it is the product of exhaustive consultations among interested delegations. It is, of necessity, a compromise draft, which represents no more than a common denominator of many differing interests and does not, therefore, purport to meet all expectations. I wish, first, to thank all those delegations that took part in the negotiations on the draft resolution for their co-operation and spirit of accommodation.

323. This is the second year the General Assembly has had to address such a resolution, following the adoption at Montego Bay of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. The subject is, therefore, not new. Nor, in fact, are most of the contents of the draft resolution.

324. Paragraph 1 once more recalls the historic significance of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea as an important contribution to the maintenance of peace, justice and progress for all peoples of the world.

325. Paragraph 2 expresses the satisfaction of the General Assembly at the very large number of signatures affixed to the Convention—something on which I shall have something to say shortly—as well as the number of ratifications deposited with the Secretary-General.

326. Now that the period when the Convention was opened for signature has expired, an appeal is being made to all States to ratify or accede to the Convention at the earliest possible date so as to enable the Convention to enter into force as soon as possible. This appeal is reflected in paragraph 3, which calls upon all States that have not yet done so to consider ratifying or acceding to the Convention at the earliest possible date so as to allow the effective entry into force of the new legal régime for the uses of the sea and its resources.

327. Paragraph 4 calls upon all States to safeguard the unified character of the Convention and related resolutions adopted therewith.

328. Paragraph 5 calls upon States to desist from taking actions which undermine the Convention or defeat its object and purpose. This paragraph refers to any actions that may have been carried out, or might be contemplated for the future, aimed at adversely affecting the Convention or defeating its object and purpose.

329. Paragraph 6 expresses the appreciation of the General Assembly for the effective execution by the Secretary-General of the major programme in law of the sea affairs under chapter 25 of the activities of the medium-term plan. Chapter 25 is a new chapter that has recently been incorporated in the medium-term plan of the United Nations for 1984-1989, and it is encouraging to note that the activities outlined therein have begun to be implemented effectively and efficiently. The Secretary-General, through his Special Representative, Mr. Satya Nandan, and his team, has done a commendable job on matters concerning the law of the sea, and deserves our appreciation and encouragement.

330. Paragraph 7 further expresses the Assembly's appreciation for the report of the Secretary-General in respect to General Assembly resolution 38/59 A and requests the Secretary-General to continue the activities outlined therein, special emphasis being placed on the work of the Preparatory Commission for the International Sea-Bed Authority and for the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, including the implementation of resolution II of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea. Resolution II deals with the protection of preparatory investments in pioneer activities related to polymetallic nodules.

331. Through paragraph 8, the General Assembly will approve the programme of meetings of the Preparatory Commission for 1985. During 1985 the Preparatory Commission is scheduled to hold its regular session at Kingston from 11 March to 4 April and to hold a summer meeting at Geneva or Kingston or in New York. The venue of this meeting will be decided upon by the Preparatory Commission during its spring session.

332. Paragraph 9 calls upon the Secretary-General to continue to assist States in the implementation of the Convention and in the development of a consistent and uniform approach to the new legal régime thereunder, as well as in their national, subregional and regional efforts towards the full realization of the benefits therefrom, and invites the agencies and bodies within the United Nations system to co-operate and lend assistance in these endeavours. This is an important responsibility of the Secretary-General, and becomes particularly significant as States proceed to implement the Convention, especially in relation to areas under national jurisdiction. It is important that the Secretary-General should provide advice and assistance to States in order that State practice develop in a coherent and uniform manner consistent with the Convention. It is equally important that States be enabled to derive maximum benefit from the Convention and incorporate development of marine resources within their overall national development programmes.

333. In paragraph 10, the General Assembly requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fortieth session on developments relating to the Convention and on the implementation of the present resolution; and in paragraph 11, the last one, the General Assembly decides to include this item on the agenda of its fortieth session.

334. Having highlighted the salient features of the draft resolution, I should like briefly to refer to the subject of the Hamilton Shirley Amerasinghe Fellowship on the Law of the Sea, launched in 1980 in honour of the late Shirley Amerasinghe, a former President of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea. As will be noted in the Secretary-General's report, as a result of the generous contribution of States, institutions and individuals, the target figure has now been reached to enable the award of at least one fellowship each year from the fund's income. I wish to commend and thank all those who have made these contributions and to appeal to others to do likewise—not only in honour of that distinguished man, but also to advance the cause to which he devoted much of his life, for which we are all deeply indebted to him.

335. May I also at this point request the Assembly to remember one of the most outstanding persons who made a special contribution to the codification and development of the law of the sea, a man who, unfortunately, passed away this year—Mr. Constantin A. Stavropoulos, who was former Legal Counsel of the United Nations and the first Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the Law of the Sea before being succeeded by Mr. Bernardo Zuleta, who, unfortunately, passed away last year.

336. The services of this eminent lawyer, Constantin Stavropoulos, to the Organization, and to the Law of the Sea in particular, go back to the very early days of the United Nations. He was a key participant in the 1958 and 1960 Conferences on the Law of the Sea, and since the United Nations decided to deal with issues of the sea-bed and to convene the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, he had been leading the United Nations team that helped organize and service those meetings until his country, Greece, decided after the Caracas session to charge him with responsibilities in his Government. His international stature makes it unnecessary for me to attempt to relate his well-known contributions to the United Nations. The United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea will remain a lasting monument to all its eminent architects, and Mr. Constantin Stavropoulos is certainly one of them.

337. I believe I am voicing the sentiments of all friends in the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea by stating that we have lost one of the great men in the Organization. I request the delegation of Greece to transmit to the family of Mr. Stavropoulos and to the Government of Greece our expression of deep sorrow and sympathy.

338. The subject before the Assembly is of such momentous—indeed, critical—importance to humanity that I feel that we can never too often remind ourselves of what the Convention on the Law of the Sea offers and what it means to mankind.

339. The United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, worked out and adopted with the commitment and full sponsorship of the General Assembly, pursuant to its responsibility set out in the Charter, has been rightly described as the second most historic institution for international peace and co-operation after the Charter of the United Nations. For, dealing with the uses of more than two thirds of our planet's total area, it addresses important issues and pursues our own commitments under the Charter.

340. Let me quickly draw the attention of the Assembly to some of the commitments and promises

we have made through our acceptance of the Charter. I will merely paraphrase what we said. We have committed ourselves to maintain international peace and security—of course—and to that end inter alia to bring about by peaceful means, and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace (Article 1, para. 1); to reaffirm faith in, among other things, the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small (second preambular paragraph); to achieve international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character (Article 1, para. 3); to harmonize through the United Nations the actions of Member States in the attainment of the purposes of the United Nations (Article 1, para. 4); and to employ international machinery for the promotion of economic and social advancement of all peoples (last preambular paragraph).

341. The Convention seeks to achieve all those purposes. It creates and develops international law where it was admittedly lacking or was in a state of confusion; it lays a sound foundation for harmonious uses of the oceans and for effective co-operation over the uses of a vast international area; it establishes conditions for justice and prosperity for all; and it establishes machinery for the peaceful settlement of disputes, actual and potential. In so doing, it offers a singular opportunity to prevent an otherwise very likely eruption of world conflicts, the dimensions and consequences of which cannot but be unfortunate.

342. It should be stressed that the Convention is not only a product of exhaustive negotiations and a practical attempt to balance differing interests, but a fairly generous concession to the more economically developed States.

343. Having myself been personally involved in the negotiations throughout the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, I am convinced that there is no alternative to the present text of the Convention and that there can be no alibi for not becoming party to it, nor any for not respecting the package we all worked hard to achieve.

344. In conclusion, I wish, on behalf of the sponsors—and I believe I am also voicing the sentiments of most delegations—to join the Secretary-General in expressing great satisfaction at the unprecedented support for the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, as signified by the 159 signatures to it by 9 December. We believe that, as the Secretary-General observed on 10 December, the Convention has indeed irreversibly transformed the political map of the world and that future developments in the law of the sea will doubtless revolve around the Convention.

345. I hope the draft resolution will receive the Assembly's overwhelming, if not unanimous, support.

346. Mr. MAQUEIRA (Chile) (interpretation from Spanish): In my capacity as Chairman of the Group of 77 of the Preparatory Commission for the International Sea-Bed Authority, which meets at the headquarters of that Authority at Kingston, it is my honour to address the Assembly in connection with agenda item 34, entitled "Law of the sea".

347. We have taken note with interest of the report submitted by the Secretary-General (A/39/647 and Corr.1 and Add.1) in connection with activities relating to the law of the sea and issues developed by the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the Law of the Sea as well as other departments of the Secretariat and agencies of the United Nations in this sphere.

348. We are pleased to note the efforts aimed at ensuring universal acceptance of the Convention and its uniform and co-ordinated implementation. We are confident that the Secretariat will continue to fulfil its role of providing assistance and information in all the areas covered by the Convention, as it has done thus far.

349. On 9 December last the deadline for becoming a signatory of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea was met, and the 159 States that signed it demonstrate the solid and permanent commitment of the international community to that international instrument.

350. The normal process of distinguishing in treaties and conventions between signatory States and ratifying States and adherents has special significance in the case of this Convention.

351. That is true because of the fact that a number of countries of great technological and industrial might, in the course of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, as a means of facilitating acceptance of the Convention, asked for an interim system to be established which would make it possible for them to conduct activities on the sea-bed beyond national jurisdiction until the entry into force of the Convention.

352. The developing countries, demonstrating a spirit of pragmatism and flexibility, agreed to negotiate a system of that type since signature of the Convention was the enabling condition for benefiting from the Convention. Thus resolution II, adopted by that Conference, contains the investment system to which the industrialized countries aspired.

353. The hopes of the Group of 77 to contribute, through its concessions in this way, to the universalization of the Convention turned to disappointment and regret, since only some of the countries that would benefit from this interim system, showing good faith and vision for the future, joined the international community by signing the Convention and today stand side by side with the developing countries in getting under way this complex mechanism within the Preparatory Commission.

354. None the less, the three most industrialized countries, those that insisted the most on the interim system, are not signatories to the Convention.

355. More serious still is their insistence on arriving at an alternative system on the basis of national legislation and agreements of restricted participation of States outside the Convention, to exploit the resources of the sea-bed on the basis of anachronistic and selfish principles which they themselves had recently abandoned. Thus the Declaration of Principles Governing the Sea-Bed and the Ocean Floor, and the Subsoil Thereof, beyond the Limits of National Jurisdiction [resolution 2749(XXV)] came about, and was adopted by consensus, which provides that the sea-bed beyond the limits of national jurisdiction is the common heritage of mankind. The concrete expression of this resolution is part XI of the Convention. Those same countries now want to disregard and, what is more serious, to deny those principles, using legal arguments that only serve to conceal a regrettable lack of political will.

356. It is becoming customary, although none the less unacceptable, for some industrialized countries to require concessions from the developing countries in order to reach a consensus and then, once they are obtained, to disregard the political compromise on which they were based, doing harm to the multilateral negotiating process that is essential to the progressive development of international law and to the promotion of international co-operation and peace.

357. A recent example of this, in addition to the one I have mentioned, is that of a Western European country which sought and obtained in the Preparatory Commission this year a settlement of a specific situation affecting it, with the argument that that would facilitate the signature of the law of the sea Convention—something that could have been done without that special treatment.

358. Once again the Group of 77 agreed. Then on 9 December it happened that that country, designated to be the seat of one of the organs established by the Convention, refrained from signing it, although it continues to be a party to alternative systems that are contrary to the Convention. It is not possible to claim to be host to an organ established by the Convention and at the same time to conduct activities contrary to it. To obtain the headquarters of a permanent organ is, after all, an honour and recognition of the country which obtains it. Only a concrete, resolute commitment to the international agreement can be consistent with that honour, and it is regrettable that in the case of that State it is clear that such a commitment is not present.

359. Nor is it possible to aspire to a selective, piecemeal approach to the Convention. Those who are not prepared to assume the obligations of the Convention cannot aspire to benefit from its provisions. The United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea is a legal and political entity.

360. Once again I must reiterate the position of the Group of 77, to the effect that the Convention contains the sole international legally acceptable régime for activities on the sea-bed beyond the limits of national jurisdiction and that the Group rejects any agreement based on national legislation which claims to regulate those activities. The Group of 77 emphatically affirms that such agreements are contrary to the letter and spirit of the Convention and that they generate no rights whatsoever.

361. The Group of 77 here reaffirms its commitment to supporting the Convention, because that international instrument, in addition to codifying and developing the norms applicable to the sea, ensures an excellent balance between the different uses of the oceans and between the individual interests of each State and those of the international community at large.

362. The role of the United Nations is that of a builder of peace, a lasting unambiguous peace, where rights and obligations are shared equitably so that no one feels it is contributing more than it receives. There is near here a plaque which says "Respect for the rights of others is peace".

363. The Convention has achieved respect for the rights of others, and it is for that reason perhaps the most significant contribution of the United Nations to the essential objectives of the Charter.

364. That is why the Group of 77 will always be prepared to try to resolve difficulties in order to make it possible for there to be an effective implementation of the norms of the new legal order governing the oceans. Demonstration of this is the pragmatic way in which we have approached the substantive work of the Preparatory Commission, working on the basis of consensus and with experience prevailing over ideology.

365. It is very possible that, thanks to this approach, at the coming session of the Preparatory Commission which will be held from 11 March to 4 April next year, the registry of operators in the international zone will begin, and that will demonstrate that rules of access to the sea-bed as established in the Convention and in resolution II are not mere theories and that they will become concrete reality.

366. This week was the deadline for signing the Convention. This reminds me of an old Brazilian song that says: "When one dreams alone, dreams remain just that—dreams; but when we dream together, then reality begins."

367. That there are 159 signatories of the Convention means that that reality has begun and that there is no viable alternative to this Convention.

368. On behalf of the Group of 77, I invite all the countries that have not yet done so to adhere to that instrument and to join the generous and noble cause of establishing peace and order in the oceans.

369. Mr. YAKOVLEV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (interpretation from Russian): The Soviet Union, like the other socialist countries, consistently supports the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea and firmly advocates unswerving and strict implementation thereof by all States of the world, and the bringing into effect of a comprehensive legal order for peace and co-operation in the world's oceans, as established by the Convention. As was correctly noted by the Secretary-General in a recent statement, the fact that the Convention has been signed by 159 States and relevant parties clearly shows the unprecedented nature of a universal document of such a comprehensive nature as this. We should like to express our special gratitude for the Secretary-General's efforts in support of this important international Convention which ensures a harmonized, legal régime—harmonized among States—for two thirds of our earth's surface.

370. The Soviet Union was one of the first countries to sign the Convention, and we attach particular importance to the fact that it has been signed by almost all the States of the five continents of the world, with only one exception. This shows essentially the total isolation and condemnation by the world community of those forces trying, for their own selfish, narrow interests, to boycott the Convention so as to undermine it through one-sided arbitrary actions and thus to undermine a harmonized convention for a régime of the world's oceans.

371. The international importance of the Convention is becoming clearer and more universally recognized every day. It is the outcome of lengthy negotiations and compromise agreements, taking into account the interests of all groups of States and peoples. The Convention resolves in one single unified act, as it were, the most acute and complex questions of a legal régime for the seas and oceans today. It defines the rights and obligations of all States and creates a single streamlined system for international regulation, under international law, of all the main types and forms of utilization of the resources and space of the world's oceans.

372. The Convention serves as an example for resolving important, complex global problems in the United Nations, that is, through negotiations. It is an important contribution to the strengthening of peace, security and co-operation of States as regards the seas. Without any doubt, it is an important achievement of recent decades, implementation of which is in accordance with the aspirations of all peoples and will promote the conversion of the world's oceans into a zone of peace and co-operation in the interests of present and future generations.

373. The main obstacle to bringing into force the harmonized provisions of the Convention remains the United States policy of one-sided division and annexation of the resources of the international sea-bed region, which the Convention declares to be the common heritage of mankind. At the same time, the United States and some of its Western allies, while refusing to sign the Convention and carrying out unilateral actions circumventing its provisions, are trying to derive separate advantages from its provisions in the economic zone, on the continental shelf and elsewhere.

374. However, such a selective, arbitrary approach is contradictory, because the Convention is one indivisible whole, a body of compromise agreements among all States, which does not permit the use or enjoyment of some benefits to the detriment of all other requirements covered by the Convention. Apart from the Convention and the specific régime for the sea-bed that it establishes, unilateral actions to establish economic zones and to arrogate the world's oceans and their resources are not legitimate.

375. The policy of one-sided actions and claims which circumvent the Convention serves today as a manifestation of an imperialist policy to divide and annex those spaces and resources. This is irresponsible and adventuristic in nature and is reflected in the fact that it undermines the very bases for the utilization of the world's oceans for communications, trade and co-operation; it harms the interests of all countries, including those carrying out this policy.

376. We cannot be quiet either about recent attempts by some States to hammer together a mini-treaty to be applied in a way parallel to the Convention's régime. Recently, in Geneva, the United States and seven Western countries signed a so-called temporary agreement on questions relating to the deep-water areas of the sea-bed. That was an attempt to legalize the aspirations of a number of monopolies to annex and divide the most promising sectors of the international sea-bed, in circumvention and violation of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. This action is aimed, to the detriment of the Convention and the legitimate interests of other States, at ensuring uncontrolled activities in the exploration and exploitation of sea-bed resources. It is a separate action in contradiction with the letter and the spirit of the Convention. It has been condemned by the overwhelming majority of States Parties and the Preparatory Commission for the International Sea-Bed Authority.

377. We regret that among the participants in the separate agreement there are some States which have signed the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. As we know, the generally recognized norms of international law obligate States which sign an international treaty to refrain from any actions aimed at undermining that treaty. Naturally, that applies fully to the Convention itself, which is universal in nature.

378. The activities of the Preparatory Commission of the International Sea-Bed Authority have been very important in strengthening the régime of the Convention. We note with pleasure the progress it achieved at its last sessions. Despite the opposition of some circles which have tried to drag out and make its work difficult, the Commission has succeeded in working out, and adopting provisionally, a significant part of the rules for the registration of pioneer investors for activities connected with polymetallic nodules, and steps have been taken to create detailed norms for the exploration and exploitation of the resources of the international sea-bed area.

379. It is important that the Commission should, without any delay, carry out the elaboration of the rules of registration for those pioneer investors and move on to their registration, as flows from the Convention and the appropriate decisions of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea. A great deal depends on successful progress in the Preparatory Commission's work in reaching mutually acceptable solutions in this area with respect to the establishment of the International Sea-Bed Authority, as well as speeding the process of ratification of the Convention by States and its entry into force.

380. The report prepared by the Secretariat reflects the strengthening of support for the Convention from the various groups of States and its growing effect on their policies in various maritime areas. In particular, attention is very rightly given here to questions relating to the implementation of the provisions of the Convention in national legislation and the practical activities of various States. Of great importance, too, is the continuing intensification of United Nations activities and those of other relevant international bodies, aimed at supporting the Convention and practically implementing its provisions.

381. A certain defect of the report is to be found in the fact that it does not draw a clear distinction between States that signed the Convention and are implementing it and those that are violating it and trying to undermine it by illegal, one-sided actions. Thus, it is very wrong to equate legislation concerning the Convention and unilateral acts designed to violate it. The ongoing implementation of the decisions of the United Nations in support of the Convention requires that the Secretariat correct this mistake.

382. On the basis of these decisions and in the requirements of objectivity we must not allow the actions of those who are opposing and violating the Convention to be covered up. The draft resolution now before the Assembly reflects the results of consultations among various States, in accordance with the goals and principles of the Convention. It is aimed against any unilateral one-sided action. It reflects the demand that all refrain from one-sided actions and strictly comply with the unified single Convention in its basic provisions. The draft is aimed at further intensifying the activities of the Preparatory Commission to establish the International Sea-Bed Authority and at strengthening the activities of the United Nations and the relevant specialized agencies in support of the Convention.

383. In supporting the adoption of this resolution, the Soviet delegation stresses the urgent need, without delay, to end any and all one-sided actions aimed at undermining the Convention.

384. We salute Cuba and all those countries which have already ratified the Convention. We call upon all States to follow this example. Ratification of the Convention and its entry into force will strengthen a régime of peace and co-operation on the seas and open up new paths for utilizing the sea and its resources in the interests of this and future generations.

385. Mr. KIRSCH (Canada): Canada continues to attach great importance to the goal of achieving a universally acceptable régime for the management of the world's oceans and their resources. For this reason we welcome the fact that a number of States have signed the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea in the past few weeks, thus bringing the total number of signatories to the Convention to 159. As we can see, this represents a near consensus within the international community with respect to the legal basis for regulation of and co-operation in ocean affairs. The Convention, in our view, remains the only means by which to bring certainty into the international law of the sea. Despite this conclusion, unfortunately, the uncertainty that the Convention was intended to clear up still persists to some extent. Some States, including major industrialized States, have not signed the Convention. We regret this fact, but continue to hope that these States will maintain their interest in the Convention and at some stage will reconsider their position.

386. The reconsideration that I have just referred to depends, we believe, to a great extent on the outcome of the work of the Preparatory Commission for the International Sea-Bed Authority and for the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea. It is our hope, and this is the goal toward which the Canadian delegation is working, that the Preparatory Commission will succeed in formulating rules and regulations for sea-bed mining and the operation of the Enterprise that will be practical, workable and economical. We would like to see a sea-bed-mining system that works and not one that discourages potential sea-bed miners from participating in the process. It should be a system that is seen to operate in the interests and for the benefit of all States. If the sea-bed-mining system is to be truly effective and bring about the financial and technological benefits envisaged in the Convention, the major sea-bed miners must be a part of it. We hope that this participation will be one of the consequences of the work of the Preparatory Commission.

387. My delegation believes that the Preparatory Commission has made a good beginning in the pursuit of the objective of achieving an effective sea-bed mining régime. Of course, we must recall that it is only at the very preliminary stages of its deliberations, and it cannot be said to have proceeded much beyond the stage of identifying issues. My delegation believes that such a thorough, measured and prudent approach is most appropriate for dealing with the difficult and technically complex questions before the Preparatory Commission. It is generally accepted that, as a practical matter, sea-bed mining is a long way down the road. Therefore, there is no need to arrive at hasty conclusions. We do have sufficient time to make a careful analysis of issues and balancing of interests. We should thus in the process be able to develop a balanced and practical system which meets the concerns of all States.

388. The same holds true to a great extent with respect to the work that is being carried out in the Preparatory Commission on the pioneer investment régime. Again, we believe that the approach to the development of rules and regulations on the registration of the claims of pioneer investors should be careful and deliberate. In fact, the most difficult and pressing issue with respect to pioneer investment is something that is not even being discussed in the meetings of the Preparatory Commission itself, namely, the resolution of overlaps of mine-site claims. Once that problem is resolved, the other issues should be easier to address. The Preparatory Commission must make every effort to retain the main elements of resolution II. This includes acknowledging and respecting all sea-bed mining interests which have been identified in the resolution. Circumstances have changed drastically since the time resolution II was negotiated. Some of its provisions have been overtaken by events. The timetable and arbitration clauses, for example, have not been observed by anyone. Nevertheless, we must be realistic and acknowledge the most important consideration to achieve the purpose and object of the resolution, namely, the development of an effective sea-bed mining system that allows for the participation of all potential sea-bed miners.

389. I referred a moment ago to the fact that some of the important developments that took place at the 1984 session of the Preparatory Commission were the result of extensive informal consultations among the States concerned and were the object of little or no discussion at the meetings of the Preparatory Commission.

390. This is the case, in particular, of an understanding that was reached at the Geneva meeting among the States that had announced their intention to submit applications for their registration as pioneer investors. That understanding, which is called the "Understanding on Resolution of Conflicts among Applicants for Registration as Pioneer Investors", relates to the procedure and a timetable for resolution of any conflicts that might arise from overlapping of areas claimed by these applicants. On 31 August 1984, the Chairman of the Preparatory Commission made a statement in which he reported that "an understanding has been achieved amongst the parties concerned", the parties concerned being, to our knowledge, France, India, Japan and the Soviet Union. That statement and the understanding itself are contained in document LOS/PCN/L.8. Exactly the same statement was repeated by the Chairman of the Preparatory Commission on 4 September and is contained in paragraph 8 of document LOS/PCN/L.13.

391. Despite the statements made by the Chairman of the Preparatory Commission, it appears that some confusion has arisen with respect to the nature and scope of that understanding. We wish to refer in this regard to the report of the Secretary-General on the law of the sea [A/39/647 and Corr.1 and Add.1]. That document is a very informative and well-prepared paper, which should be of assistance to States in a number of areas. It contains in particular, in its paragraphs 80 to 93, a description of the work accomplished by the Preparatory Commission during 1984. In general, that description is a good and accurate summary; but, perhaps as a result of an obvious and commendable concern for brevity, the document contains two statements that, in our view, deserve further clarification.

392. Paragraph 86 of the report states the following: "At the end of the Geneva meeting the Chairman announced that an understanding had been reached on the procedure and on a timetable for conflict resolution for the first group of applicants." Paragraph 83 states, inter alia, the following:

> "The Commission has decided that, following the adoption of the rules for the registration of pioneer investors, it will proceed to register the first group of applicants at the third session of the Preparatory Commission, to be held in Kingston from 11 March to 5 April 1985. In the mean time the Commission has requested the first group of applicants to resolve as soon as possible conflicts with respect to the overlapping of the areas claimed."

393. Paragraph 86 of the report is ambiguous in that it fails to specify, as had been done twice by the Chairman of the Preparatory Commission, that this understanding was not reached by the Preparatory Commission but by the parties concerned, that is, once again to our knowledge, France, India, Japan and the Soviet Union.

394. As to paragraph 83, it simply is not accurate, because it is based on language used in the understanding in question that has not been endorsed, directly or indirectly, by the Preparatory Commission and has not been the object of any decision by the Preparatory Commission.

395. The very notion of a first group of applicants has not been used by the Preparatory Commission or by its Chairman, except with reference to the terms of the understanding that was reached by the four States concerned. The only decision that the Preparatory Commission itself took with respect to registration of pioneer investors is contained in paragraph 14 of document LOS/PCN/L.13, and it is to "complete the consideration of the draft rules on pioneer investors and adopt them". That is the only decision that was taken by the Preparatory Commission in that regard. Both part I and part II of the understanding that I mentioned earlier, therefore, reflect the views of the parties to that understanding only and as such have no effect on other States.

396. We are aware, of course, that the report of the Secretary-General was prepared for information purposes only and, as I indicated earlier, it is a very helpful document. It is clear also that the only authoritative statements on the work of the Preparatory Commission are those contained in the documents produced at its meetings. Nevertheless, given the misperceptions that may have developed with respect to the stage reached by the Preparatory Commission in its consideration of the registration of pioneer investors, we thought it might be helpful to clarify the matter at this stage.

397. Although we need not proceed from a sense of urgency, there is still a great deal of ground to be covered and much work to do in the context of the Preparatory Commission. We must address the issues adequately and comprehensively. For its part, Canada will spare no effort in contributing to a successful outcome of its work. To a very great extent, the future of the Convention depends on the success achieved by the Preparatory Commission.

398. Mr. SWINNEN (Belgium) (interpretation from French): I wish first of all to reply to the criticisms levelled at the provisional arrangement of 3 August 1984. My delegation reaffirms that that agreement is in complete conformity with one of the fundamental principles of international law—that is, the peaceful settlement of disputes. It is in no way designed to substitute another régime for the one provided for in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.

399. The General Assembly has before it the report of the Secretary-General [A/39/647 and Corr.1 and Add.1]. That document is extremely useful and enlightening in many respects, and my delegation expresses its appreciation to the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the Law of the Sea.

400. My delegation has examined with particular interest the chapter concerning the proceedings and results of the second session of the Preparatory Commission of the International Sea-Bed Authority and the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, which took place at Kingston from 19 March to 13 April 1984. Belgium carefully followed the work of that session as an observer and, beginning with the next session of the Preparatory Commission, will attend as a full-fledged member, since it has just signed the Convention.

401. As was indicated in the statement made at the time of signature, Belgium whole-heartedly hopes that the Preparatory Commission will succeed in correcting the insufficiencies and imperfections still contained in certain provisions of part XI and annexes 3 and 4 of the Convention. We have expressed the hope that, to that end, the Preparatory Commission will prepare rules, regulations and procedures for the purpose of, on the one hand, facilitating the acceptance of the new régime by the international community as a whole and, on the other, making possible the real exploitation of the common heritage of mankind for the benefit of all—and especially the least developed countries. It is in that same constructive spirit that the Belgian delegation will continue to participate in the meetings of the Preparatory Commission.

402. Guided by the same desire to contribute constructively to the progress of the work of the Preparatory Commission, my delegation associates itself with what was just said by the representative of Canada in regard to paragraphs 83 and 86 of the Secretary-General's report. In fact, those paragraphs contain language which lends itself to some ambiguity and which my delegation, regretfully, cannot support. The agreement on the settlement of disputes concluded between France, India, Japan and the Soviet Union did not culminate in a decision by the Preparatory Commission. But we get a different impression from paragraphs 83 and 86 of the report. Mr. Warioba, the Chairman of the Preparatory Commission, confined himself to reading out the agreement, and the Commission was not called upon to take a stand on it. Hence, Belgium could not be considered to be a party to that agreement. My Government feels that the question of the settlement of disputes can be solved satisfactorily only by agreements that include all the parties that could be affected by overlappings or encroachments at a given site.

403. Finally, I would repeat my Government's hope that, generally speaking, and in accordance with the principle of financial responsibility, sound budgetary practices will be strictly followed in regard to expenses incurred through the functioning of the agencies and organs created by the Convention.

404. Despite those few reservations that I have just expressed, my delegation will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1.

405. We take this opportunity to express our gratitude to Mr. Hyera of the United Republic of Tanzania and to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the Law of the Sea, Mr. Nandan, for the efforts they have made to ensure that this draft resolution would be acceptable to the largest possible number of delegations.

406. Mr. van LANSCHOT (Netherlands): Some of the important developments that took place during the 1984 session of the Preparatory Commission were the result of extensive informal consultations among the States concerned. However, they were the object of little or no discussion at the meetings of the Preparatory Commission. This is the case, in particular, of the understanding that was reached at the Geneva meeting among the four States that announced their intention to submit applications for their registration as pioneer investors—France, India, Japan and the Soviet Union. That understanding, which is called "Understanding on Resolution of Conflicts among Applicants for Registration as Pioneer Investors", relates to the procedure and a timetable for resolution of any conflicts that may arise from overlapping of areas claimed by these applicants. On 31 August 1984, the Chairman of the Preparatory Commission made a statement in which he reported that "an understanding has been reached among the parties concerned". That statement and the understanding itself are contained in document LOS/PCN/L.8. The same statement was repeated by the Chairman of the Preparatory Commission on 4 September and is contained in paragraph 8 of document LOS/PCN/L.13.

407. Despite the statements made by the Chairman of the Preparatory Commission, it appears that some confusion has arisen with respect to the nature and scope of that understanding. We wish to refer in this regard to the Secretary-General's report on the Law of the Sea [A/39/647 and Corr.1 and Add.1]. This is a very informative and well-prepared paper, which contains in particular, in its paragraphs 80 to 93, a description of the work accomplished by the Preparatory Commission during 1984. In general, this description is a good and accurate summary but, perhaps as a result of an obvious and commendable concern for brevity, it contains two statements that in our view deserve further clarification.

408. Paragraph 83 of the report states, inter alia, the following:

> "The Commission has decided that, following the adoption of the rules for the registration of pioneer investors, it will proceed to register the first group of applicants at the third session of the Preparatory Commission to be held in Kingston from 11 March to 5 April 1985. In the mean time the Commission has requested the first group of applicants to resolve as soon as possible conflicts with respect to the overlapping of the areas claimed."

Paragraph 86 states: "At the end of the Geneva meeting the Chairman announced that an understanding had been reached on the procedure and on a timetable for conflict resolution for the first group of applicants."

409. Paragraph 86 is ambiguous, in that it fails to specify, as was done by the Chairman of the Preparatory Commission, that this understanding was not reached by the Preparatory Commission but by the parties concerned. In order to avoid misunderstandings, I may add that the words "parties concerned" do not refer to the Members of the Group of 77 on the one hand and the Soviet Union on the other hand—that is, the States that participated in the informal consultations conducted by Mr. Warioba. No, the words "the parties concerned" refer only to France, India, Japan and the Soviet Union. The wording of paragraph 83 simply is not accurate, because it is based on language used in the understanding in question; it has not been endorsed, directly or indirectly, by the Preparatory Commission and has not been the object of any decision by the Preparatory Commission.

410. The very notion of a "first group of applicants" has not been used by the Preparatory Commission or by its Chairman, except by reference to the terms of the understanding itself. It is an expression limited only to the understanding that was reached by the four States concerned. The only decision that the Preparatory Commission itself took with respect to negotiations of pioneer investors is contained in paragraph 14 of document LOS/PCN/L.13 and it is to "complete the consideration of the draft rules on pioneer investors and adopt them". Both part I and part II of the understanding therefore reflect the views of the parties to that understanding only, and as such have no effect on other States.

411. More specifically, I wish to state the following. The rules and regulations will have to be drawn up on their own merits, that is, without reference to the understanding among the four States. The fact that those four States reached an understanding among themselves cannot prejudge the freedom of discretion or the responsibility of each member State as regards its participation in the decision-making process—notably in the General Committee—with regard to the registration of applications. In this context, I may add that in our view the issue of conflict resolution can be satisfactorily solved only by agreements which encompass all parties that may be affected by overlapping on any particular site.

412. We are aware, of course, that the report of the Secretary-General was prepared for informational purposes only, and, as I indicated earlier, it is a very helpful document. However, the only authoritative statements on the work of the Preparatory Commission are those contained in its official documents. Nevertheless, given the misperceptions that may have developed with respect to the stage reached by the Preparatory Commission in its consideration of the registration of pioneer investors, we thought it might be helpful to clarify the matter at this stage.

413. My delegation will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1. It is our position that the "Provisional Understanding regarding Deep Sea-Bed Matters" concluded on 3 August 1984 between eight Governments, my own among them, falls outside the scope of paragraph 5 of the draft resolution.

414. My delegation would like to emphasize that the Provisional Understanding, being essentially an agreement to avoid conflicts arising from overlapping claims to mining sites, does not contain in any way an alternative deep sea-bed mining régime. The Provisional Understanding is without prejudice to the Convention on the Law of the Sea and does not affect the position of the Government of the Netherlands with regard to that Convention.

415. Mr. TREVES (Italy): Italy signed the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea on 7 December. Well aware of the importance of the Convention and of the expectations of many countries of the world, especially the developing countries, Italy decided that its place has to be among the countries signatory to the Convention. It would, moreover, have been difficult for Italy to detach itself from the results of all the labour undertaken in the Committee on the Peaceful Uses of the Sea-Bed and the Ocean Floor beyond the Limits of National Jurisdiction and in the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, a labour in which it had participated actively and responsibly through the years.

416. The Convention is, in our view, an important contribution to the enhancement of the rule of law in a very important sector of international law. It clarifies many issues which have hitherto given rise to political tension and disputes by striking a reasonable balance between old and new, between codification and progressive development of international law. It reconciles in a way that by and large we consider acceptable the traditional, but still vitally important, concept based on the freedom of the high seas and on protection of navigation and communications with both the new aspiration to the widening of coastal States' jurisdiction over resource-related matters and the new concerns common to all States, such as those related to the preservation of the marine environment. Moreover, the Convention gives a comparatively wide scope to compulsory third-party settlement of disputes, an aspect that Italy, in conformity with its tradition, considers of the highest importance.

417. It is well known that Italy has considerable difficulty with provisions of the Convention dealing with deep sea-bed mining. These difficulties explain our hesitation before signing the Convention. Even though we think that the Preparatory Commission, in whose work we have actively participated as observers, is making good progress, these difficulties still exist. We stated them explicitly at the moment of signing, as did other States. We were pleased to note that, when signing the Convention on 7 December, the representative of the European Community made a statement along similar lines also.

418. We have examined the Secretary-General's report on the law of the sea [A/39/647 and Corr.1 and Add.1] with great interest. We consider it a very useful and informative document, and we welcome it.

419. One of the aspects of the report that strikes my delegation as particularly interesting is that it puts in perspective deep sea-bed mining vis-à-vis the other sea-related activities. The picture one gathers from the report is that of an extremely wide and complex set of problems and activities that go far beyond those connected with deep sea-bed mining, which are rather specific and mostly projected well into the future. As is true for the sea-related activities and interests of the States, the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, the activities of the United Nations and of its Law of the Sea Office related to the sea, as well as those of other international organizations, have a much broader scope than deep-sea mining, notwithstanding the fact that public attention has focused on that aspect in recent years.

420. This confirms the wisdom of the attitude taken by the Italian Government when it decided to sign the Convention, notwithstanding its conviction that part XI and annexes 3 and 4, which refer to deep seabed mining, contain considerable flaws and deficiencies. We were pleased to note that, in commenting on the reaching of the 159th signature on the closing date of 9 December, the Secretary-General recognized the position of the States which "though supporting the Convention as a whole, find the deep sea-bed mining part of it not entirely satisfactory". We were pleased in particular to read in that statement of the Secretary-General that "In areas where divergences remain, we will endeavour to bring about reconciliation" and that "this can be achieved through flexibility, understanding and goodwill on all sides, so that we can make this global achievement a truly universal one". This is the very objective Italy will strive to achieve, especially, but not exclusively, through its full participation in the Preparatory Commission.

421. In connection with the report of the Secretary-General, we have listened with interest to the observations made by Canada, Belgium and the Netherlands with regard to paragraphs 83 and 86. We agree with the remark that those paragraphs are somewhat misleading. Even though this report does not purport to contain the records of the Preparatory Commission, those paragraphs might give the impression that the Preparatory Commission has in some way taken a decision on the understanding reached by France, India, Japan and the Soviet Union.

422. We have listened to statements in the present debate mentioning the Provisional Understanding signed on 3 August by eight States, including Italy. In some of those statements, the Provisional Understanding has been qualified as illegal. It has also been said that it contains a new régime for the exploitation of the international sea-bed.

423. My delegation, together with those of Belgium, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, is on record with a firm rejection of those contentions, which are not new. We wish to recall the statement made on behalf of these countries by the chairman of the Netherlands delegation at the Preparatory Commission meeting on 14 August 1984, which is reproduced in document LOS/PCN/52. Repeating what was said in that declaration, we wish to state firmly that there is no single provision in the Provisional Understanding that would make it illegal. Moreover, the Provisional Understanding does not provide for a new régime for the exploration and exploitation of the international sea-bed as an alternative to that of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. The Provisional Understanding is essentially concerned with conflict resolution, and as such it corresponds to one of the basic principles of international law—and, we may add, it is perfectly in line with resolution II.

424. As regards draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1, which is submitted to us for approval, we were pleased to participate in the discussions that led to its submission. Its text is very similar to that of resolution 38/59 A, which was approved last year, and, in our opinion, its meaning and effect are the same.

425. We are pleased to announce that as a consequence of our signing the Convention this year we shall vote in favour of the draft resolution. We wish, however, to stress that our concern for the rigorous administration of United Nations resources in this as in other areas remains the same. That is why in the Fifth Committee our delegation abstained on the financial implications of this draft resolution. Indeed, we would wish that the Preparatory Commission would take more into account the fact that it is financed through the ordinary budget of the United Nations and orient itself to the least expensive choices in developing the programme for its meetings.

426. Mr. SCHRICKE (France) (interpretation from French): The annual debate on the law of the sea makes it possible for the General Assembly to draw up a balance sheet of developments with regard to the subject of the law of the sea that have occurred during the past year. For this year, the balance sheet has certainly been positive.

427. First of all, having signed the Convention on 10 December 1982 we can but be pleased at its support by the international community, which is illustrated in a particularly striking way by the exceptionally large number of signatures to the Convention since it was opened for signature. Forty new signatures have been added to those inscribed at the Convention at Montego Bay, bringing the total to 159.

428. The support given the Convention is also clearly demonstrated by the fact that every geographical region and all political, economic and social systems are broadly represented. We are particularly pleased by the large number of signatures by European countries, and in particular by those of our partners in the European Economic Community, which itself signed the Convention on 7 December of last year. As the Secretary-General emphasized in his statement on 10 December, "Such overwhelming support for a Convention of this universal character is unprecedented."

429. At the same time, the Secretary-General recalled that some States that support the Convention as a whole feel that the section on the exploitation of the sea-bed is not entirely satisfactory. He has promised to pursue efforts to reconcile positions in areas where differences remain.

430. We feel that that positive and constructive attitude should be shared by all Members of the Organization if we wish to give the Convention a truly universal nature. In this regard, we welcome the progress made by the Preparatory Commission and its Special Commissions during the recent sessions at Kingston and at Geneva. The Preparatory Commission has, generally speaking, proved itself serious and realistic under the leadership of its Chairman, Mr. Warioba, to whom we pay a tribute for his outstanding guidance of the Commission's work. It is under his leadership, in particular, that decisive progress has been made in the implementation of resolution II of the Conference, notably in the agreement of 30 August 1984 on the settlement of disputes between persons wishing to register as pioneer investors and on the procedure for the settlement of disputes between applicants in the first group.

431. These applicants in the first group are those that presented applications to the Preparatory Commission prior to 9 December 1984: that is, France, India, Japan and the Soviet Union. As a representative of one of those countries, I feel it appropriate to inform the Assembly of the present state of the implementation of the agreement of 30 August. The delegations of the four countries met in Geneva from 3 to 6 December in accordance with the agreement. On that occasion they drew up an agreement to ensure the confidential nature of data and information and a procés-verbal setting out the terms for the exchange of co-ordinates. Those two texts are to be signed on 17 December this year. On the same day, according to the 30 August agreement, delegations should exchange co-ordinates and identify possible overlapping. We hope that in the case of such overlapping, the negotiations scheduled for next January will enable us to resolve all the pending problems prior to the third regular session of the Preparatory Commission which is to meet at Kingston, from 11 March to 4 April 1985.

432. All these developments cause us to feel optimistic about the continuance of the work of the Preparatory Commission, provided that a constructive atmosphere continues to reign. I can assure the Assembly that our delegation will continue its active participation in this work with the same open spirit it has always shown.

433. Taking into account the aforementioned developments and the other activities carried out efficiently by the Secretary-General in implementation of the ambitious programme relating to questions connected with the law of the sea as set forth in the medium-term plan, my delegation will vote in favour of the draft resolution before us, as it has with similar draft resolutions in the past.

434. Although the future of the Convention on the Law of the Sea should lead us all to show receptiveness and mutual understanding, we regret that some delegations have seen fit to give a polemical turn to our debate by reiterating totally unjustified accusations with respect to the Provisional Understanding regarding Deep Sea-Bed Matters, signed on 3 August 1984 by eight countries, including France. Contrary to what some might say, that arrangement is in no way contrary to the Convention and does not aim at establishing a régime parallel to it.

435. This arrangement does not imply any legal recognition by the signatories of the validity of permits that might be issued on the sole basis of national legislation.

436. The sole objective of the arrangement actually is to remove the possibility of future conflicts between the signatories. Thus, in eliminating potential sources of conflict, it is in line with the intentions of the sponsors of resolution II. It is therefore perfectly compatible with the obligation accepted by the French Government to undertake activities in the deep sea-bed, in the context of resolution II, as is shown by the lodging of our application for registration as a pioneer investor with the Preparatory Commission.

437. There is therefore no foundation for the criticisms of certain delegations. Do they believe that, if we had the slightest doubt as to the compatibility of this arrangement with the Convention, we would be able to vote for draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1, whose paragraph 5, and I quote, "Calls upon States to desist from taking actions which undermine the Convention or defeat its object and purpose"?

438. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Cape Verde for a point of order.

439. Mr. JESUS (Cape Verde): In raising this point of order, Mr. President, my delegation would like to draw your attention to an apparent discrepancy between the French text and the English text of draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1. This draft resolution was negotiated in English among some interested delegations, and the French text was translated from English. My delegation would have refrained from making the following comments if the French text did not make substantial changes to what was negotiated by those interested delegations, the content of which is clearly reflected in the English text.

440. I think that the French text must reflect the exact content of the results of the negotiations that took place, which, as I said, are very clearly reflected in the English text. Therefore, because of the very detailed nature of the compromise reached at the time of the negotiations, my delegation suggests, on the basis of consultations it carried out with the interested delegations, mainly French-speaking delegations, that the following changes be made in the French text.

441. First, I would draw attention to paragraph 3 of draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1. In the English text, it is correctly stated that the General Assembly "Calls upon all States that have not done so to consider ratifying or acceding . . .". In the French text, as we see, it is stated that the Assembly "Demande aux Etats qui ne l'ont pas encore fait d'envisager de signer et de ratifier . . .".*

442. That is not only inconsistent with the English text, but also unrealistic. It is not possible to demand or call upon States to sign the Convention when we know the Convention is no longer open to signature, because the closing date for that was 9 December. The French text of paragraph 3 should therefore read as follows:

> "Demande à tous les Etats qui ne l'ont pas encore fait d'envisager de ratifier la Convention ou d'y adhérer dans les meilleurs délais en vue de permettre l'entrée en vigueur du nouveau régime juridique des utilisations de la mer et de ses ressources;".*

443. With regard to paragraph 5, I think that the French version as it stands now is quite far from what was negotiated this year and is reflected in the corresponding paragraph of the English text. In fact, the French text reflects the corresponding paragraphs of last year's resolution. This was quite clearly changed during the negotiations. Therefore I would suggest that the French version of paragraph 5 should reflect the compromise which was reached with such difficulty this year. After having consulted with French-speaking delegations and other interested delegations, I suggest that the Translation Service take into account the following text of the French version of paragraph 5:

> "Demande aux Etats . . ."—and not ". . . à tous les Etats"—"de renoncer aux actions"—and not "toute action"—"sapant l'efficacité de la Convention ou allant à l'encontre de son objet et de son but;".*

This last part, "de son objet et de son but", is in accordance with what has been retained in paragraph 5 of the English text, and it is only a transcription of an equivalent expression from the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.[5]

444. With regard to paragraph 9, I think that in the second line of the French version, where it says "conception cohérente", it should say "une approche cohérente". Therefore it is merely a question of replacing the word "conception" by the word "approche". In the fifth line of the same paragraph, two words have been left out; where we say [the General Assembly] "invite les institutions et organismes des Nations Unies . . .", we should say ". . .invite les institutions et organismes du système des Nations Unies", to put the wording in accordance with the normal practice in this sort of text and also with the English text.

445. Passing now to the preambular part of the draft resolution, some French colleagues advised, since I was going to propose these corrections to the French text, that I also propose that in the third line of the sixth preambular paragraph, where mention is made of "services consultatifs", it should merely say "conseils", and would then read: ". . . de conseils et d'assistance . . .".

446. As I have said, these comments are made with the sole objective of assuring that the content of the negotiations which took place this year in the preparation of draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1 should be reflected as clearly as possible. The wording I have just proposed results, as I said, from consultations among interested delegations, and particularly with those of francophone countries.

447. To conclude, after consulting with some interested delegations—among which are sponsors, as is my delegation, of the draft resolution—and taking into account that the target date for signature of the Convention, 9 December, has passed, and that the number of States and of all entities that have signed the Convention has reached 159, my delegation suggests a small, inoffensive oral amendment to the second line of the second preambular paragraph, where "et notamment les 114 signatures" would be replaced by "et notamment les cent cinquante-neuf signatures". Since this is a factual suggestion, I think it will not counter opposition from any representative here present, and while it is an oral amendment, that it can be adopted.

448. Mr. SCHRICKE (France) (interpretation from French): My delegation would like to congratulate the representative of Cape Verde on his meticulous approach and his perfect command of the French language, and to state that we have no objections whatsoever to the changes he has proposed to the French text of the draft resolution. We wish to speak now simply because we have noticed, in looking again more closely at the draft, that there is another error in the translation of paragraph 3. At the beginning of the English text, it reads "all the States", and in the French version the word "all" was not translated. The French text should therefore read "Demande à tous les Etats qui ne l'ont pas encore fait. . .".

449. Mr. GUMUCIO GRANIER (Bolivia) (interpretation from Spanish): Comparing the Spanish text and the English text of the draft resolution, it seems we would have a similar problem in paragraph 5. The words "a todos" would have to be deleted to keep the Spanish version consistent with the English and French texts as suggested by the representative of Cape Verde.

450. The PRESIDENT: With regard to the points of order raised by the representatives of Cape Verde, France and Bolivia, I can inform the Assembly that I have been advised by the Secretariat that its technical services will ensure that the final edited versions in French and Spanish conform fully to the English text. I hope that satisfies the points of order.

451. I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their votes before the voting on draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1.

452. Mr. SIBAY (Turkey): The views of the Turkish Government concerning the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea are well known and have been put on the record in oral and written statements during all the sessions of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, including the last one held at Montego Bay. The Government of Turkey has signed neither the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea nor the Final Act of the Conference. Furthermore, Turkey voted against General Assembly resolutions 37/66 and 38/59 A, adopted under the item "Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea".

453. The Turkish Government has recently decided to participate as an observer in the deliberations of the Preparatory Commission, in accordance with article 3 of its rules of procedure. However, the position of the Turkish Government regarding the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea remains unchanged. Consequently, the participation of the Turkish Government as an observer in the deliberations of the Preparatory Commission can in no way be interpreted or construed as indicating that Turkey has changed its stated views and positions.

454. With regard to the budget implications of the draft resolutions concerning the law of the sea, the Turkish Government is of the opinion that the expenditures emanating from the implementation of the Convention are not juridically eligible to be met from the budget of the United Nations and that they should be borne and met solely by the signatories and parties to it, as required by international law. For this reason, Turkey has voted against proposals to this effect in the Fifth Committee.

455. My delegation would like to request that the draft resolution contained in A/39/L.35 and Add.1 be put to a recorded vote.

456. Mr. ALBORNOZ (Ecuador) (interpretation from Spanish): As the international community is aware, the delegation of Ecuador did not sign the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, as it does not completely reflect fundamental Ecuadorian rights and interests. However, our country contributed to a great extent, together with the developing coastal countries, to the enshrinement of important principles in favour of their rights over all the living natural resources in their seas up to the 200-mile limit, regardless of their habits, while those species are within a country's marine environment, as well as the corresponding sea-bed under national jurisdiction.

457. Ecuador has also reiterated—and will continue to reiterate—its position of support for the right to exploit, utilize and market, according to the principle of the common heritage of mankind, the marine areas beyond the national jurisdiction of the coastal countries. Therefore, we cannot accept any unilateral exploitation which could directly or indirectly weaken that principle.

458. Consequently, Ecuador will not participate in the vote on the draft resolution on the law of the sea.

459. The PRESIDENT: Before putting draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1 to the vote, I should like to announce that there are two additional sponsors of the draft resolution: Costa Rica and Trinidad and Tobago. The Assembly will now begin the voting process and take a decision on the draft resolution. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of the draft resolution is contained in document A/39/821. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia.

Against: Turkey, United States of America.

Abstaining: Germany, Federal Republic of, Israel, Peru, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Venezuela.

The draft resolution was adopted by 138 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions (resolution 39/73).

460. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives wishing to explain their votes.

461. Mr. PAPAJORGJI (Albania): The Albanian delegation did not participate in the vote on the draft resolution contained in document A/39/L.35 and Add.1, for the same reasons it had when it did not participate in the vote on the text of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea and its signature. On various occasions, the Albanian delegation has clearly expressed the views and position of its Government on the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, which are recorded in the official documents of the Conference.

462. The People's Socialist Republic of Albania maintains its known position on the interpretation of the provisions of the law of the sea. As with resolutions of previous sessions, draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1 contains some provisions unacceptable to the Albanian delegation. Since we explained our reservations on these provisions during the last session, in order not to take up the time of the Assembly, we shall not enter into the details of the reservations, which we still maintain.

463. Count YORK von WARTENBURG (Federal Republic of Germany): My delegation abstained in the voting on the resolution just adopted. The Federal Republic of Germany considers a comprehensive, generally acceptable law of the sea régime an important contribution to the rule of law in international relations. The parts of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea which relate to international law of the sea proper, to the protection of the marine environment and to the settlement of disputes have met with general approval. The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany welcomes those parts of the Convention as a major contribution to the codification and progressive development of international law of the sea which can play an important role in ensuring the clarity and certainty of law.

464. However, a consensus among all States on the Convention as a whole failed to transpire on account of the envisaged sea-bed mining régime. The Federal Republic of Germany has consistently expressed the opinion that substantial modifications will be necessary in order to establish a generally acceptable régime in this field as well. The preparatory investment protection scheme also reveals considerable flaws and inconsistencies. Under the present circumstances, this system offers no safeguards for protection of the interests of the Federal Republic of Germany.

465. Taking into account all these considerations, the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany decided not to sign the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. However, this does not mean that it rejects the Convention. My Government will continue to work with other countries to bring about a sea-bed mining régime that will eventually make the Convention acceptable to all States.

466. I should now like to refer to a previous intervention which dealt with the seat of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea. The free and Hanseatic city of Hamburg has been determined as the seat of the Tribunal in article 1, paragraph 2, of annex VI to the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. This decision stands. It has not been linked to the signing of the Convention by the Federal Republic of Germany but has been made dependent on my country having ratified the Convention by the time of its entry into force. In this regard, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the Law of the Sea has rightly pointed out recently that the Federal Republic of Germany can still accede to the Convention at any time.

467. We have listened to an intervention asserting that the Provisional Understanding regarding deep-sea matters to which my country is a party contradicts the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. As other parties to the Understanding have already pointed out this evening, this is a misinterpretation of the content and object of the Understanding. Its objective is to avoid conflicting claims among the parties now and in the future by mutual self-restraint. The Understanding thus serves a principle which has been expressed in paragraph 5 (a) of resolution II of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea.

468. Mr. RIVERA MARAVÍ (Peru) (interpretation from Spanish): The delegation of Peru, on the express instructions of its Government, abstained in the voting on this draft resolution, without failing to recognize, however, the historical significance of the Convention.

469. Since 1947, Peru has actively demonstrated before the international community its recognition of the sovereignty of coastal States over their territorial waters, from their coasts to the 200-mile limit and over their sea-bed sectors. Therefore my delegation thinks that it has contributed to a certain extent to the creation of this new law.

470. Finally, my delegation wishes to make clear that the existence of certain differences between the provisions of the Convention and the Constitution of Peru have made it impossible for Peru to subscribe to this Convention.

471. Mrs. VARNAI-DRANGER (Israel): In this regard, the Government of Israel states that the régime of navigation and overflight, confirmed by the 1979 Treaty of Peace between Israel and Egypt, in which the straits of Tiran and the Gulf of Aqaba are considered by the parties to be international waterways open to all nations for unimpeded and non-suspendable freedom of navigation and overflight, is applicable to the said areas. Moreover, being fully compatible with the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, the régime of the Peace Treaty will continue to prevail and to be applicable to the said areas.

472. It is the understanding of the Government of Israel that in this regard the declaration of the Arab Republic of Egypt upon its ratification of the Convention is consonant with the above declaration. Israel remains committed, of course, to those rules of general international law in respect of peaceful uses of the seas and oceans.

473. At the thirty-seventh and thirty-eighth sessions of the General Assembly, my delegation expressed its opposition to the proposal to include the budget of the Preparatory Commission within the general budget of the United Nations, and that remains our position. But that does not apply, of course, to the general functions of the Secretary-General relating to marine affairs.

474. We have carefully studied the report of the Secretary-General on the law of the sea [A/39/647 and Corr.1 and Add.1]. We have noted with appreciation the ongoing activities of the Secretariat. We have also noted that the report includes information on various activities relating to marine affairs, including private law activities. It may be recalled that my delegation suggested last year that such information be included in the Law of the Sea Bulletin. The Bulletin is very useful, and we would like to suggest once again that consideration be given to expanding the co-ordinating role of the Secretariat by including in the Bulletin information on marine affairs, of both public and private law character, and both within and outside the framework of the United Nations.

475. There is no need to stress here once again my country's interest in the sea and our active participation in all international consultations and conferences on the law of the sea. The position of my country on the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea is also very well known and has been put on record more than once.

476. From our point of view, the Convention contains provisions which have been introduced on grounds of political considerations totally extraneous to the law of the sea and which did not allow my country to sign the Convention. In this regard, we have asked the Secretary-General, in his capacity as depositary of the Convention, to circulate the following statement:

> "The concerns of the Government of Israel with regard to the law of the sea relate principally to the ensuring of maximum freedom of navigation and overflight everywhere, and particularly through straits used for international navigation."

477. Mr. BERMAN (United Kingdom): I wish to explain the United Kingdom's abstention on draft resolution A/39/L.35 and Add.1, which has just been adopted. It is well known why the United Kingdom, for reasons which I will mention in a moment, has not signed the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. It must, therefore, be clear to all that there are many aspects of the resolution just adopted which we could not support.

478. The United Kingdom's particular objections to various aspects of this resolution were explained in detail in my delegation's explanation of vote on the equivalent resolution of the thirty-seventh session [91st meeting]. Moreover, in certain respects, the language of the present resolution represents a step further back from the language of General Assembly resolutions 37/66 and 38/59 A and contains elements which are not justified by the facts.

479. My delegation indicated in 1982 that the Government of the United Kingdom had decided against early signature of the Convention because it could not accept the régime for deep sea-bed mining, including the transfer of technology, in its present form. The decision was made, however, bearing in mind that the Convention remained open for signature for two years, to explore the prospects of improvements in these areas, starting with the rules, regulations and procedures to be drawn up in the Preparatory Commission, in whose work the United Kingdom has played a full part.

480. My Government has now completed a full review of its policy in the light of the experience of the past two years, but has concluded that there has been no significant change from the position that existed in 1982. While there is, therefore, no basis for a decision to sign the Convention in 1984, I wish to emphasize, as my delegation did in 1982, that the search for a consensus must continue. It remains the sole wish of the United Kingdom to see the development of provisions relating to sea-bed mining which could be accepted by consensus among the whole international community. Let me also mention at this point that my Government, when announcing its decision not to sign the Convention, also indicated that it would not stand in the way of signature by the European community within the limits of its competence as regards the Convention. This has since taken place, on 7 December.

481. I should like to make it plain that my delegation's reservations about the resolution just adopted should not be taken as casting aspersions on the efforts made by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative in pursuance of the tasks laid upon them by previous resolutions of the General Assembly. I should like specifically to join in the appreciation expressed in various paragraphs of the resolution for the Secretary-General's undertakings in relation to the law of the sea as a whole.

482. I regret that I have to conclude this brief statement by referring to a question which should not have been raised, but was raised in a flourish of rhetoric by two representatives who chose to use the present occasion as a platform for criticizing the policies and actions of others. The arguments raised, especially by the representative of the Soviet Union, were not new, but their repetition does not, of course, mean that they are any less unfounded for that, as has already been demonstrated by previous speakers.

483. My delegation associates itself fully with the remarks made by the representatives of Belgium, the Netherlands and Italy, and by others, in this respect.

484. Mr. RAY (United States of America): Once again my delegation has had to cast a negative vote on a resolution concerning the international development of the law of the sea. As in the past, we have done so with considerable reluctance. We do so primarily because of the insistence by many delegations that the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea and the institutions it seeks to create remain a direct fiscal responsibility of the Organization.

485. The United States, as we have stated in the past, views the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea as a major accomplishment in the development of international law relating to the oceans. Unfortunately, the Convention contains one part, part XI, which runs contrary to United States policy and to that of others that share our views concerning the future development of resources on the bottom of the deep sea-bed. Therefore, the United States has not signed the Convention.

486. The United Nations is still being requested to fund, from its general budget, the Preparatory Commission established by the Convention. The United States believes that the costs of the Preparatory Commission should be borne by those nations which are parties to the Treaty. Such costs cannot be assessed against all United Nations members as part of the United Nations budget, as they do not represent legitimate "expenses of the Organization" within the meaning of Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter.

487. The United States remains steadfast in its opposition to such improper assessments, and we are determined to resist such abuses of the budget and the Charter of the United Nations. The Preparatory Commission is established pursuant to a Treaty régime separate from the Charter of the United Nations. It is legally independent of, and distinct from, the United Nations, and it is not answerable to the United Nations. Membership of the United Nations does not obligate any member to finance or otherwise to support any other independent organization.

488. The United States will not support that part of the Convention which deals with deep sea-bed development, and the United States will continue to withhold its pro rata share of the United Nations annual assessment for the regular budget which pertains to the funding of the Preparatory Commission and is earmarked to part XI of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. However, the United States takes this opportunity to reiterate its commitment to co-operate with the international community on the development of international law relating to the oceans. This co-operation extends to a vast number of important principles contained in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.

489. With regard to the statement of the Soviet Union, which mentioned the United States—without compliment—we concur with the substance of the position expressed tonight by the representatives of Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands, France, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United Kingdom.

490. Mr. HAYASHI (Japan): My delegation voted in favour of the draft resolution. In this connection, we very much regret the criticism made by certain delegations earlier in the debate of the agreement, or more accurately, the provisional understanding recently concluded by eight Governments regarding these deep sea-bed matters. As the representatives of Italy and other countries clearly explained, that criticism is totally unfounded and irrelevant.

491. My delegation would like to reaffirm its position as communicated to the Preparatory Commission on 3 August 1984 and recorded in document LOS/PCN/45, that the Provisional Understanding is fully compatible with the commitment of the Government of Japan to undertake its deep sea-bed activities within the framework of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea and resolution II of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea.

492. We understand that paragraph 5 of the resolution just adopted contains a general appeal not to take any action which would undermine the Convention or defeat its object and purpose, and that it has nothing to do with the Provisional Understanding.

493. Mr. VILLAGRA DELGADO (Argentina) (interpretation from Spanish): Argentina interprets the fifth preambular paragraph and paragraph 4 of the resolution that has just been adopted in accordance with the declaration it made on 5 October 1984, upon signing the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea and especially with the last paragraph of that declaration.

494. In this connection, it is my Government's understanding that of the resolutions adopted together with the Convention for procedural reasons, the only ones related to it for functional reasons are resolution I and II, and that therefore it is to them that the fifth preambular paragraph and paragraph 4 of the resolution just adopted refer.

495. Mr. YAKOVLEV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (interpretation from Russian): In this brief final statement I should like to say how pleased we are at the adoption of this very important resolution and to congratulate the delegations concerned. Unfortunately, some delegations persist in their policy of obstructing the Convention. We saw that during the voting.

496. We would like to state that during the debate, efforts were made to interpret the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. Any interpretation incompatible with its purposes, principles and provisions is prohibited, and therefore any effort in that direction has no legal meaning. Attempts were also made during the debate arbitrarily to interpret the resolutions adopted by the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, which contains definite procedures and provisions that are self-explanatory. Any arbitrary attempt to interpret those resolutions in a way that runs counter to their spirit and letter and to their provisions has no legal validity and cannot be presented here as legal.

AGENDA ITEM 35

United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy: Report of the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy

497. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Egypt.

498. Mr. SHAKER (Egypt) (interpretation from Arabic): I am pleased to be the first speaker on this item in order to introduce, on behalf of the Federal Republic of Germany, Poland and my own country, draft resolution A/39/L.26.

499. The draft resolution consists of six preambular paragraphs and nine operative paragraphs. I need not go into the details, as I am sure all delegations are aware of its contents. However, I should like to underline its salient features which have been introduced this year, especially in the light of the success achieved by the Preparatory Committee during its fifth session, held at Vienna from 25 June to 6 July 1984. The main features of the draft resolution are as follows.

500. First, the General Assembly approves the recommendations and decisions contained in the report of the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy on its fifth session [A/39/47]. Secondly, the Assembly expresses its appreciation of the efforts of the Chairman of the Preparatory Committee, Mr. Novak Pribicević of Yugoslavia, and the Secretary-General of the Conference, Mr. Mehta, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 38/60. Indeed, the efforts made by the Chairman and Mr. Mehta were instrumental in ensuring the success of the fifth session of the Preparatory Committee in a manner not witnessed in any of the previous sessions. During the period from January to May 1984 they conducted several rounds of informal consultations with members of the Preparatory Committee individually and collectively as well as with regional groups which so desired. Thirdly, in view of the constructive efforts made by the Chairman of the Preparatory Committee and the Secretary-General of the Conference, the General Assembly requests the Chairman and the Secretary-General of the Conference to continue informal individual and group consultations, as necessary, in order to assist the Committee in expediting the necessary procedural and substantive preparations for the Conference. Fourthly, the General Assembly decides that the Preparatory Committee will hold its sixth session at Vienna from 21 October to 1 November 1985 to consider, inter alia, the mechanism for formal/official inter-sessional intergovernmental work and the commencement of preparation of the concluding document or documents of the Conference, as well as the mandate and composition of the group of internationally eminent experts. Fifthly, the General Assembly decides that the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy will be held at Geneva from 10 to 28 November 1986. Sixthly, the General Assembly invites the International Atomic Energy Agency, the specialized agencies and other relevant organizations of the United Nations system to ensure that their contributions to the documents for the Conference, including reports of the regional expert group meetings, should be concise and comprehensive and specifically related to the purpose, aims and objectives of the Conference, including in particular suggestions regarding practical and effective ways and means for the promotion of international co-operation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy, so as to achieve meaningful results from the Conference in accordance with the objectives of General Assembly resolution 32/50. Lastly, the General Assembly invites all States to co-operate actively in the preparation of the Conference and to make available, as soon as possible, the information requested in paragraph 9 of General Assembly resolution 36/78 and in the broad questionnaire circulated by the Secretary-General of the Conference in March 1984.

501. Those are the important elements of the draft resolution which I have the honour to introduce on behalf of the delegations of the Federal Republic of Germany, Poland and Egypt. We hope that the General Assembly will adopt the draft resolution without a vote.

502. I should like to take this opportunity to express our special appreciation to the Secretary-General of the Conference, Mr. Mehta, for the excellent and outstanding work he has carried out with extreme skill, in view of the specialized and delicate aspects of the Conference, and the importance and nature of the items to be covered by it. We are pleased to see the difficult task of the preparations for the Conference in such able hands, because he is known for his wide diplomatic experience and his expertise in this vital field. Moreover, Mr. Mehta is devoting his efforts entirely to achieving the objectives of the Conference in an admirable way. We are confident that the Conference will be thoroughly prepared under his supervision. We therefore request the Secretary-General of the United Nations to provide all necessary facilities in order to enable him to carry out his task fully and successfully.

503. Egypt, which participated actively in the work of the Preparatory Committee under the wise leadership of Yugoslavia, believes that the objective of the Conference should be to discuss all the dimensions of international co-operation in the field of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy in order to develop the principles of international co-operation and to devise the ways of developing that co-operation in accordance with resolution 32/50, that is, under the mutually acceptable considerations of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons [resolution 2373 (XXII), annex]. We hope that the Conference will achieve positive results to ensure the use of nuclear energy in fields such as medicine, industry, food and agriculture. Undoubtedly we should not look at the forthcoming Conference in isolation from other events taking place in other international forums connected with the peaceful uses of nuclear energy, such as the Third Review Conference on the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, as well as the work of the Committee on Supply Assurances.

504. In conclusion, we believe that the forthcoming Conference should take into consideration the United Nations resolutions which established it, in particular those regarding the role of nuclear energy in economic development in the developing countries, taking into account their sovereign rights in developing nuclear energy for peaceful purposes in accordance with their priorities and their right to acquire nuclear technology under appropriate international guarantees.

505. Mr. DJOKIĆ (Yugoslavia): Seven years ago, the General Assembly launched an important initiative aimed at creating an equitable and just basis of international co-operation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. The intention of that action was to determine principles and to reach a new international consensus which would serve as the basis for relations and the promotion of co-operation in that field. In the period since the last General Assembly session, there have been several positive developments. Conditions have improved for substantial work on the preparations for the Conference, to which undivided significance is attached and which is of particular importance for all countries, especially the developing ones. At the last session of the Preparatory Committee for the Conference, which was held at Vienna from 25 June to 6 July 1984, significant progress was achieved. Views on pending controversial issues were successfully reconciled, and generally acceptable solutions regarding the content of the agenda of the Conference and its decision-making procedure were found; thus the Preparatory Committee has been enabled to concentrate in its future work on substantial preparations for the Conference. We wish to express our satisfaction at the results achieved by the Committee and the readiness displayed to retain in future work the spirit of mutual understanding, accommodation and flexibility. Such a development has long been desired. We hope that this trend will continue and develop further, in view of the fact that we are still faced with some issues awaiting agreement before the holding of the conference in 1986.

506. The provision of adequate sources of energy is one of the essential prerequisites for general economic and social development, so much needed in the greater part of the world. That is why the questions of access to and utilization of those sources are an inevitable and urgent task in the solution of which all countries should participate on the basis of equality. It is only natural that the developing countries should attach exceptional significance to the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy. Most of those countries are faced with specific difficulties, being poor in sources of energy. It is obvious that they cannot rely only on traditional sources of energy and that to do so would pose yet another obstacle to their development. In order to meet the energy needs of their development, they have to start preparing or speeding up the implementation of programmes for the peaceful uses of nuclear energy without further loss of time. It is therefore of utmost importance that the problems and the obstacles be urgently addressed, as this adverse situation is not in keeping with the envisaged undisturbed transfer of nuclear technology for peaceful purposes, with the creation of overall co-operation in this sphere on the basis of full equality, with common interests and sustained development throughout the world. The way out is obviously not in the strengthening and enhancement of the monopoly over nuclear technology held by a small number of countries, but in a persistent search for solutions that will serve the interests of all countries, particularly the developing ones.

507. The question of utilizing nuclear energy for peaceful purposes and the issue of transfer of nuclear technology are often linked with the question of the danger of the proliferation of nuclear weapons. There is no doubt that all elements that can contribute to such a development deserve due attention. The Third Review Conference of Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons will be held next year. That will be an opportunity to consider comprehensively the implementation of the Treaty and to determine the extent to which the goals set by the Treaty have been realized and how the States Parties have respected the obligations assumed under the Treaty. It will also be an opportunity to consider all aspects of and dangers arising from the proliferation of nuclear weapons, regarding both the horizontal and the vertical components of the proliferation of nuclear weapons.

508. We have pointed out on several occasions that the dangers of the proliferation of nuclear weapons should not be used as a pretext for preventing, or an obstacle to the promotion of, co-operation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. We are convinced that the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy and meaningful results arising from it will confirm the correctness of that position.

509. In the light of the latest positive indications, we believe that there is a realistic basis for the fulfilment of the objectives by which the General Assembly was guided when it launched action for convening the Conference. The Conference should define universally acceptable principles in the sphere of the use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes and thus contribute to fruitful co-operation in this regard.

510. We are aware of the high degree of interdependence that exists in this field. That is why we believe that there is mutual interest between the developing countries which are importers of equipment and supplies and the countries which are exporters of nuclear technology. In this regard, we attach particular importance to the work of the IAEA, especially in providing assistance in training for the utilization of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes.

511. With regard to further preparations for the Conference, we attach particular importance to the inter-sessional work of the appropriate intergovernmental body and to the elaboration of final documents for the Conference. We also consider to be of special importance the recommendations of the Preparatory Committee regarding informal individual and group consultations by the Chairman of the Preparatory Committee, Mr. Pribicević, and the Secretary-General of the Conference, Mr. Mehta, to speed up the work on the preparations for the Conference. Such practices have proved valuable in the past, and we are convinced that the involvement of these persons would contribute considerably to faster harmonization of views.

512. This would create the necessary pre-conditions for the solid preparation of the Conference and would contribute to its successful outcome, to which Yugoslavia and other developing countries attach particular importance.

513. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now take a decision on draft resolution A/39/L.26. The programme budget implications of this draft resolution appear in the report of the Fifth Committee [A/39/822]. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to adopt draft resolution A/39/L.26?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/74).

514. Mr. GÜNEY (Turkey), Rapporteur of the Sixth Committee (interpretation from French): It is an honour for me to present to the General Assembly the reports of the Sixth Committee on agenda items 120 to 137, representing the outcome of the Committee's work during this session.

515. The report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 120 will be found in document A/39/770. In the draft resolution under this item, contained in paragraph 9 of the report, which was adopted by the Committee by 92 votes to none, with 16 abstentions, the Assembly expresses gratitude to the United Nations Institute for Training and Research for the completion of its analytical study on the progressive development of the principles and norms of international law relating to the new international economic order [A/39/504/Add.1, annex III] and urges Member States to submit not later than 30 June 1985 their views and comments with respect to that study.

516. In connection with agenda item 121, I draw the attention of the Assembly to the report of the Sixth Committee in document A/39/771 and to the draft resolution contained in paragraph 8 of that report. That draft resolution was adopted by the Committee by 92 votes to 10, with 17 abstentions. Among other things, States that have not done so, in particular those which are hosts to international organizations or to conferences, are urged in the draft resolution to consider the question of ratifying the Vienna Convention of the Representation of States in Their Relations with International Organizations of a Universal Character, and the States concerned are called on to accord to the delegations of the national liberation movements recognized by the Organization of African Unity and/or by the League of Arab States, and which are accorded observer status by international organizations, the facilities, privileges and immunities necessary for the performance of their functions. By the terms of the draft resolution, this question will come before the Assembly again in 1986.

517. That brings me to agenda item 122. The Sixth Committee's report on this item is contained in document A/39/772. The Committee adopted without a vote the draft resolution contained in paragraph 8 thereof. By the terms of the draft resolution, the Assembly would again call on all States, as it did in resolutions 34/51 and 37/116, to consider at the earliest possible date the matter of ratifying the two Protocols Additional[2] to the Geneva Conventions of 1949; it would also decide to include this item in the agenda of its forty-first session.

518. In connection with agenda item 123, the Sixth Committee's report is contained in document A/39/773. The draft resolution contained in paragraph 8 of the report was adopted by the Committee without a vote. By the terms of the draft resolution, the General Assembly—after reaffirming that good-neighbourliness fully conforms with the purposes of the United Nations and calling upon States, in the interest of the maintenance of international peace and security, to develop good-neighbourly relations—would decide to proceed with the task of identifying and clarifying the elements of good-neighbourliness within the framework of a working group or other appropriate organ of the Sixth Committee as might be decided upon by the Committee when organizing its work at the fortieth session.

519. I now invite the members of the Assembly to consider document A/39/774, containing the Sixth Committee's report on agenda item 124. By the terms of the draft resolution contained in paragraph 10 of the report, which the Committee adopted without a vote, the Assembly would, inter alia, again urge all States to observe and promote in good faith the provisions of the Manila Declaration on the Peaceful Settlement of International Disputes,[6] request the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization to continue its work on the question of the peaceful settlement of disputes between States, and request the Secretary-General to prepare a draft handbook on the peaceful settlement of disputes between States.

520. May I now ask the members of the Assembly to turn to document A/39/775, containing the Sixth Committee's report on agenda item 125. The draft resolution contained in paragraph 9 of the report and recommended for adoption by the Assembly was adopted by the Committee by a recorded vote of 96 to none, with 16 abstentions. By the terms of the draft resolution, the Assembly would request the International Law Commission to continue its work on the elaboration of the draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind by elaborating an introduction as well as a list of the offences; and would request the Secretary-General to seek the views of Member States and intergovernmental organizations regarding the conclusions contained in the report of the International Law Commission on the work of its thirty-sixth session [see A/39/10, chap. II, para. 65].

521. That brings me to the Sixth Committee's report on agenda item 126 [A/39/776]. By the terms of the draft resolution contained in paragraph 11 of the report, which the Sixth Committee adopted by a recorded vote of 80 to 16, with 11 abstentions, the Assembly would, inter alia, decide that the Special Committee on Enhancing the Effectiveness of the Principle of Non-Use of Force in International Relations should continue its work at its session to be held in 1985 with the goal of drafting, at the earliest possible date, a world treaty on the non-use of force in international relations as well as the peaceful settlement of disputes, or such other recommendations as the Special Committee might deem appropriate. As is indicated in paragraph 10 of the report, the Special Committee will hold its session from 28 January to 22 February 1985.

522. In connection with agenda item 127, the Sixth Committee's report is contained in document A/39/698. The draft resolution in paragraph 6 of the report, which the Committee adopted by consensus, contains a number of guidelines for the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law and confirms its mandate.

523. I turn now to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 128 [A/39/722]. The Committee adopted without a vote the draft resolution contained in paragraph 7 of the report.

524. After having strongly condemned acts of violence against diplomatic and consular missions and representatives, as well as against missions and representatives to international intergovernmental organizations and officials of such organizations, the Assembly, in operative paragraph 4 of the draft resolution, would urge States to observe and to implement the principles and rules of international law governing diplomatic and consular relations and, in particular, to take all necessary measures in conformity with their international obligations to ensure effectively the protection, security and safety of all diplomatic and consular missions and representatives officially present in territory under their jurisdiction, including practicable measures to prohibit in their territories illegal activities of persons, groups and organizations that encourage, instigate, organize or engage in the perpetration of acts against the security and safety of such missions and representatives.

525. By the same draft resolution, the Assembly, desiring to maintain and further strengthen the reporting procedures, would also request States to continue the procedures established by earlier resolutions.

526. The report of the Sixth Committee with regard to agenda item 129 is contained in document A/39/777. Paragraph 11 of the report contains the draft resolution adopted by consensus by the Sixth Committee. In the wording of operative paragraph 2 of the draft resolution, the Assembly would decide to renew the mandate of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries to enable it to continue its work on that projected convention. According to operative paragraph 8, the Ad Hoc Committee would hold its fifth session from 8 April to 3 May 1985.

527. I now turn to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 130 [A/39/778/Rev.1], paragraph 6 of which contains the draft resolution which was adopted by the Committee by consensus. By the terms of the draft resolution, the Assembly would, inter alia, recommend that the International Law Commission should continue its work on all the topics in its current programme.

528. I now invite the Assembly to turn to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 131 [A/39/779]. The Committee adopted by consensus the draft resolution contained in paragraph 9 of the report. By the terms of the draft resolution, the General Assembly would, inter alia, note with appreciation that an invitation has been extended by the Government of Austria to hold the Conference on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organizations or between International Organizations at Vienna and would decide that the Conference shall be held there from 18 February to 21 March 1986. By the draft resolution, the Assembly would appeal to participants in the Conference to organize, prior to the convening of the Conference, consultations primarily on the organization and methods of work, and would decide to include in the provisional agenda of its fortieth session an item entitled "Preparation for the United Nations Conference on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organizations or between International Organizations".

529. I now turn to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 132 [A/39/780]. Paragraph 7 of the report contains a draft resolution which was adopted by consensus by the Committee, by which, inter alia, the Assembly would strongly condemn any terrorist and criminal acts violating the security of missions accredited to the United Nations and the safety of their personnel and would request the Committee on Relations with the Host Country to continue its work.

530. The report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 133 is contained in document A/39/781, paragraph 12 of which contains draft resolutions A and B, which were adopted by the Committee without a vote. By the terms of draft resolution A, the Assembly would decide that the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization should hold its next session from 4 to 29 March 1985 and would define the tasks to be accomplished at that session; by draft resolution B, the conclusions of the Special Committee on the rationalization of the procedures of the General Assembly would be approved.

531. I turn now to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 134 [A/39/782]. By the terms of the draft resolution contained in paragraph 8 of the report, which the Committee adopted without a vote, the Assembly would, inter alia, appeal to Member States representing different legal systems to undertake consultations on the draft Declaration on Social and Legal Principles relating to the Protection and Welfare of Children, with Special Reference to Foster Placement and Adoption Nationally and Internationally, with a view to finding out the extent to which they would join in the common endeavour of completing the work on the draft Declaration and would decide that this item would come before the Assembly again at its forty-first session.

532. In connection with the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 135 [A/39/783], I draw the Assembly's attention to paragraph 8 of the report, which contains the draft resolution recommended to the Assembly for adoption and which was adopted by the Committee by 111 votes to none, with 13 abstentions. Among other provisions, the Assembly would take note of the report of the Working Group on the Review of the Multilateral Treaty-Making Process, together with its final document thereon [A/C.6/39/L.12, annex], recommended to all States considering the initiation of a multilateral treaty within the framework of the United Nations to give consideration to the procedures set out in the final document.

533. In this connection, I draw the attention of the members of the Assembly to the fact that, as the report of the Working Group on the Review of the Multilateral Treaty-Making Process was reproduced in limited quantities, it will be reissued for general distribution as document A/C.6/39/8 and will become an integral part of the official records of the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly, so that it can remain easily and widely accessible in the years to come.

534. The report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 136 is contained in document A/39/784. The Committee adopted without a vote the draft decision contained in paragraph 9 of the report, aimed basically at extending the arrangements made at earlier sessions for the final preparation of the draft Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment.

535. The report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 137 is contained in document A/39/785. The Committee adopted by consensus the draft decision contained in paragraph 5 of the report and recommends it to the Assembly for adoption. The Assembly would thereby, inter alia, decide to defer to its fortieth session consideration of the reports of the Secretary-General on draft standard rules of procedure for United Nations conferences.

536. That concludes my introduction of the reports of the Sixth Committee on the agenda items allocated to it by the General Assembly. I apologize for having spoken at such length, but in view of the importance of the questions discussed this year, as in previous years, in the Committee, it seemed to me warranted to give them a fairly detailed presentation.

Pursuant to rule 66 of the rules of procedure, it was decided not to discuss the reports of the Sixth Committee.

537. The PRESIDENT: Statements will be limited to explanations of vote. The positions of delegations regarding the various recommendations of the Sixth Committee have been made clear in the Committee and are reflected in the relevant official records.

538. May I remind members that, in paragraph 7 of its decision 34/401, the General Assembly decided that, when the same draft resolution is considered in a Main Committee and in plenary meeting, a delegation should, as far as possible, explain its vote only once: that is, either in the Committee or in plenary meeting, unless that delegation's vote in the plenary meeting is different from its vote in the Committee. May I also remind members that, in accordance with decision 34/401, explanations of vote are limited to 10 minutes and should be made by delegations from their seats.

539. We turn now to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 120 [A/39/770]. Are there any explanations of vote before the voting? There being none, the General Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Progressive development of the principles and norms of international law relating to the new international economic order", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 9 of its report. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

The draft resolution was adopted by 106 votes to 10, with 21 abstentions (resolution 39/76).

541. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now turn its attention to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 122 [A/39/772]. We shall now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Status of the Protocols Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and relating to the protection of victims of armed conflicts", recommended in paragraph 8 of that report. That draft resolution was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/77).

542. The PRESIDENT: I now invite members to turn to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 123 [A/39/773]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Development and strengthening of good-neighbourliness between States", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 8 of its report. The Committee adopted that draft resolution without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/78).

543. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now consider the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 124 [A/39/774]. We shall now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Peaceful settlement of disputes between States", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 10 of its report. That draft resolution was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/79).

544. The PRESIDENT: I now invite members to turn their attention to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 125 [A/39/775]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 9 of its report. A recorded vote has been requested.

The draft resolution was adopted by 122 votes to none, with 15 abstentions (resolution 39/80).

545. The PRESIDENT: We turn next to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 126 [A/39/776]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Report of the Special Committee on Enhancing the Effectiveness of the Principle of Non-Use of Force in International Relations", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 11 of its report. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of the draft resolution is contained in document A/39/734. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia.

Against: Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Iceland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

Abstaining: Australia, Austria, Brazil, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ireland, Ivory Coast, New Zealand, Paraguay, Sweden, Turkey.

The draft resolution was adopted by 111 votes to 15, with 10 abstentions (resolution 39/81).

546. The PRESIDENT: We turn next to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 127 [A/39/698]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Report of the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 6 of its report. The Committee adopted that draft resolution by consensus. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/82).

547. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 128 [A/39/722]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Consideration of effective measures to enhance the protection, security and safety of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 7 of its report. The Committee adopted the draft resolution without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/83).

548. The PRESIDENT: In the light of the particular decision which the Assembly has just taken, two delegations have asked to make statements, and I shall now call on them.

549. Mr. RAY (United States of America): The United States is pleased to participate in the consensus adoption of the resolution concerning the protection of diplomats which comes before us on the recommendation of the Legal Committee.

550. Terrorism is war against civilized society. For the terrorist, violence is politics, contrary to everything for which the United Nations stands. Nothing—I repeat, nothing—can justify terrorism. It is incumbent on the organized international community to leave no doubt that it does not tolerate terrorism.

551. During the past year, the United States has suffered the anguish of having its diplomats killed and its embassies attacked. Only last week, two American civilians—officials of the Agency for International Development—were brutally murdered aboard the hijacked Kuwaiti plane in Teheran. These American diplomats were singled out for murder. On 20 September of this year, the United States Embassy in Beirut was bombed. American and other lives were lost and scores of people were injured. Other United States diplomats and diplomatic establishments at Beirut and elsewhere have been attacked. Americans have been killed in Europe and in Africa. We feel these losses deeply, and also those of other nations.

552. These and other recent tragedies involving the loss of life of diplomats of various nationalities as well as international civil servants make it imperative that we not only mourn the terrible losses, but join together to prevent the recurrence of such tragic, outrageous murders. The least we could do tonight was to adopt the resolution before us by consensus and ensure that each and every Member State cooperate with one another and with the Secretary-General to combat such attacks.

553. All acts of terrorism are appalling. At the human and moral levels, attacks against diplomats are no more appalling than any other acts of terrorism against persons, but they may be more dangerous to peace. Diplomats and international civil servants are the means by which States communicate with each other. Serious differences between States will continue to exist, and attacks on diplomats strike at our principal means of resolving those differences.

554. The United States believes that the United Nations should take determined action against terrorism. We can think of no better place to start than with the protection of diplomats. All nations surely desire the protection of their officials.

555. In the past, the United Nations has adopted treaties and resolutions condemning and outlawing hijacking and other acts of terrorism against international civil aviation. The United Nations has also approved treaties and resolutions prohibiting the taking of hostages and outlawing attacks on diplomats. We have still not done enough, yet we can and we must honour these treaties in full.

556. The resolution we have adopted today by consensus should serve notice that the nations meeting here in organized session do not condone and will not tolerate acts of violence against diplomats or against international civil servants. We hope all nations will implement the recommendations of this resolution. It is the very least we can do now to act against attacks on diplomats and international civil servants.

557. Mr. MILES (United Kingdom): The fact that the Secretary-General has thought fit to issue an important statement on this item demonstrates both its intrinsic importance and its current relevance. My delegation warmly welcomes his statement.

558. Some of the shocking terrorist crimes of the last few months have been directed against my own country and its representatives. I am grateful for the messages of condolence which we have received from all sides. But I do not speak today in order to draw attention to any particular British problem. It is a problem which affects us all equally.

559. Since diplomacy began, it has been accepted that relations between States cannot be conducted unless their representatives can explain their Government's policies and defend their Government's interests without physical peril. Once the safety of government officials becomes hostage to the displeasure of other Governments—and still more so of dissident groups—at their Government's policies, it is the whole fabric of international diplomacy which tumbles to the ground. Since the founding of the United Nations, we have all accepted that the same principles apply to officials of the Organization.

560. In recent months, we have seen attacks against my own country, as I have said, but also against many others, against States of all kinds. No one is spared, neither Arab nor Israeli, neither Iranian nor Iraqi. The United Nations itself has been attacked, in the person of one of its senior officials. As soon as it becomes part of the currency of international life that vengeance may be taken on the persons of governmental or international officials, then none of us, without exception, will be safe from this contagion.

561. Perhaps none of this is new. Officials of the United Nations have been murdered before, even officials who have been singled out for no other reason than their involvement in peace-making and peace-keeping. We sometimes feel that the level of terrorist attacks is higher now than ever before, and that may be true. But the frequency of attacks must not be allowed to blunt our sense of outrage. However many or few the assaults on them, the principles remain the same. We here, in the meeting-place of the world, signal our determination to uphold them.

562. These are principles which all the Governments of the world are at one in accepting. That is because all of us will lose if acts of terrorism cause the international system to break down. Moreover, there is no difference on this point between Governments and peoples. Any individual or organization that commits a crime of the kind we are discussing weakens the fabric of international life to the detriment of everyone. The terrorists must be made to understand that the Governments of the world will not give in to threats or negotiate under duress.

563. It is for the Organization and for all the Governments represented here to make these truths clear and understood. My Government is proud to have taken a lead in encouraging co-operation between Governments to end the menace of terrorism. That is why we thought it right to make a statement on this item today rather than let it pass unremarked, as just another perennial Sixth Committee item that is simply nodded through.

564. The PRESIDENT: I now invite members to turn their attention to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 129 [A/39/777]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Drafting of an international convention against the recruitment, use, financing and training of mercenaries", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 11 of its report. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of the draft resolution is contained in document A/39/817. The Sixth Committee adopted the draft resolution by consensus. May I take it that the Assembly also wishes to adopt the draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/84).

565. The PRESIDENT: Next we shall consider the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 130 [A/39/778/Rev.1]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Report of the International Law Commission", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 6 of its report. The Committee adopted the draft resolution by consensus. May I take it that the Assembly also adopts it?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/85).

566. The PRESIDENT: We now turn to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 131 [A/39/779]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "United Nations Conference on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organizations or between International Organizations", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 9 of its report. The Committee adopted the draft resolution by consensus. May I take it that the Assembly also wishes to adopt that draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/86).

567. The PRESIDENT: We turn next to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 132 [A/39/780]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Report of the Committee on Relations with the Host Country", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 7 of its report. The Committee adopted the draft resolution by consensus. May I take it that the Assembly also wishes to adopt it?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/87).

568. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now turn to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 133 [A/39/781]. I invite members to turn their attention to the draft resolutions entitled "Report of the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the strengthening of the role of the Organization", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 12 of its report. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of the draft resolutions is contained in document A/39/818. The Sixth Committee adopted draft resolutions A and B without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolutions A and B were adopted (resolutions 39/88 A and B).

569. The PRESIDENT: Next we turn to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 134 [A/39/782]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Draft Declaration on Social and Legal Principles relating to the Protection and Welfare of Children, with Special Reference to Foster Placement and Adoption Nationally and Internationally", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 8 of its report. The Committee adopted that draft resolution without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly also adopts that draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/89).

570. The PRESIDENT: The next report of the Sixth Committee is on agenda item 135 [A/39/783]. I invite the Assembly to take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Review of the multilateral treaty-making process", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 8 of its report. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cyprus, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The draft resolution was adopted by 125 votes to none, with 12 abstentions (resolution 39/90).[7]

571. The PRESIDENT: We now turn to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 136 [A/39/784]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft decision entitled "Draft body of principles for the protection of all persons under any form of detention or imprisonment", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 9 of its report. The Committee adopted the draft decision without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/418).

572. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now turn to the report of the Sixth Committee on agenda item 137 [A/39/785] and take a decision on the draft decision entitled "Draft standard rules of procedure for United Nations conferences", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 5 of its report. The Committee adopted the draft decision by consensus. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/419).

The meeting rose at 11 p.m.

United Nations
GENERAL ASSEMBLY
THIRTY-NINTH SESSION
Official Records

100th PLENARY MEETING

Friday, 14 December 1984,
at 11.05 a.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

AGENDA ITEM 18

Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (continued):*

(a) Report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples;

(b) Reports of the Secretary-General

1. The PRESIDENT: This morning the Assembly will first review its consideration of agenda item 18. In this connection the Assembly has before it various draft resolutions and recommendations contained in document A/39/L.17 and Corr.1, A/39/L.18 and chapter II of the report of the Special Committee [A/39/23(Part I) and Corr.1]. I call on the Chairman of the Special Committee, Mr. Abdul Koroma of Sierra Leone.

2. Mr. KOROMA (Sierra Leone), Chairman of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples: Mr. President, I wish to thank you for calling me at this stage in connection with the Assembly's consideration of the three draft resolutions relating to agenda item 18.

3. In relation to the recommendation of the Special Committee set out in paragraph 10 of chapter II of its report, concerning the programme of activities in observance of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration, reference is made to the ongoing consultations by the Chairman. The purpose of my intervention at this time is to inform the Assembly that, with respect to the preparation of a compendium on the subject of decolonization referred to in subparagraph (n) of that paragraph, it has been agreed upon by members of the Special Committee that this recommendation need not be acted upon by the Assembly.

4. I may add in this regard that the majority of the members of the Special Committee are convinced of the usefulness of such a study and that it may be undertaken at a later date, as appropriate, in another context. I should like to place on record the appreciation of members of the Special Committee for the constructive initiative taken by the delegation of Venezuela.

5. I wish once again to emphasize the importance which the Committee attaches to the programme of activities in observance of this historic anniversary, more so in terms of the need to facilitate the speedy implementation of the Declaration with respect to those territories whose people have yet to exercise their right to self-determination and independence than for purely commemorative purposes stressing past achievements.

6. I wish to reiterate my sincere hope that these draft resolutions will receive the broadest possible support from the members in this forum.

7. The PRESIDENT: We shall now turn to draft resolutions A/39/L.17 and Corr.1 and L.18 as well as the recommendations contained in paragraphs 9 and 10 of chapter II of the report of the Special Committee. I call now on those representatives who wish to explain their vote before the voting on those draft resolutions.

8. Mr. STEFANINI (Italy): Italy is well aware that although decolonization has been a major achievement of the Organization, there are still peoples who need to be freed from the yoke of colonialism, namely, in Namibia. We believe that the Special Committee has been and still is instrumental in carrying out the Declaration on decolonization. To this end, obviously, the task of promoting and disseminating information, which has been entrusted to the Sub-Committee on Petitions, Information and Assistance, has always received specific acknowledgement from this Assembly.

9. We would have liked to maintain our support for the draft resolution on the dissemination of information on decolonization. As such, the text contained in document A/39/L.18 would have been perfectly acceptable if it did not imply the approval of a part of the report of the Special Committee on which we have the strongest reservations. I refer to chapter III.

10. We disagree on some elements of the report, especially in that they contain unjustified criticism of member countries or groups of countries and references to questions which are not included in the mandate of the Special Committee. In our view it would be quite inappropriate, to say the least, to ask the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat to carry out unfriendly activities towards States Members of the United Nations.

11. Therefore, Italy will abstain from voting on draft resolution A/39/L.18 on the dissemination of information on decolonization.

12. Mr. MAXEY (United Kingdom): The Assembly is aware from my delegation's statement on decolonization on 5 December that we have serious reservations about the three draft resolutions before us today.

---

*Resumed from the 87th meeting.

13. We note that the rhetoric in draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1 on the implementation of the Declaration is identical with last year's [resolution 38/54] and that it is primarily concerned with apartheid and Namibia. We have made it clear in the Assembly exactly where we stand on those two problems. But the draft resolution, sadly, says nothing about the true situation in the remaining British dependent Territories, which make up about half the agenda of the Special Committee. Moreover, much of the language is carping, ungenerous and irrelevant. Our primary responsibility is to the Governments and the peoples of our dependent Territories. Given the scant account which this draft resolution takes of their aspirations and interests, we are compelled once again to vote against.

14. With regard to draft resolution A/39/L.18, on dissemination of information on decolonization, we of course support publicity to promote awareness of the rights of all peoples to self-determination. But much of the information work on decolonization done by the United Nations is contentious, undesirable and unnecessary. Moreover, information work on decolonization should obviously decrease as colonialism itself diminishes. But this draft resolution argues that it should be intensified. When the United Nations is faced with so many more pressing tasks, how can that be justified?

15. Is the Assembly aware, for example, that the report of the Special Committee contains a proposal to hold yet another seminar next year on dissemination of information on decolonization with non-governmental organizations? Is it aware that a separate seminar on the same subject is recommended, this time with the participation of the news media? Is it familiar with the proposals for studies on the importance of decolonization for the promotion of world peace, on military bases and activities in colonial Territories, and even on issues outside the General Assembly's competence? These are just some of the spendthrift and politically dubious proposals contained in the report of the Special Committee.

16. But is it necessary to have a separate draft resolution on dissemination of information on decolonization at all? After all, there exists perfectly adequate machinery for dealing with information questions in the United Nations. Does it, then, make sense to decentralize the handling of information questions according to subject-matter and thereby to encourage the proliferation of information resolutions? In the interests of the efficient management of the Organization, the answer must be "No".

17. For all these reasons, we must, regretfully, vote against draft resolution A/39/L.18.

18. The third draft resolution before us today concerns the celebrations to mark the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration on decolonization. The process of decolonization is an important event, and we have no quarrel with that. But is the General Assembly aware of the extremely lavish activities that the draft resolution proposes? Would we not better match our sense of priorities and a genuine concern for people by, for example, contributing to famine relief in Africa? If this is not thought to be acceptable, surely it would be better in the eyes of the world to spend money not on ourselves but on the colonial peoples for whom the Special Committee is supposed to be showing concern. In the light of all those considerations, we are compelled to vote against the draft resolution contained in paragraph 9 of chapter II of the report of the Special Committee.

19. Mrs. KUROKOCHI (Japan): My delegation will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.17 and Corr.1 and L.18 because we firmly support the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, and hope that it will be duly implemented. My delegation commends the sponsors of the draft resolutions for their efforts in trying to avoid the insertion of various unnecessary and controversial elements that have often appeared in resolutions relating to decolonization.

20. At the same time, however, I must, with regret, express my delegation's reservations on certain provisions contained in these documents. My delegation cannot support some parts of the report of the Special Committee, which paragraph 5 of draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1 and paragraph 1 of draft resolution A/39/L.18 approve, and therefore wishes to indicate its reservations.

21. For reasons we have made clear on a number of occasions, including meetings at this session, my delegation has reservations on other paragraphs in draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1, particularly paragraphs 4, 6, and 10. Moreover, it is my delegation's understanding that paragraph 7 is intended not as a condemnation of all foreign economic activities, but rather of a particular type of them, which in fact impedes the process of self-determination in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

22. My delegation will also vote in favour of the draft resolution contained in paragraph 9 of chapter II of the report of the Special Committee, on the programme of activities in observance of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, in the same spirit as that in which we support the two draft resolutions I have just mentioned. However, my delegation cannot support some of the activities for commemoration mentioned in the annex to the draft resolution. In particular, the subsidiary organs of the General Assembly should observe the directives set out by the General Assembly, including resolution 31/140, which states that United Nations bodies may hold sessions away from their headquarters only when host Governments agree to pay the additional costs directly or indirectly involved.

23. Mr. LUNDVIK (Sweden): I have the honour to speak on behalf of the five Nordic countries—Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden. The Nordic countries' abiding commitment to the process of decolonization is well known. That process has, with the exception of Namibia, very nearly run its course. It is one of the historic achievements of this Organization. The Nordic countries will vote in favour of the three draft resolutions before us. We regret, however, that we cannot do so without reservations.

24. Draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1 contains formulations to which we cannot give our consent. For example, paragraph 4 contains formulations that are contrary to the principle upheld by the Nordic countries, that, in conformity with its Charter, the United Nations should always encourage only peaceful solutions. Furthermore, we find paragraph 10 too categorically formulated.

25. Our vote on paragraph 1 of draft resolution A/39/L.18 regarding the chapter of the report of the Special Committee relating to the dissemination of information should not be interpreted as an approval of all specific parts of that chapter. In particular, we disapprove of paragraph 20 (6), regarding a study by the Department of Political Affairs, Trusteeship and Decolonization on a Territory not on the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories approved by the General Assembly.

26. Finally, we have reservations with regard to the substantial additional expenditures that the proposed large meetings away from headquarters involve. The Nordic countries support the general principle embodied in General Assembly resolution 31/140 that United Nations bodies shall meet at their established headquarters.

27. Mr. ROWE (Australia): One of the most important contributions made by the United Nations has been in the field of decolonization, and Australia is proud to have played its part. The year 1984 has been a particularly memorable one for Australia because, with the attainment of self-determination by the Cocos (Keeling) Islands, Australia's role as an administering Power came to an end.

28. The United Nations success in decolonization has meant that the General Assembly and the Special Committee have been faced in recent years with a dwindling list of Non-Self-Governing Territories, with Namibia as the most difficult and the most intractable problem on the decolonization agenda. The Australian Government fully supports the goal of independence for the people of Namibia and calls upon South Africa to cease its illegal occupation of the Territory and to co-operate in the implementation of the United Nations plan for the independence of that Territory. With the exception of Namibia, the process of decolonization is being worked out in a peaceful and measured manner in the remaining Non-Self-Governing Territories in accordance with the wishes of the peoples of those Territories.

29. Turning to the draft resolutions before us, my delegation will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.17 and Corr.1 and L.18 and of the draft resolution concerning the commemoration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the signing of the Declaration. We shall do so in spite of the fact that we have a number of objections to elements contained therein. My delegation remains firmly of the view that this Organization ought to seek to resolve international disputes by peaceful means, and we cannot accept endorsement of armed struggle, as is affirmed in paragraph 4 of draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1. Nor can we accept that the existence of Non-Self-Governing Territories poses a serious threat to international peace and security, as is affirmed in paragraph 2.

30. Turning to draft resolution A/39/L.18 on the dissemination of information, I should emphasize that my delegation accepts that the United Nations has a role to play in keeping the international community informed of progress in the decolonization area. We are opposed, however, to certain of the proposals for action in this field contained in the reports of the Special Committee, particularly those relating to Territories which are not on the Assembly's list of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

31. With relation to the programme of activities in observance of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the signing of the Declaration, I should like to draw the Assembly's attention to the letter sent by the representative of Australia to the Chairman of the Special Committee on 10 September 1984, which is annexed to chapter II of the report of the Special Committee. As I said in my opening remarks, we believe that the bulk of the work on the decolonization agenda has now been concluded and that, in reaching this twenty-fifth anniversary, we should rightly rejoice at our successes. We do not believe, however, that it is appropriate to embark upon an ambitious programme, as proposed by the Special Committee.

32. As we outlined in our letter, we believe that in looking to the future it seems desirable to consider how the United Nations might arrive at viable permanent solutions for the remaining small Territories, rather than seek to develop ambitious plans for the continuation of the Special Committee's work along existing paths.

33. Accordingly, my delegation is opposed to the proposed holding of a series of meetings and seminars away from Headquarters in 1985 in celebration of this anniversary, and we voted against the financial implications of these proposals in the Fifth Committee.

34. Mr. SVOBODA (Canada): As is well known, the Canadian delegation has supported and will continue to support the decolonization process. We shall vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.18 on the dissemination of information. That said, we have serious reservations about some of the recommendations contained in the associated report of the Special Committee. We do not believe that the Special Committee should involve itself in matters which are beyond its jurisdiction, either because those issues are essentially domestic or because they are matters for other United Nations bodies. Palau, as a strategic Trust Territory, falls into the latter category.

35. Canada cannot subscribe to the notion contained in the report of the Special Committee of placing restrictions on freedom of the press, specifically on foreign correspondents based in South Africa. Indeed, that sort of recommendation clearly contradicts the thrust of the draft resolution. Reports from such correspondents inform readers of the Western media of the evils of the apartheid system, not to mention progress in other African countries that they visit from time to time. The Canadian delegation notes that the Special Committee's report refers to some sort of hostile campaign by some Western countries and the mass media to depict national liberation movements as terrorist organizations. No such campaign exists, nor is there any sort of link between Governments of Western countries and the mass media. Indeed, the media are free to report on events as they see fit.

36. My delegation will abstain in the votes on draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1 and on that concerning the twenty-fifth anniversary celebrations, contained in chapter II of the Special Committee's report. We have serious reservations about the financial implications.

37. In the case of draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1, furthermore, we cannot accept the implicit support for armed struggle or the unconditional call for the withdrawal of military bases from colonial Territories.

38. Mr. AKYOL (Turkey) (interpretation from French): My delegation will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1, since Turkey strongly supports the efforts of the international community in the struggle against colonialism. However, we have reservations about paragraph 10 of the draft resolution. We consider that it is not worded in a sufficiently balanced way.

39. Mr. KURPERSHOEK (Netherlands): The importance of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, adopted by the General Assembly in 1960 as resolution 1514 (XV), is well-established. We are daily reminded of it as we walk through the gates of the United Nations and look up at the 159 fluttering flags, displaying the national colours of the Members of the Organization. The world in general, as reflected in the membership of the United Nations, has undergone a radical transformation as a result of the decolonization process, to which resolution 1514 (XV) made a significant contribution.

40. Today, that process has, by and large, been completed, and the few remaining Non-Self-Governing Territories maintain their ties with the administering Powers in accordance with the democratically expressed wishes of their inhabitants.

41. The Netherlands remains committed to the full implementation of resolution 1514 (XV) and will continue its efforts to further international economic co-operation and to promote social, economic and educational development in accordance with its provisions.

42. This year we have had the pleasure of welcoming the accession to independence of Brunei Darussalam and its admission as the 159th Member of the United Nations.

43. The one major exception to the successful implementation of resolution 1514 (XV) remains, of course, Namibia. Ending South Africa's illegal occupation of Namibia rightly remains one of the central objectives of the United Nations. The Netherlands Government will continue to support all efforts aimed at enabling the people of Namibia to exercise, at the earliest possible date, their right to self-determination and independence in accordance with Security Council resolutions 385 (1976) and 435 (1978).

44. Because of the importance my country attaches to the principles laid down in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, we shall vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1. There are certain elements in draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1, however, which we cannot support. In particular, we have reservations concerning paragraphs 2, 4, 7, 8 and 10.

45. My delegation will abstain in the vote on draft resolution A/39/L.18 on the dissemination of information on decolonization. Among other things, the Netherlands objects to a number of elements in the report of the Special Committee, which the draft resolution would approve. Against the background of the existing broad consensus regarding the issue of decolonization, my delegation regrets that some of the recommendations in that report seek to divert the Special Committee from its proper task and to make the true interests of the peoples of the dependent Territories subservient to a campaign of defamation against one particular group of countries.

46. My delegation will also abstain in the vote on the Programme of Activities in Observance of the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the Declaration on decolonization. In our view, the resources for the observance of that anniversary must be found within the regular budget of the Organization. For this occasion to be celebrated in a fitting manner there is no need for activities on the lavish scale envisaged in this programme. Moreover, there are some elements in the programme to which my Government cannot agree.

47. The PRESIDENT: Before we proceed to the voting, I wish to announce that five countries have joined the sponsors of draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1, and four countries have joined the sponsors of draft resolution A/39/L.18. The Assembly will now begin the voting process and take a decision on the draft resolutions and recommendations contained in documents A/39/L.17 and Corr.1 and L.18 and in chapter II of document A/39/23 (Part I) and Corr.1. The programme budget implications of those draft resolutions are contained in the report of the Fifth Committee [A/39/825].

48. The Assembly will vote first on draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1. A recorded vote has been requested.

Abstaining: Belgium, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands.

The draft resolution was adopted by 139 votes to 2, with 6 abstentions (resolution 39/92).

50. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now vote on the draft resolution contained in paragraph 9 of chapter II of the report of the Special Committee [A/39/23 (Part I) and Corr.1]. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ireland, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

Abstaining: Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands.

The draft resolution was adopted by 137 votes to 2, with 7 abstentions (resolution 39/93).

51. The PRESIDENT: I should now like to draw the attention of members to the recommendations contained in paragraph 10 of chapter II of document A/39/23 (Part I) and Corr.1. If I hear no objection, I shall take it that the Assembly adopts those recommendations of the Special Committee, bearing in mind the statement made by the Chairman of the Special Committee this morning [see para. 3 above].

It was so decided (decision 39/420).

52. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their votes.

53. Mr. LEHNE (Austria): Austria considers that the process of decolonization constitutes one of the outstanding achievements of the United Nations. Austria has consistently supported the efforts of the United Nations in this regard.

54. In view of our sincere commitment to the process of decolonization and to the right of peoples to self-determination, Austria has supported all draft resolutions submitted under this item. However, we have reservations with regard to some of the provisions contained in these texts. In particular, I wish to refer to paragraph 4 of draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1 and to emphasize that we understand that paragraph as referring exclusively to struggle by peaceful means, as befits an Organization which is built on the principles of the non-use of force and the peaceful settlement of disputes.

55. Ms. O'FARRELL (Ireland): Ireland has, whenever possible, supported draft resolutions under this item in order to reaffirm our support for the process of peaceful decolonization based upon resolution 1514 (XV) and for the work of the United Nations generally in the decolonization field. In this spirit my delegation has voted in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.17 and Corr.1 and L.18. We also voted in favour of the draft resolution contained in paragraph 9 of chapter II of the report of the Special Committee and relating to the Programme of Activities in Observance of the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

56. My delegation, however, has reservations on some of the generalizations in draft resolution A/39/L.17 and Corr.1, and, with regard to paragraph 10 of that draft resolution, I should like to reaffirm that in determining our attitude towards specific military bases and installations my delegation will be guided by the attitudes, freely expressed, of the inhabitants of the Territories in question.

57. In addition, while we support in general the work of the Special Committee, we have reservations in relation to some of its recommendations and decisions.

58. Mr. CHEN CHARPENTIER (Mexico), Rapporteur of the Special Political Committee (interpretation from Spanish): I have the honour to present to the General Assembly for its consideration this morning 10 reports of the Special Political Committee.

59. The first report [A/39/609] relates to agenda item 70. The Special Political Committee considered this item at two meetings, and after hearing 18 statements in the general debate adopted a draft resolution without a vote. The draft resolution, which appears in paragraph 8 of the report, is recommended to the General Assembly for adoption.

60. The second report [A/39/712] relates to agenda item 71. Ten meetings of the Special Political Committee were devoted to this item and 47 delegations took part in the discussion. Eight draft resolutions, all of which were adopted by recorded votes, appear in paragraph 26 of the report and are recommended to the General Assembly for adoption.

61. The third report [A/39/713], relates to agenda item 72. The Special Political Committee devoted nine meetings to consideration of this item, between 2 November and 1 December, and, after hearing 48 speakers in the general debate, adopted by consensus the draft resolution which appears in paragraph 10 of the report. I commend that draft resolution to the General Assembly for adoption.

62. With regard to agenda item 73, the Committee considered this item at four meetings and heard 29 statements in the general debate. The draft resolution, which was adopted without a vote, appears in paragraph 6 of the report [A/39/610] and is recommended to the General Assembly for adoption.

63. Turning to agenda item 74, twelve meetings were devoted to consideration of this item and 76 speakers participated in the general debate. The two draft resolutions, both of which were adopted by recorded votes, appear in paragraph 15 of the report and are recommended to the General Assembly for adoption.

64. The next report [A/39/715] relates to item 75 of the agenda. The Special Political Committee considered this item at 10 meetings and heard 42 statements in the general debate. Eleven draft resolutions, which appear in paragraph 35 of the report, are recommended to the General Assembly for adoption. Two of the draft resolutions were adopted without a vote and the rest by recorded votes.

65. Four meetings of the Special Political Committee were devoted to agenda item 76 and 24 delegations took part in the debate. The draft resolution, which was adopted without a vote, appears in paragraph 12 of the report [A/39/621] and is recommended to the General Assembly for adoption.

66. The next report [A/39/716] relates to agenda item 77. The Committee considered this item at four meetings and heard 17 statements in the general debate. The draft resolution, which was adopted by a recorded vote, appears in paragraph 9 of the report and is recommended to the General Assembly for adoption.

67. With regard to agenda item 78, and for the reasons set out in paragraph 3 of the report of the Committee [A/39/717/Rev.1], the Special Political Committee recommends that the General Assembly include the item in the provisional agenda of its fortieth session.

68. Lastly, I present the Committee's report on agenda item 79 [A/39/670]. For the reasons set out in paragraph 3 of the report, the Special Political Committee recommends that the General Assembly include this item in the provisional agenda of its fortieth session.

Pursuant to rule 66 of the rules of procedure, it was decided not to discuss the reports of the Special Political Committee.

69. The PRESIDENT: Statements will be limited to explanations of vote. The positions of delegations regarding the various recommendations of the Special Political Committee have been made clear in the Committee and are reflected in the relevant official records.

70. May I remind members that in paragraph 7 of its decision 34/401 the General Assembly decided as follows: "When the same draft resolution is considered in a Main Committee and in plenary meeting, a delegation should, as far as possible, explain its vote only once, i.e., either in the Committee or in plenary meeting unless that delegation's vote in plenary meeting is different from its vote in the Committee."

71. We shall consider first the report of the Special Political Committee on agenda item 70 [A/39/609]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution recommended by the Special Political Committee in paragraph 8 of its report. The Committee adopted that draft resolution without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly also wishes to adopt it?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/94).

72. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to the report of the Special Political Committee on agenda item 71 [A/39/712].

73. There are no representatives wishing to speak in explanation of vote before the voting. The Assembly will therefore now vote upon draft resolutions A to H, one by one. After all the votes have been taken, representatives will again be given an opportunity to explain their votes.

74. The Assembly will now take a decision on the eight draft resolutions recommended by the Special Political Committee in paragraph 26 of its report [A/39/712]. I invite members to turn their attention to draft resolution A. A recorded vote has been requested.

84. The PRESIDENT: I invite members to turn their attention to the report of the Special Political Committee on agenda item 72 [A/39/713]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution recommended by the Committee in paragraph 10 of its report. The Committee adopted that draft resolution by consensus. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/96).

85. The PRESIDENT: We shall next consider the report of the Special Political Committee on agenda item 73 [A/39/610]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution recommended by the Committee in paragraph 6 of its report. The Committee adopted that draft resolution without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly also wishes to do so?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/97).

86. The PRESIDENT: We turn next to the report of the Special Political Committee on agenda item 74 [A/39/714]. The Assembly will now take decisions on the two draft resolutions recommended by the Committee in paragraph 15 of its report. We turn first to draft resolution A. The programme budget implications of that draft resolution are contained in the report of the Fifth Committee [A/39/826]. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Ireland, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Draft resolution B was adopted by 122 votes to 6, with 17 abstentions (resolution 39/98 B).

88. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Australia for an explanation of vote.

89. Mr. FARMER (Australia): In explaining Australia's votes on the draft resolutions adopted under agenda item 74, I begin by expressing regret that it was not in the event possible to achieve consensus on either of the resolutions. It had seemed to us that in the light of the views of the very great majority of delegations, such an outcome should and could have been achievable. Certainly, the Australian delegation is grateful to other delegations for the positive spirit which was brought to bear in resolving differences on a number of delicate issues. We particularly appreciate the efforts which resulted in the reformulation of paragraph 9 of resolution A in a constructive and helpful way.

90. Having regard to progress which was made on such issues, it is, in our view, the more unfortunate that consensus was not able to be achieved on other issues. At the end of the process of consultations, the Australian delegation continued to have difficulty with the references in paragraphs 4 and 10 of resolution A, while on resolution B, we regretted the absence of a reference, however oblique, to resolution 3/1 adopted by UNESCO in 1983. Australia's abstention in the votes on the draft resolutions was based on these considerations. We would hope that next year's consideration of this item might be crowned by the adoption of consensus texts.

91. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now consider the report of the Special Political Committee on agenda item 75 [A/39/715].

92. I call on the representative of Pakistan, who wishes to revise one of the draft resolutions contained in paragraph 35 of the report.

93. Mr. EZDI (Pakistan): My delegation would like to introduce an oral revision to resolution I recommended by the Committee in paragraph 35 of its report.

94. This draft resolution, entitled "Protection of Palestine refugees", was introduced in the Committee by my delegation and was adopted by the Committee at its 29th meeting on 12 November.

95. The revision is being introduced on behalf of the sponsors of the draft resolution. Under this proposal, paragraph 2 of the draft resolution would be amended to read as follows:

> "Holds Israel responsible for the security of the Palestine refugees in occupied southern Lebanon, and calls upon it to fulfil its obligations as the occupying Power in this regard, in accordance with the pertinent provisions of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949;".

96. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Israel, who wishes to explain his vote before the voting.

97. Mr. BARROMI (Israel): The common element in the 11 draft resolutions before us is the continued acquiescence with the fundamentally unhealthy situation that is the artificial perpetuation of the refugee problem. Some draft resolutions are of an aggressive, partisan, anti-Israel character. The overall effect of these texts, if adopted, will be another growing refugee population, an ever-expanding bureaucracy and the rising curve of expenses to be funded by the international community. The United Nations will share for another year in the solution-oriented action afoot.

98. Another feature of the texts which are brought to this plenary meeting is the lack of balance, fairness and historical accuracy. The draft resolutions contain many outrageous and unwarranted allegations against my country. On the other hand, the responsibility of the Arab States for the creation of the refugee problem and for the present plight of many refugees is nowhere mentioned. There is no reference to the central fact that the Arab States ignited the flames of war in 1948 and encouraged the flight of the Palestinian Arabs from the fledgling State of Israel, which was then struggling for its very existence.

99. Draft resolution A notes with deep regret the non-implementation of paragraph 11 of resolution 194 (III) of 11 December 1948. But no regret is manifested anywhere for the Arab rejection of all offers of negotiation and of all attempts to implement United Nations constructive projects. In the 11 texts before us, Israel is repeatedly censured or condemned. There is no condemnation, however, of the Arab States. Their role in the transformation of refugee camps into terrorist bases, or in the naked power struggle which is going on in the camps between rival terrorist outfits, is simply ignored. Even the shelling a year ago of refugee camps by an Arab army is not considered worthy of recalling.

100. Some draft resolutions are of an obvious cantankerous nature. Let us take, for example, draft resolution K, which calls for a university in Jerusalem for Palestinian Arab refugees. To set up a university for refugees is an absurdity in educational terms. Furthermore, the demand that a new university be established in an area remarkable for its many institutions of higher learning shows a reckless disregard of sound administration and of any restraint in the use of international funding. This grotesque proposal can be explained only as a move in an overall strategy directed to institutionalize the refugee problem through the proliferation of new bodies and of new channels for pumping in international money.

101. Another draft resolution which defies logic is draft resolution J, which calls upon Israel to abandon its plans aimed at bettering the housing conditions of the refugees. In the jaundiced view of the authors of the draft resolution the voluntary moving of refugees to new, healthy and permanent lodgings is inadmissible. Paragraph 1 demands that the refugees remain in their camps presumably for ever. No comment is required.

102. Draft resolution H calls on the Secretary-General to take steps for the administration of refugee property in Israel. This text runs counter to the basic tenets of international law. Property rights and property regulations within the borders of a sovereign State are exclusively subject to domestic law and United Nations interference with that is unthinkable. What is at stake here is the principle of the sovereign equality of States, on which the whole structure of the United Nations rests. Draft resolution H is a juridical operation that should find no place in the United Nations records.

103. The most obvious example of politicization of the refugee item is draft resolution I, entitled "Protection of Palestine refugees". The draft resolution holds Israel responsible for the situation in southern Lebanon. The sixth preambular paragraph refers to "kidnapping, disappearances, evictions in the face of threats, explosions and arsons". It is well known, however, that these outrages do not occur in southern Lebanon. They occur every day in the parts of Lebanon which are not under Israeli control. It is equally known that a growing number of displaced persons stream from the north to the south to the Israeli-held areas, where order and tranquillity prevail. The text denounces Israel's occupation and ignores the root of all present Lebanese evils, that is, Syrian occupation and Syria's interference in the internal affairs of Lebanon. Syrian interference certainly plays a role these days in hindering an agreement for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Lebanese territory.

104. Draft resolution I is not a humanitarian document. It is an instrument of political warfare and as such it deserves outright rejection.

105. My delegation will vote against draft resolutions E, F, G, H, I, J and K and will abstain on draft resolutions A and D.

106. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolutions recommended by the Special Political Committee in paragraph 35 of its report [A/39/715]. I now put to the vote draft resolution A entitled "Assistance to Palestine refugees". A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United Republic of Tanzania, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: None.

Draft resolution K was adopted by 144 votes to 2 (resolution 39/99 K).[7]

117. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their vote.

118. Mr. FARTAS (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) (interpretation from Arabic): My delegation supported the draft resolutions on Israeli practices in occupied Arab territories as well as the draft resolution on the work of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East. Nevertheless, we should like to take this opportunity to reaffirm our firm position on the substance of the Palestinian question and therefore to express reservations about anything in the draft resolutions that might signify that my country would be prepared to recognize the Zionist entity or to confer legitimacy on it.

119. Mr. NIARE (Mali) (interpretation from French): My delegation is pleased to confirm its support for the work of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East. Consequently, I should like to announce that it had intended to sponsor the draft resolutions A/SPC/39/L.7 to L.17 on agenda item 75.

120. The PRESIDENT: I now invite members of the Assembly to turn their attention to the report of the Special Political Committee on agenda item 76 [A/39/621]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution recommended by the Committee in paragraph 12 of that report. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of this draft resolution is in document A/39/664. The Special Political Committee adopted the draft resolution without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do likewise?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/100).

121. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to the report of the Special Political Committee on agenda item 77 [A/39/716].

122. I call on the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic, who wishes to explain his delegation's vote before the voting.

123. Mr. ABOUCHAER (Syrian Arab Republic) (interpretation from Arabic): My delegation will vote in favour of the draft resolution contained in paragraph 9 of the Committee's report. The proposed canal, part of which will be built in the Gaza Strip, which is a Palestinian territory occupied since 1967, is a violation of norms and principles of international law, in particular of principles relating to the fundamental rights and duties of States in respect of the occupation of territory by force. This affects the rights of the Palestinian people and the inalienable national rights of peoples regarding all parts of their territory.

124. The Israeli canal would also have very dangerous consequences, irreparably compromising the rights of the Kingdom of Jordan, and affecting various aspects of the vital interests of that country.

125. In the light of what I have said, the Syrian Arab Republic would have wished to become a sponsor of this draft resolution.

126. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now proceed to take a decision on the draft resolution recommended in paragraph 9 of the Committee's report [A/39/716]. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of the draft resolution appears in document A/39/788. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Israel, United States of America.

Abstaining: Zaire.

The draft resolution was adopted by 143 votes to 2, with 1 abstention (resolution 39/101).[7]

127. The PRESIDENT: I shall call now on representatives who wish to explain their votes.

128. Mr. FARTAS (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) (interpretation from Arabic): My delegation wishes to express the same reservations it has expressed with respect to other draft resolutions.

129. Mr. HASSAN (Djibouti): My delegation would have liked to add its name to the list of sponsors of the draft resolution just adopted by the General Assembly.

130. The PRESIDENT: We shall now consider the report of the Special Political Committee on agenda item 78 [A/39/717/Rev.1]. The Assembly will take a decision on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee contained in paragraph 4 of its report. The Committee recommends that the General Assembly should include in the provisional agenda of its fortieth session the item entitled "Question of the Malagasy islands of Glorieuses, Juan de Nova, Europa and Bassas da India". If I hear no objection, I shall consider that the General Assembly adopts that recommendation.

The recommendation was adopted (decision 39/421).

131. The PRESIDENT: We turn finally to the report of the Special Political Committee on agenda item 79 [A/39/670]. In paragraph 5 of that report the Committee recommends that the General Assembly should include in the provisional agenda of its fortieth session the item entitled "Question of the composition of the relevant organs of the United Nations". In the absence of any objection, may I take it that the General Assembly adopts that recommendation?

The recommendation was adopted (decision 39/422).

132. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly has thus concluded its consideration of all the reports of the Special Political Committee.

The meeting rose at 12.50 p.m.

1. Mr. POLOWCZYK (Poland), Rapporteur of the Third Committee: I have the honour and privilege to introduce the reports of the Third Committee on agenda items 12, 92 to 98 and 100 to 102.

2. In paragraph 69 of its report on agenda item 12 [A/39/700], the Third Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of 20 draft resolutions. Draft resolutions I to XVII were adopted by the Committee without a vote. Draft resolution XVIII was adopted by a recorded vote of 83 to 13, with 35 abstentions. Draft resolution XIX was adopted by a recorded vote of 79 to 13, with 39 abstentions. Draft resolution XX was adopted by a recorded vote of 83 to 15, with 32 abstentions.

3. In paragraph 8 of its report on agenda item 92 [A/39/701], the Third Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of a draft resolution that was adopted by the Committee without a vote.

4. In paragraph 22 of its report on agenda item 93 [A/39/702], the Third Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of seven draft resolutions. Draft resolutions I to IV, VI and VII were adopted by the Committee without a vote. Draft resolution V was adopted by a recorded vote of 124 to 1, with 10 abstentions.

5. In paragraph 8 of its report on agenda item 94 [A/39/703], the Third Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of a draft resolution that it adopted by a recorded vote of 124 to 1, with 4 abstentions.

6. In paragraph 13 of its report on agenda item 102 [A/38/711], the Third Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of two draft resolutions. Draft resolution I was adopted by the Committee without a vote. Draft resolution II was adopted by a recorded vote of 118 to 1, with 13 abstentions.

7. In paragraph 12 of its report on agenda item 100 [A/39/709], the Third Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of two draft resolutions which it adopted without a vote.

8. In paragraph 16 of its report on agenda item 101 [A/39/710], the Third Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of three draft resolutions which it adopted without a vote.

9. In paragraph 7 of its report on agenda item 95 [A/39/704], the Third Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of a draft resolution that it adopted without a vote.

10. In paragraph 11 of its report on agenda item 96 [A/39/705], the Third Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of three draft resolutions. Draft resolution I was adopted by the Committee without a vote. Draft resolution II was adopted by a recorded vote of 100 to none, with 20 abstentions. Draft resolution III was adopted by a recorded vote of 97 to 6, with 17 abstentions.

11. In paragraph 7 of its report on agenda item 97 [A/39/706], the Third Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of a draft resolution that it adopted without a vote.

12. In paragraph 15 of its report on agenda item 98 [A/39/707], the Third Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of three draft resolutions. Draft resolutions I and III were adopted by the Committee without a vote. Draft resolution II was adopted by a recorded vote of 57 to 18, with 50 abstentions.

13. I submit the recommendations of the Third Committee to the General Assembly for adoption.

14. In concluding, I should like to express my warm and sincere gratitude to the Secretariat, in particular to Mrs. Pilar Santander-Downing and Mr. Valeri Yudin for their diligent work and the assistance extended to me.

Pursuant to rule 66 of the rules of procedure, it was decided not to discuss the reports of the Third Committee.

15. The PRESIDENT: Statements will be limited to explanations of vote. The positions of delegations regarding the various recommendations of the Third Committee have been made clear in the Committee and are reflected in the relevant official records.

16. I remind members that, in paragraph 7 of its decision 34/401, the General Assembly decided that, when the same draft resolution is considered in a Main Committee and in plenary meeting, a delegation should, as far as possible explain its vote only once, that is, either in the Committee or in plenary meeting, unless that delegation's vote in plenary meeting is different from its vote in the Committee. I also remind members that, in accordance with decision 34/401, explanations of vote are limited to 10 minutes and should be made by delegations from their seats.

17. The Assembly will consider first the report of the Third Committee on agenda item 12 [A/39/700].

18. I shall now call on those delegations wishing to explain their vote before the vote. I shall then put the recommendations of the Third Committee to the Assembly one by one, without interruption.

19. Mr. ARCILLA (Philippines): My delegation would like to explain its votes on draft resolution A/C.3/39/L.43/Rev.2, "Situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in El Salvador", draft resolution A/C.3/39/L.77, "Situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Guatemala", and draft resolution A/C.3/39/L.79, "Situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Chile".

20. In the past, the Philippines has voted against resolutions on the human rights situation in Chile, El Salvador and Guatemala. However, in view of the changing circumstances as they affect the situation in those three countries and elsewhere, the Philippines will abstain in the vote on the relevant resolutions this year. I should like to add that our abstention still reflects our main concern relating to the principle of non-intervention in the domestic affairs of States as stipulated in Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter of the United Nations. We feel that unless adequate safeguards are instituted to preserve and protect this principle, the appointment of a special rapporteur or representative to look into the human rights situation in any Member State might infringe on that principle.

21. Mr. GUMUCIO GRANIER (Bolivia) (interpretation from Spanish): In the debate on agenda item 12 in the Third Committee, my delegation explicitly stated the policy of the democratic Government of Bolivia in defence of the total validity of human rights and fundamental freedoms throughout the world and, furthermore, expressed its concern at and energetic condemnation of the violation of human rights wherever they are vulnerable.

22. The delegation of Bolivia once again repeats the desire of the Government and the people of Bolivia to see respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms restored in Chile, Guatemala and El Salvador. On this occasion we should like to refer to the report of the Third Committee contained in document A/39/700, in particular draft resolutions XVIII, XIX and XX relating to the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in El Salvador, Guatemala and Chile, respectively. As last year, for political reasons my delegation will not participate in the voting on those three draft resolutions and requests that this position be duly recorded in the proceedings of this meeting.

23. Mr. DAZA (Chile) (interpretation from Spanish): The delegation of Chile wishes to say that it will vote against the draft resolution on human rights and fundamental freedoms in Chile. In the Third Committee we explicitly stated that the legal rules of the Organization impose an overwhelming obligation to concern itself with promoting the development and encouragement of human rights in the world, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion, on the basis of objective, universal and non-political criteria. That same set of rules prohibits discrimination and selectivity.

24. I do not want to repeat here the flagrant violations of human rights—which I described in the Committee—that are occurring in the world and in respect of which the Organization has maintained a cynical and culpable silence. But I should like to point out that in so doing the draft resolution before us is, as it were, stillborn, inasmuch as it is selective and irresponsible.

25. In 1984, the name of George Orwell has been frequently mentioned in the Assembly. The forecast he made for this year presupposed a world in which words had lost their meaning. In what he said or wrote, he reflected in terms of fiction what those who wielded power wanted to say. Therefore, on the façade of the building housing the Ministry of Truth one could read the inscription: "War is peace, Freedom is slavery, Ignorance is strength".

26. The draft resolution submitted to this plenary meeting is Orwellian, inasmuch as it promotes the interests of countries which are ignorant of respect for human rights; it is Orwellian, because it has the support of those who have no concept of democracy, as is the case with the socialist countries of Eastern Europe; it is Orwellian, because it fails to recognize the institutional effort and the ultimately democratic goal of my country's policies; it is Orwellian, because most of the sponsors are accused of serious human rights violations in their own countries; it is Orwellian, because it reflects the irresponsible attitude of the Western European countries which have the moral obligation to understand us but, in actual fact, through the draft resolution are serving only internal political goals.

27. My delegation is against this draft resolution and my country does not recognize the validity of the charges against it. Chile accuses the Organization of not doing its duty, of politicizing the cause of human rights, and of acting selectively and in a discriminatory manner, thus committing an illegal act which is unqualified and invalid from the start.

28. Because of the selectivity, which my delegation rejects, we shall vote against the draft resolutions contained in documents A/C.3/39/L.43/Rev.2, on El Salvador, and A/C.3/39/L.77, on Guatemala.

29. Mr. ALBORNOZ (Ecuador) (interpretation from Spanish): With regard to human rights, Ecuador has constantly maintained as its national policy scrupulous observance of human rights and is very much concerned to see that they are complied with. We believe that human rights constitute an important source of international law. We hold that an essential element in the validity of human rights is their universality. We believe that all selectivity in international bodies in highlighting solely a few countries and singling them out for criticism, while silence is maintained with regard to the overwhelming majority of countries where human rights are being violated, is an inappropriate and unjust method which only serves to weaken the validity and credibility of the system. We believe that the United Nations, once its various pieces of machinery had been put in place, should produce an annual report on the observance of human rights in each and every country in the world. We insist that those who participate in debates and discussions on human rights in other countries should report to the international community, by way of a preliminary contribution, on the status of the observance of these rights in their own territories. In this respect, Ecuador has on various occasions pointed out that it has a democratic way of life based on free elections, total freedom of the press and free entry to and departure from the country for journalists of various media, while the same facilities are afforded citizens of our country and foreigners—without censorship, political prisoners, torture or declarations of a state of emergency. There is freedom of action for all political parties, full equality of rights for men and women and full exercise of labour laws.

30. We firmly maintain that, in so far as Latin America is concerned, it should be essentially Latin Americans who should busy themselves dealing with and solving the problems of the region. Consequently, we reaffirm our constant support for the Contadora Group's efforts to bring about peaceful coexistence in Central America, and we applaud its efforts to bring about agreement on this matter which will in the future, it is hoped, include a convergence of views on the part of the five States of the Central American region which make up the Group.

31. We repeat that it is not universally realistic, equitable or viable for the world Organization systematically to devote itself to criticizing failure to observe human rights solely and exclusively in certain countries of the Latin American region, while it maintains an ominous silence with regard to well-known and repeated violations in other regions or in the same region.

32. Consequently, Ecuador—out of respect for the duty of universal defence of human rights, and in order to promote the viability of the machinery for ensuring observance of human rights and rejecting their violations in each and every country of the international community—will abstain in the votes on the texts submitted with regard to the three Latin American countries, that is to say, draft resolutions XVIII, XIX and XX in document A/39/700, although in the case of El Salvador the language has been somewhat impartial, this time failing to mention just one sector of the negative aspects of the report of the Special Representative. It was necessary to point out that El Salvador has made progress in the exercise of freedom to vote, without extremism and with the bold initiative of inviting the leaders of the rebels to a free and frank dialogue in order to find democratic solutions and not to resort to arms to forge the destiny of the Salvadorian people, for whose total national and subregional reconciliation our delegation hopes.

33. Finally, Ecuador once again appeals to the sister countries of El Salvador, Chile and Guatemala, as well as other members of the international community, to adopt measures that will contribute to the total and full exercise of human rights on a universal scale.

34. Mr. FAJARDO-MALDONADO (Guatemala) (interpretation from Spanish): Before casting its vote, the delegation of Guatemala once again wishes to refer to draft resolution XIX in the report of the Third Committee [A/39/700], a draft resolution on the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Guatemala sponsored in the Committee by some European countries.

35. Noting the way in which this body has approached the situation of human rights in the world, we are witnessing once again a repetition of the same selective and discriminatory scenario which has been characteristic of the approach to this subject in previous years. Outside the Latin American countries, which are systematically and politically selected by those who have appointed themselves masters of this system of selectivity, it would appear that the rest of the world is a paradise on earth, an idyllic Utopia where there exists no totalitarianism imposed upon millions of human beings nor operetta-type dictatorships, no political violence, no northern or tropical gulags, no racial discrimination or governmental repression, no arms race or arms traffic; where there is no economic oppression, no governmental corruption, no terrorism, no sabotage, no exploitation of peoples by inept or corrupt leaders; where there is no cowardice or cynicism—which is what Latin American countries are being charged with—on the part of those countries involved in exploiting our resources and transacting important economic and commercial deals with our Governments; where there is no discrimination against emigrants from former colonies, no child pornography, no inhuman economic exploitation: in a few words, what there appears to be is respect, total rule and triumph of human rights throughout the rest of the world.

36. This alleged idyllic world is politically disregarded by countries such as those that sponsored the draft resolutions against Guatemala, particularly when there is a discussion on the subject of human rights in general. The existence of this supposed paradise on earth leads to a situation where the standard-bearers of human rights throughout the world do not deal at all with other latitudes because they seem to them to be perfect.

37. My delegation rejects this selective, discriminatory and cynical approach which is used against just one region of the world, Latin America, where three countries have been selected, including Guatemala. When the worst violations of human rights are occurring in the totalitarian areas of other regions of our planet, why, once again, do we find only three draft resolutions? We cannot countenance the hypocrisy of those countries which condemn the violation of human rights in other countries when they themselves are guilty of the same violations and oppress their peoples.

38. My delegation vigorously rejects the selectivity which has been used once again against Latin America, and the small Latin American countries in particular, including Guatemala, and we repeat what we have said in previous statements in the Third Committee. All of this simply helps to erode, weaken and detract from the credibility of and respect for the principles and institutions of human rights, as well as for the United Nations.

39. In casting our vote and rejecting draft resolutions XVIII and XX on El Salvador and Chile, respectively, we similarly vigorously repudiate draft resolution XIX against Guatemala inasmuch as it is selective, discriminatory and notable for its double standards; because it is politicized and because, unacceptably and intolerably, it attempts to interfere in the internal affairs of Guatemala, thus violating and distorting the Charter of the United Nations. Consequently, my country requests a recorded vote.

40. Mr. HERRERA CÁCERES (Honduras) (interpretation from Spanish): Even though it has not yet been possible to relegate to the past cases of selectivity whereby only Latin American countries continue to be the target of draft resolutions of the General Assembly, there is no doubt that this year some progress has been achieved towards an objective and balanced appreciation of the situation with regard to human rights in El Salvador, as reflected in the draft resolution contained in document A/C.3/39/L.71, sponsored by Costa Rica, Venezuela and Singapore in the Third Committee. The resolution could have been voted upon favourably by my delegation, but it was withdrawn as a result of negotiations involving this draft and the one contained in document A/C.3/39/L.43. Part of the philosophy and approach of that draft resolution could have been transferred greatly to the benefit of the content of A/C.3/39/L.43 which, as a result, was the subject of two revisions. However, the origins of the latter draft resolution, and part of its structure and orientation, are still the same as those which prompted Honduras, in previous years, and again this year, to vote against it.

41. In our statement on the subject of Central America on 24 October [36th meeting], we highlighted the meeting in La Palma as an exceptional event, motivated by the initiative of the President of El Salvador when he invited, from this very rostrum, his armed opponents to a meeting in the search for reconciliation in that sister country. That gesture and that attitude on the part of the Government of El Salvador should not be distorted, nor should we disregard the merits of the armed opposition forces in their acceptance of that initiative. Ultimately, the problem of El Salvador should be resolved by the Salvadorians; therefore the only thing we should take into account in this draft resolution is the humanitarian element, allowing the Salvadorians to determine their own political destiny.

42. In our statement in the Third Committee on 9 December last year,[1] we stated, inter alia, that although the United Nations should make sure to foster respect for and protection of universal human dignity, resolutions adopted in this body on the situation with regard to human rights in specific countries should bear the mark of strict impartiality and also be marked by pre-eminently humanitarian content, excluding all ideological elements.

43. Consequently, from our point of view, these resolutions should be objective and should include not only charges against legally constituted authorities of the respective States, but also should denounce, equally emphatically, violent actions carried out by the armed opposition forces in the same countries exclusively to achieve power by these means, clearly damaging the human rights and fundamental freedoms of innocent people. Thus, all parties involved in a situation of violence should be urged, without exception, to put an end to all acts of this nature so that loss of human life can cease as well as the sufferings of their respective peoples.

44. Furthermore, we stated that the international community in this kind of resolution should not overlook the decisions and efforts of the Government of the country in question in an attempt to bring about respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. A proper, balanced position obliges us to take note of this attitude and to encourage its development and full effective application, thus also promoting the assistance and international co-operation needed for this purpose. Otherwise, how can we justify the declaration that the United Nations is striving for a better world, if we neither recognize nor support the hopeful signs apparent in the actions of Governments of Member States?

45. There are obvious omissions in draft resolution A/C.3/39/L.43/Rev.2. It fails to mention a grave problem confronting El Salvador, the deprivation of our brothers in El Salvador who have been obliged to leave their homes and work, and take refuge in another part of the territory of the State in the search for protection, personal security and help to meet their elementary needs. Similarly, there is no reference to the voluntary return of Salvadorian refugees which is gradually taking place as a consequence of the efforts of the Government to restore a climate of tolerance and better security in a democratic and constitutional manner.

46. Indeed, if this kind of resolution is to be based on purely humanitarian principles, such as those contained in the Charter of the United Nations itself, in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenants on Human Rights,[2] we should include estimates or appeals for international co-operation and assistance of an additional nature so that Governments which are finding it difficult to ensure conditions which will make it possible for every individual to enjoy his economic, social, cultural, civil and political rights can fully ensure the exercise of these rights. It is the responsibility of the United Nations, as has often been mentioned in resolutions, to be constantly vigilant against violations of human rights wherever they may occur and thereby to eliminate the selective political approaches which have prevailed hitherto. In this way we would find more effective and objective all the energetic appeals of the international community for respect for the human rights and fundamental freedoms of all human beings.

47. On the basis of what I have just said and because these matters are not reflected in resolution A/C.3/39/L.43/Rev.2, as amended, on the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in El Salvador, my delegation will continue to vote against it.

48. Mr. ROSALES-RIVERA (El Salvador) (interpretation from Spanish): My delegation would like to state that draft resolution XVIII, on the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in El Salvador, contained in document A/39/700, contains objective paragraphs and elements reflecting the essential elements of the current policy of the Government of President Duarte, which is aimed at bringing about democracy, social and economic reforms, peace and, particularly, respect for human rights. Nevertheless, the origins of the draft resolution were a tendentious, partial and inimical document, the aim of which was to deal with matters which undoubtedly quite deliberately transcended the consideration of human rights and went into subjective and capricious assessments of a political nature, all couched in insulting language. Some of these characteristics have been bequeathed, unfortunately, to this draft resolution approved by the Third Committee.

49. For these reasons, we can only place on record our opposition to the general orientation of the draft resolution and the language of certain paragraphs, in both its operative and preambular parts. Accordingly, the resolution which we are about to vote on turns out to be a mixture of ideas, some positive, some negative, some constructive and some destructive, some relevant to the question of human rights, some highly politicized and falling outside the framework of the subject-matter. The resolution is a poorly worded symbiosis because the language has been changed from the original draft.

50. Throughout the process which produced this Third Committee resolution, our Government considered the various steps and attitudes of the countries which have concerned themselves with it. In this regard we would like to repeat what we stated in the period of time allotted for commenting on draft resolutions in the Committee. On that occasion, with respect to this draft resolution we stated:

> "We are concerned about the action of two of the sponsors. One of them is Mexico, which, together with three other countries in Latin America and with the assent of each of the five Central American countries, has been involved in working for peace in the area. Its attitude with regard to El Salvador, particularly reflected in draft resolution A/C.3/39/L.43 and Rev.1 (which were the reference numbers of the document in the Third Committee), placed the new Salvadorian Government in a dilemma because it precipitated a response to its conduct. We should not forget that it is the five Central American countries which, as sovereign States directly concerned, are responsible for ensuring the indispensable elements in the search for a negotiated and global settlement to bring about peace in Central America. Consequently, the following question arises: is it permissible for a third party to assume the role of the accuser of the Salvadorian Government and, at the same time, permit itself to continue to be a fully-fledged member of a group which is attempting to find a peace settlement by common accord among the five Central American Governments? Undoubtedly, all States in this Assembly will understand that there are certain lines of conduct which cannot be carried on in parallel with each other and cannot be carried out simultaneously without incompatibility. It is intolerable for a State to set itself up as an accuser and, at the same time, as an honest broker. We would like this to be clear to all members of the General Assembly so that in the future we will not be told that El Salvador was acting inopportunely."[3]

51. Other Latin American countries exerted a constructive influence with a view to ensuring that the original draft resolution was amended and brought further into line with the realities of what is occurring in El Salvador and with the report of the Special Representative, and that it recognized the tremendous efforts of the Government of President Duarte in the field of human rights, peace and the promotion of democracy. These countries have our undying gratitude. But, inasmuch as there has been a change in the original concept of the draft resolution, it still contains this interventionist streak and too great a degree of partiality.

52. We will not go into an analysis of each of its paragraphs since the general spirit of the draft resolution is inappropriate and it is riddled with political prejudice. However, we recognize that it has some positive elements. The draft resolution refers to the adoption of a new government policy and it states that because of that there has been a marked decrease in the number of human rights violations. It mentions the elections of 6 May this year and that President Duarte of El Salvador has a mandate to bring about social harmony and internal peace, and it recognizes the obvious desire of the new Government to establish a democracy governed by the rule of law and guaranteeing full respect for human rights. It welcomes the initiative, announced by President Duarte in the Assembly, in initiating a dialogue with the armed opposition, implicitly gives recognition to the socio-economic reforms which have been undertaken in El Salvador, and states that the hostilities of the guerrilla forces have caused civilian victims and material damage to the economic infrastructure of El Salvador.

53. Our delegation must point out that we once again reject the selective and discriminatory manner in which, principally for political reasons, the subject of human rights is treated in the General Assembly.

54. For all the reasons I have mentioned and because the draft resolution in its present version still contains negative elements, has an interventionist streak and bespeaks a philosophy which is damaging to the national interests represented by the present Government of the Republic, we are obliged to vote against it.

55. Mr. ODOCH-JATO (Uganda): My delegation wishes to explain its vote on three draft resolutions submitted under agenda item 12, namely, draft resolution XVIII, entitled "Situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in El Salvador", draft resolution XIX, entitled "Situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Guatemala", and draft resolution XX, entitled "Situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Chile".

56. Since 1979, Uganda has consistently voted in favour of similar resolutions on the three situations. We shall do so again today. We deem it necessary to make this explanation of vote in view of the fact that my delegation inadvertently and mistakenly abstained on the three resolutions in the voting in the Third Committee.

57. I wish to give the assurance that Uganda's position in respect of the three situations remains unchanged. As we had occasion to reiterate in our statement on item 12 at the 65th meeting of the Committee, Uganda maintains its solidarity with the peoples of Latin America. We continue to support them in their quest for social justice and the freedom to determine their own destinies without outside interference, intervention or aggression. For that reason, we shall continue to contribute to all efforts aimed at achieving improvements in the human rights situations in El Salvador, Guatemala and Chile. In our view, the draft resolutions now before the Assembly constitute an important effort in that direction.

58. Mr. ALBÁN-HOLGUÍN (Colombia) (interpretation from Spanish): No sensible observer in the United Nations, an Organization the essential task of which is to protect human rights, could but be sceptical if he had access to the voting record on resolutions under nearly all the important items dealt with in the Third Committee. An observer could not be enthusiastic about the results of the voting on resolutions condemning the policy of apartheid. He would think that so many denunciations of these cruel and hideous practices—practices including the denunciation by Bishop Tutu, when he received the Nobel Peace Prize recently, and dramatically recounted the innumerable cases of innocent children murdered, families separated, fundamental human rights denied to the victims of apartheid—would have had some echo; that resolutions such as resolution 39/17 adopted at the 71st meeting, on 23 November, on the universal realization of the right of peoples to self-determination, in which the Assembly "Strongly condemns the continued violations of the human rights of the peoples still under colonial domination", would, as Bishop Tutu recommended in his Nobel award speech, be greeted with enthusiasm. Our observer would be confused to see that countries such as Sweden, France, the Netherlands, Canada, Italy, Denmark, Luxembourg, Norway and Australia voted against that resolution and that Austria, Ireland, Spain, Greece and Portugal abstained in the voting.

59. But when it came to the debate on possible means within the United Nations system for improving the effective enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms, our observer would note with renewed optimism the emergence of a draft resolution on the right to development, which, in expressing concern at the existing disparity between the established norms and principles and the actual situation with regard to human rights and fundamental freedoms in the world, affirms that it is necessary to promote the right to education, work, health and sufficient food to ensure the full enjoyment of all human rights and the total dignity of the human person, and that therefore the Commission on Human Rights should adopt measures to promote the right to development.

60. Our observer would be gravely disappointed, however, to realize that, far from being approved by consensus, in the voting on this draft resolution countries such as Sweden, Denmark, Canada, Austria, Ireland and Norway abstained; and he would be totally confused in seeing that it was precisely Sweden, Denmark, Canada, the Netherlands, Austria, Ireland, Norway, France, Spain, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg and Australia which, in the context of item 12, on the situation with regard to human rights, decided to criticize three Latin American countries as if throughout the world there did not exist all other kinds of the most grave violations of the dignity of the human being.

61. Why that selectivity? Why pick out Latin America for mention as the sole violator of human rights? Is it not clear that such practices bring the United Nations into disrepute?

62. Believers in the United Nations will have ceased to believe and will have become convinced that, far from protecting human rights, it is the scene of a shady political game to cover up other realities.

63. Why is there continual disregard of the fact that in Latin America not only is there a great trend towards true democratization but countries with long democratic traditions are actively seeking solutions in order to establish peace in countries today affected by violence? Another Nobel Prize winner, the Colombian García Marquez, said:

> "Latin America does not want to be considered a pawn or a chimera whose intended independence and originality are changed to fit Western aspirations. . . . Why should the originality freely conceded to us in literature be denied to us with such suspicion when we try, with great difficulty, to bring about social change? Why should it be thought that social justice, which the advanced Europeans are trying to impose in their own countries, cannot also be a Latin American objective, with its own distinct methods, in different circumstances? No. The immoderate violence and suffering of our history are the result of countless age-old, bitter injustices, not a plot hatched 3,000 leagues away. But many European leaders and thinkers have believed this, with the childishness of old people who forget the prolific folly of their youth, as if they had no other possible future than to live at the mercy of the two great masters of the world."

64. The sponsors of the draft resolution on the situation with regard to human rights in El Salvador understood on this occasion that the Latin American countries could contribute to the search for solutions, and agreed to change the content and language of the original draft resolution substantially, recognizing the role of President Duarte in taking certain initiatives. My Government applauds him and is grateful to him for this. In recognition of this political integrity, Colombia will vote in favour of that draft resolution.

65. For all the reasons that I have given, we cannot support the draft resolutions on Guatemala and Chile.

66. The PRESIDENT: We have heard the last speaker in explanation of vote before the voting on the recommendations of the Third Committee. The Assembly will now take a decision on the 20 draft resolutions recommended by the Third Committee in paragraph 69 of its report [A/39/700].

67. Draft resolution I, entitled "Measures to improve the situation and ensure the human rights and dignity of all migrant workers", was adopted by the Third Committee without a vote. The programme budget implications of the draft resolution are contained in the relevant report of the Fifth Committee [A/39/805/Rev.1]. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to adopt this draft resolution?

Draft resolution I was adopted (resolution 39/102).

68. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution II, entitled "Question of the international legal protection of the human rights of individuals who are not citizens of the country in which they live", was adopted by the Third Committee without a vote. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of the draft resolution is contained in document A/39/805/Rev.1. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to adopt this draft resolution?

Draft resolution II was adopted (resolution 39/103).

69. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolutions III to VII, entitled "Assistance to refugees in Somalia", "Assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia", "Emergency assistance to returnees and displaced persons in Chad", "Humanitarian assistance to refugees in Djibouti" and "Situation of refugees in the Sudan", respectively, were adopted together by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolutions III to VII were adopted (resolutions 39/104 to 39/108).

70. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution VIII, entitled "Assistance to student refugees in southern Africa", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution VIII was adopted (resolution 39/109).

71. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution IX, entitled "Summary or arbitrary executions", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution IX was adopted (resolution 39/110).

72. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution X, entitled "Question of enforced or involuntary disappearances", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution X was adopted (resolution 39/111).

73. The PRESIDENT: We turn to draft resolution XI, entitled "Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders", which was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution XI was adopted (resolution 39/112).

74. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution XII, entitled "United Nations Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I consider that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution XII was adopted (resolution 39/113).

75. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution XIII, entitled "Measures to be taken against Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist activities and all other forms of totalitarian ideologies and practices based on racial intolerance, hatred and terror", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly also wishes to adopt it?

Draft resolution XIII was adopted (resolution 39/114).

76. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution XIV, entitled "Regional arrangements for the protection of human rights", was also adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution XIV was adopted (resolution 39/115).

77. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution XV, entitled "Regional arrangements for the promotion and protection of human rights in the Asian region", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution XV was adopted (resolution 39/116).

78. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution XVI, entitled "Human rights and mass exoduses", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution XVI was adopted (resolution 39/117).

79. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution XVII, entitled "Human rights in the administration of justice", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution XVII was adopted (resolution 39/118).

80. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to draft resolution XVIII, which is entitled "Situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in El Salvador". A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

Draft resolution XX was adopted by 90 votes to 13, with 40 abstentions (resolution 39/121).[5]

83. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their vote.

84. Mr. VILLAGRA DELGADO (Argentina) (interpretation from Spanish): Argentina voted in favour of draft resolution XVIII because human rights constitute a legitimate interest of the United Nations and because the General Assembly should concern itself with violations of those rights wherever they occur. However, the Argentine delegation would like to point out that it considers that this year, 1984, has seen positive progress in the situation in El Salvador, represented particularly by the elections and the dialogue initiated by President Duarte with the opposition forces. Argentina believes that these positive factors will contribute to improving the human rights situation in the sister republic of El Salvador.

85. Mrs. PAPAJORGJI (Albania) (interpretation from Spanish): The Albanian delegation voted in favour of draft resolution XVIII, in accordance with the policy of the Government of the Socialist People's Republic of Albania in support of the just struggle of peoples. In spite of that, our delegation would point out that it has reservations on certain paragraphs of this resolution.

86. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly has concluded its consideration of all the chapters of the report of the Economic and Social Council allocated to the Third Committee. We will now turn to the report of the Third Committee on agenda item 92 [A/39/701]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 8 of its report. The Committee adopted that draft resolution without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly also wishes to adopt it?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/122).

87. The PRESIDENT: We will now consider the report of the Committee on agenda item 93 [A/39/702]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the seven draft resolutions recommended by the Committee in paragraph 22 of its report. Draft resolution I, entitled "The role of women in society", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that it is also the wish of the Assembly to adopt that draft resolution?

Draft resolution I was adopted (resolution 39/123).

88. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution II, entitled "Participation of women in promoting international peace and co-operation", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution II was adopted (resolution 39/124).

89. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution III, entitled "Arrangements for the future management of the Voluntary Fund for the United Nations Decade for Women", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution III was adopted (resolution 39/125).

90. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution IV, entitled "Improvement of the situation of women in rural areas", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution IV was adopted (resolution 39/126).

91. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution V is entitled "Senior women's programme officers posts at the regional commissions". A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia.

Against: United States of America.

Abstaining: Bulgaria, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Israel, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Draft resolution V was adopted by 135 votes to 1, with 8 abstentions (resolution 39/127).

92. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution VI, entitled "Integration of women in all aspects of development", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution VI was adopted (resolution 39/128).

93. The PRESIDENT: Finally, we come to draft resolution VII, entitled "Preparations for the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace". The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of the draft resolution is contained in document A/39/812. The Third Committee adopted the draft resolution without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution VII was adopted (resolution 39/129).

94. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their votes.

95. Mrs. QUINTANILLA (United States of America): Draft resolution I in document A/39/702 is a compromise text reflecting differing views of Member States on the role of women in society, particularly as mothers.

96. Over all, American public policy recognizes and supports the basic principle that parents have the primary responsibility for childbearing, child care, child rearing and the education of their children. Parental love and responsibility provide a sound basis for children to develop their full potential. The task of Government and society is not to replace the primary role of the family, but to encourage and defend it.

97. With regard to paragraph 2 of the draft resolution, the United States has established legal procedures to combat inequities in employment opportunities and practices which discriminate against women. The Equal Pay Act of 1963 prohibits unequal pay for women and men in the same establishment whose jobs require equal effort, skill and responsibility. Because we believe the phrase "equal pay for work of equal value" has this meaning, the United States was able to support it.

98. We would not have been able to do so, however, had the ill-defined and unproved concept of "comparable worth" been raised. Many economists have criticized this concept, which seeks to deal with the disparity in the average wage earnings of men and women through a system of determining the relative value of different jobs in setting wages. This theory is a developing area of law and of lively legislative debate in the United States. It is not current Federal law or practice, although it is a matter currently being considered by various courts and local governments.

99. Regarding paragraph 4, Federal law in the United States, while protecting the rights of pregnant workers, does not mandate paid maternity leave. This is a matter reserved for negotiations between employers and their employees. The Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978 requires that employers, for all employment-related purposes—including the receipt of benefits under fringe benefit programmes—treat women affected by pregnancy, childbirth and related medical conditions in the same manner as other persons not so affected, but similar in their ability or inability to work. This law, which applies to employers with 15 or more employees, does not require employers to provide special benefits or new programmes, such as paid maternity leave for pregnant workers.

100. The same law states that an employer cannot refuse to hire a pregnant woman so long as she is able to perform the major functions necessary to the job. An employer may not terminate workers because of pregnancy, force them to go on leave at an arbitrary date if they are still able to work, or penalize them because of pregnancy in reinstatement rights, including credit for previous service, accrued retirement benefits and acquired seniority. Since 1972, similar provisions have also been part of the sex discrimination guidelines issued by the United States Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

101. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now turn its attention to the report of the Committee on agenda item 94 [A/39/703]. We will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 8 of its report. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications is contained in document A/39/803. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia.

Against: United States of America.

Abstaining: Morocco.

The draft resolution was adopted by 142 votes to 1, with 1 abstention (resolution 39/130).

102. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now consider the report of the Committee on agenda item 95 [A/39/704] and take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Elimination of all forms of religious intolerance", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 7 of its report. That draft resolution was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/131).

103. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives wishing to explain their positions.

104. Mr. KOROMA (Sierra Leone): On the resolution just adopted, the Sierra Leonean delegation would like to state the following. In Sierra Leone, spires and minarets punctuate the townscape of the country, evidence of the strong and living influence of religion in the life of the nation. Christian, Islamic and African religious expression coexist and thrive in an atmosphere of mutual respect and tolerance. Today in Sierra Leone there are different Christian denominations. Anglican, Roman Catholic, Evangelical, United Brethren, Methodist and West African Methodist, Baptist and a number of other congregations coexist in harmony in a climate of religious freedom and tolerance.

105. The influence of Islam in Sierra Leone predates that of Christianity. From time immemorial, the modern pattern of tolerance and mutual respect between Christianity and Islam has been established, the two uniting in the anti-colonialist movement and also joined in a common culture. Both the Christian and Islamic communities in my country offer facilities for worship in the vernacular to various sections of the community.

106. African religion is deeply rooted in the history of Sierra Leone. Its fundamental values—worship of the Creator, recognition of family and communal responsibilities and respect for the wisdom of our ancestors—provide an ethical foundation compatible with Christianity and Islam and act as a cohesive force throughout the country at a time of rapid development and changing life-styles.

107. Against that background of religious tolerance and freedom in my country and the need to promote universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion, it will be understandable why the Sierra Leone delegation is concerned that intolerance and discrimination based on religion or belief continue to exist in some countries.

108. The Sierra Leone delegation firmly believes that religion is a matter of the heart and is a bond between the individual and whom or what he believes in. We also maintain that it is not a matter that should be determined, established or disestablished by parliament, decree, ordinance or in any other manner for that matter. My delegation believes it is the inherent right of the individual to declare and practise his faith.

109. We would therefore like to urge those Governments which proscribe or attempt to proscribe one religious denomination or another and persecute its followers on the ground that it is not the true or authentic religion to refrain from such a practice.

110. On the other hand, the Sierra Leone delegation endorses paragraphs 2 and 3 of the resolution just adopted, which urge all States to give continuing attention to the need for adequate legislation to prohibit discrimination based on religion or belief in the recognition, exercise and enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms and to combat intolerance based on religion or belief.

111. The PRESIDENT: Next we turn to the report of the Committee on agenda item 96 [A/39/705]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the recommendations of the Committee contained in paragraph 11 of its report.

112. First, the Assembly will take a decision on draft resolution I, entitled "Implications of scientific and technological developments for human rights", which the Committee adopted without a vote. May I consider that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution I was adopted (resolution 39/132).

113. The PRESIDENT: We turn next to draft resolution II, entitled "Human rights and scientific and technological developments". A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

Draft resolution III was adopted by 124 votes to 6, with 17 abstentions (resolution 39/134).

115. The PRESIDENT: We will now turn our attention to the report of the Committee on agenda item 97 [A/39/706]. The Assembly will take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Question of a convention on the rights of the child", recommended by the Committee in paragraph 7 of its report. The Committee adopted that draft resolution without vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/135).

116. The PRESIDENT: We turn next to the report of the Committee on agenda item 98 [A/39/707]. The Assembly will take a decision on the three draft resolutions recommended by the Committee in paragraph 15 of its report.

117. Draft resolution I, entitled "International Covenants on Human Rights", was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution I was adopted (resolution 39/136).

118. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution II is entitled "Elaboration of a second optional protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, aiming at the abolition of the death penalty". A recorded vote has been requested.

Draft resolution I was adopted (resolution 39/141).

125. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution II, entitled "Declaration on the Control of Drug Trafficking and Drug Abuse", was also adopted in the Committee without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution II was adopted (resolution 39/142).

126. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution III is entitled "International campaign against traffic in drugs". The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of the draft resolution is contained in document A/39/768. The draft resolution was adopted by the Third Committee without a vote. May I consider that the Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution III was adopted (resolution 39/143).

127. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now consider the report of the Committee on agenda item 102 [A/39/711] and take a decision on the two draft resolutions recommended by the Committee in paragraph 13 of its report.

128. The Assembly will take action first on draft resolution I, entitled "National institutions for the protection and promotion of human rights", which was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I consider that the Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolution I was adopted (resolution 39/144).

129. The PRESIDENT: Next we turn to draft resolution II, entitled "Alternative approaches and ways and means within the United Nations system for improving the effective enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms". A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Australia, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, France, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guyana, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Israel, United States of America.

Abstaining: Austria, Canada, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, Ireland, Japan, Norway, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

Draft resolution II was adopted by 131 votes to 2, with 12 abstentions (resolution 39/145).

AGENDA ITEM 36

The situation in the Middle East: reports of the Secretary-General (concluded)*

130. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly has before it the draft resolutions contained in documents A/39/L.19 and Corr.1 and Add.1, L.20 and Corr.1 and Add.1 and L.21 and Corr.1 and Add.1. I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their vote before the vote on any or all of the three draft resolutions. Representatives will also have an opportunity to explain their vote after all the votes have been taken. I should like to remind the Assembly that, under rule 88 of the rules of procedure: "The President shall not permit the proposer of a proposal or of an amendment to explain his vote on his own proposal or amendment."

131. Mr. FARRELL (Ireland): I wish to make a statement on the draft resolutions on behalf of the 10 member States of the European Community. The views of the Ten on the principles necessary to secure peace in the Middle East are well known and were set out in our address to the General Assembly on this item [74th meeting].

132. It will be clear that the Ten have serious reservations on those draft resolutions that address themselves to important aspects of the question of a comprehensive settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute and that are not in accordance with their common position regarding principles for a comprehensive peace settlement. Consequently, the Ten have repeatedly stressed the need for such draft resolutions to adopt a balanced approach. Also, the Ten cannot accept formulations criticizing a permanent member of the Security Council for exercising its right under the Charter of the United Nations. In connection with draft resolution A/39/L.21, which the Ten will support, they recall the importance they attach to Security Council resolution 478 (1980).

*Resumed from the 77th meeting.

133. Mr. GROSER (New Zealand): New Zealand has always supported Security Council resolution 242 (1967) as the basis for a comprehensive peace settlement in the Middle East. That resolution affirms the right of every State to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries, free from threats or acts of force. We regard that as fundamental and it applies to Israel as much as to any State.

134. No less fundamental is the right of the people of Palestine to decide their own future and to establish their own State if they wish to. Resolution 242 (1967) reaffirms the principle that territory cannot legitimately be acquired by force. New Zealand believes that Israel should withdraw from the territories it seized by force in 1967 and has occupied ever since. We do not recognize the validity of a number of acts taken by Israel in defiance of this principle. These acts include the annexation of East Jerusalem, the extension to the Golan Heights of Israeli law, jurisdiction and administration, and the establishment of new settlements on land that has been seized in the occupied West Bank.

135. My delegation is disappointed that draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20 do not adequately reflect the balance of principles embodied in resolution 242 (1967). As such, they are not well calculated to contribute to a negotiated settlement. We shall be obliged to abstain on those two draft resolutions.

136. New Zealand will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.21, concerning Jerusalem. New Zealand does not recognize Israel's annexation of Jerusalem. We do not recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel. New Zealand has supported a special administrative régime for Jerusalem which safeguards the right of access of all religions.

137. Mr. CHEOK (Singapore): Before voting on the draft resolutions, my delegation wishes to express its concern over the lack of progress towards a lasting settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict and to emphasize the urgent need for progress to this end. My delegation also reaffirms our support for the efforts in favour of the re-establishment of the full sovereignty, territorial integrity, national independence and unity of Lebanon. We can only add our voice to those calling for a halt to the hostilities in the troubled region and for a renewed effort to seek a negotiated settlement that will include the following elements: first, withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon other than those invited by the Government of Lebanon; secondly, withdrawal of Israel from all Arab territories occupied since 1967; thirdly, self-determination and a homeland for the Palestinian people; and fourthly, the right of all States in the region, including Israel, to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries, free from threats or acts of force, as embodied in Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973).

138. On the basis of the foregoing understanding, my delegation is unable to support draft resolutions that do not recognize the legitimate rights of the State of Israel, or those that are selective and unbalanced in their condemnation, or those impinging on the sovereign rights of third countries having diplomatic relations with Israel. However, we support all efforts aimed at restoring the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and a return to a just and durable peace in the Middle East.

139. My delegation will accordingly vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.21 and will abstain on L.20.

140. Mr. BARBOSA DE MEDINA (Portugal) (interpretation from French): During its intervention on the question of the Middle East at the thirty-eighth session [102nd meeting], my delegation had the opportunity to define some of the essential principles underlying our votes on the draft resolutions before us. We mentioned the principle of non-use of force in international relations and also the principle whereby armed occupation does not create any territorial rights and cannot give rise to valid agreements unless they include the restoration of territories occupied by force. We invoked the fundamental right of all States to live within secure and recognized boundaries, with the withdrawal of all foreign troops in respect for the sovereignty of countries. We also denounced any unilateral decision liable to modify the juridical status of the territories under military occupation in violation of the applicable norms of international law.

141. Furthermore, we did not fail to express our conviction that it would be a lack of realism to concede the possibility of achieving a solution to the problems of the Middle East without finding a solution to the Palestinian question, a question whose importance is both particular and universal in the light of all the interests at stake and all the risks involved, and one which creates such a grave situation from the point of view of the security of States because of its human dimensions. Based on these considerations, my delegation supported draft resolutions A/39/L.37 to L.40, on the question of Palestine, that were voted on last Tuesday [95th meeting].

142. Indeed, any lasting settlement of these problems presupposes justice for the Palestinians, for the oppression of one people by another or the annexation of occupied territories can never be a valid basis for a negotiated settlement. We have to find a comprehensive solution which involves all the interested parties. A negotiated settlement must be sought based on consultation, and thus the search for a peaceful solution must exclude any acts which may be prejudicial thereto.

143. Portugal will continue to support all diplomatic initiatives and all efforts aimed at implementing the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, as measures likely to prevent destabilization and escalation of violence in the region, and also the threats to international security flowing from such conditions. My Government is looking for a framework for a negotiated settlement in which any dispute in the Middle East will be examined, including its relationship to the whole problem and the legitimate interests of the parties. In this context, as long as there is well-founded hope of efforts being consummated which will reverse the feelings of mutual distrust and fear that have ceaselessly worsened over the last few decades, my delegation believes that it is its duty to dissociate itself from any initiative that may render negotiations more difficult. We shall do this particularly in connection with draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20, which, because of their language, advocate certain measures, but have discriminatory implications or juridical implications that would make more difficult the dialogue on which, in our view, a peaceful solution to the Middle East problem should be based.

144. Mr. ALBORNOZ (Ecuador) (interpretation from Spanish): In accordance with the consistent policy of Ecuador of rejecting the occupation of territories by force and of searching for a just and comprehensive solution to the problem of the Middle East, with the participation on an equal footing of all the parties involved, in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the United Nations which provide for the withdrawal of Israel from the occupied Palestinian and Arab territories and the cessation of all hostile activities in those territories, my delegation will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.21, although we do not agree with the wording of some paragraphs in L.19. We will abstain on draft resolution A/39/L.20, inasmuch as it contains paragraphs which detract from the principle of the universality of the United Nations and decisions that are the prerogatives of sovereign States, which, under no circumstances, should be subordinate to decisions or exhortations from third parties or international organizations.

145. Mr. BHATT (Nepal): Nepal's position on the question of the Middle East has been made clear in various forums, including the General Assembly. In this we are clearly guided by the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force. We have therefore called for the withdrawal of Israel from all the Arab territories occupied since 1967.

146. Secondly, Nepal has made it clear that the Palestinian question is central to any solution of the Middle East problem. As such, we continue firmly to believe that the rights of the Palestinian people should be respected, including its right to statehood. It is imperative that the Palestinians, as represented by the Palestine Liberation Organization [PLO] should be a partner to any settlement of the question.

147. Thirdly, Nepal has made it unequivocally clear that all the States in the region, including Israel, should have the right to live within secure and recognized boundaries.

148. In our view these principles are the only realistic basis to establish a just, lasting and comprehensive peace settlement in the Middle East. We consider that Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) contain the essential elements which provide the appropriate framework for the solution of the problem in the Middle East.

149. My delegation would like to express its grave concern over the situation in Lebanon. That small, non-aligned country has been the subject of violence, tension and foreign aggression. We once again call upon Israel to withdraw its forces from that country without any pre-condition. Lebanese sovereign authority should be re-established over all the territory of Lebanon without any foreign interference. In this respect we commend the Secretary-General for promoting talks currently being held between Israel and Lebanon. We hope that the talks will result in agreements which will facilitate Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon and which will help Lebanon eventually to re-establish its authority and territorial integrity over the whole of Lebanon. We hope the talks will also help to create conditions for UNIFIL to play a more effective role in the future.

150. Guided by this position, we will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20 because we have found that the general thrust of these draft resolutions is in keeping with what I have stated earlier.

151. However, we are not in a position to support all the provisions and language in draft resolution A/39/L.20. The delegation of Nepal reserves its position on the fourth and eighth preambular paragraphs and on paragraphs 8, 9, 12, 13 and 14 of that draft resolution. The provisions of those paragraphs run counter to the declared policies and perceptions of my Government with regard to the situation in the Middle East. Furthermore, the initiation of measures called for in the operative paragraphs is the prerogative of the Security Council, which alone has the power to adopt the measures it deems necessary under the Charter of the United Nations.

152. Regarding draft resolution A/39/L.19, my delegation reserves its position on paragraphs 10 and 11.

153. Finally, my delegation would have liked reference to be made to Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), which, in our opinion, constitute the only realistic basis for a peaceful settlement of the Middle East dispute.

154. Mr. GARCÍA REVILLA (Peru) (interpretation from Spanish): The delegation of Peru wishes to explain its votes on draft resolutions A/39/L.20 and L.19.

155. My delegation will abstain in the vote on draft resolution A/39/L.20 because we think it contains certain considerations and recommendations whose orientation, far from contributing to a just, integral and lasting solution to the Middle East problem, tends to prejudice efforts and possibilities for bringing about a solution within the framework of the United Nations and in accordance with the relevant Security Council and General Assembly resolutions.

156. We do not think adoption of the methods proposed in draft resolution A/39/L.20 is the best path for initiating a peace process in the region. On the contrary, it implies the danger of leading to infringement of some of the principles and norms of international law and an erosion of the effectiveness of the United Nations.

157. We will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.19. However, we should like to make quite clear our objections to the interpretation which may be derived from the wording of paragraphs 6, 10 and 11. In the light of the gravity and the continuing deterioration of the situation in the Middle East, we believe that none of these paragraphs fully recognizes the importance of initiatives for peace in this region and that references to relations between given States or other States should be strictly linked to the question of Palestine as the central problem, to respect for the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people and to the need to reject and avoid the carrying out of policies or acts which would infringe the proposed objective of bringing about a political settlement in the Middle East. Finally, my delegation would like to see an explicit reference in draft resolution A/39/L.19 to Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), which for my country continue to provide an acceptable and just basis for bringing the parties to an understanding.

158. Mr. PHIRI (Malawi): We are again called upon to consider the situation in the Middle East. My delegation holds the firm view that the situation in that region will elude a peaceful settlement as long as we continue to ignore important principles laid down in the Charter of the United Nations. In our view, the main elements of these principles are: first, recognition of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to self-determination; and secondly, recognition of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the State of Israel and of the role that the General Assembly should play in resolving the conflict in the Middle East.

159. My delegation supports self-determination for the Palestinian people and at the same time supports the right of Israel to exist as a sovereign State within secure borders, on the basis of the right of all States in the region to coexist within secure and internationally recognized boundaries, with justice and security for all people. We support the call that all the parties to the conflict must be allowed to participate in the process of negotiating a comprehensive and just settlement of the dispute.

160. For those reasons, my delegation will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.21. However, we shall abstain in the votes on draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20. We are motivated by a deep-rooted conviction that there is still sufficient room for a just and amicable solution to the dispute through negotiation.

161. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): My Government's position regarding the problem of Palestine is quite clear. My delegation will vote in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.19, L.20 and L.21, but with the following reservations.

162. First, we make no distinction between those territories that were occupied before 1967 and those occupied since. We therefore believe that the Zionist usurpers must withdraw from the whole of Palestine and not simply from the territories occupied since 1967.

163. Secondly, paragraph 4 of draft resolution A/39/L.19 is not acceptable to us. Therefore, we also declare our reservation on that paragraph, which we regard as a continuation or version of the Camp David accord—or, rather, the Camp David conspiracy.

164. Our solution to the problem of Palestine and the Middle East is simply the united Islamic front.

165. Mr. ARTACHO (Spain) (interpretation from Spanish): At the end of our consideration of the question of Palestine last Tuesday [95th meeting], my delegation took the opportunity to state Spain's position on that subject and on the Middle East conflict. Today I want simply to repeat the well-known position of the Spanish delegation with regard to that conflict.

166. A final solution, and with it the establishment of a just and lasting peace in the Middle East, should be based on Israel's withdrawal from all the Arab territories occupied since 1967, on the right of all States in the area, including Israel, to live in peace within secure and recognized borders, and on respect for the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to self-determination.

167. In accordance with that position of principle, my delegation will vote in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.21.

168. My delegation supports the essential elements for a solution to the Middle East problem set out in draft resolution A/39/L.19. We regard as acceptable paragraphs 4, 6 and 13, in that the Arab peace plan embodied in the Final Declaration[9] adopted on 9 September 1982 at the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference, held at Fez, and an international peace conference on the Middle East should not exclude other possible plans or means of bringing about a peaceful, negotiated solution to the Middle East problem. However, we cannot support paragraphs 10, 11 and 12, and therefore we shall be obliged to abstain in the vote on that draft resolution.

169. Finally, my delegation endorses the spirit of draft resolution A/39/L.20, inasmuch as it reflects the principles underlying Spain's position on the Middle East problem and, specifically, in that it rejects the expansionist policy of the Israeli authorities and condemns the measures to annex the Golan Heights. Nevertheless, the legal problems and the political implications of the penultimate preambular paragraph, paragraphs 8 and 9 and, in particular, paragraphs 12, 13 and 14, make it impossible for us to vote for the draft resolution.

170. Mr. FARTAS (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) (interpretation from Arabic): My country will vote for the three draft resolutions. We wish to reaffirm our established position on the question of Palestine and the situation in the Middle East, and therefore we must state that we have reservations about any reference that can be interpreted, directly or indirectly, as my country's recognition of the Zionist, racist entity or a legitimization of a fait accompli imposed by force.

171. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States of America): Three days ago [95th meeting], I had occasion to explain the United States votes against the set of four draft resolutions submitted under the item "Question of Palestine". I wish today to state that the United States also opposes and will vote against draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20 because they are, if possible, more unfair, more unbalanced, more prejudicial, more dysfunctional than the four resolutions which the Assembly considered on Tuesday, against which we spoke then. At that time we stated how utterly inconsistent and unproductive it was to accuse a State of being non-peace-loving and then, in virtually the same breath, to urge that State to attend an international conference devoted to the search for peace, as though that country, already branded a non-peace-loving State, might expect fair play from such a conference.

172. We also stated that this context, this prejudicial preparation for a conference, this judgement in advance—this prior judgement—could not possibly lead to good-faith negotiations, and we suggested that negotiations lacking good faith were not negotiations at all in any meaningful sense of that term. Such so-called negotiations would instead simply serve as a propaganda forum, a propaganda exercise, which would certainly make the attainment of peace more difficult, rather than contribute to the achievement of that desirable goal.

173. The United States opposes such a Middle East conference, but we also note that any positive possibility such a conference might conceivably have is undermined by resolutions of this type.

174. The United States also strenuously objected to the unfair treatment and disrespect shown in those draft resolutions on the question of Palestine to the sovereignty of a State Member of the United Nations. One of those draft resolutions, A/39/L.40, regretted the negative response of two Governments towards such a conference. I mention that reference because one of the draft resolutions before the Assembly today—A/39/L.19—makes an equally inappropriate and unacceptable reference to the United States and to the way my country conducts its foreign policy. Once again, there is an unwarranted and unjustified interference in the internal affairs and decision-making of the United States. Once again, I should remind the General Assembly that the Charter of the United Nations does not give it jurisdiction over the foreign policy of the United States.

175. Paragraph 10 of draft resolution A/39/L.19 considers that the co-operative agreements between the United States and Israel "would encourage Israel to pursue its aggressive and expansionist policies". The United States considers this a false and offensive statement. We also consider it misleading as to the likely consequences of our policies.

176. Last night [99th meeting], the General Assembly undertook to correct an abusive practice which has prevailed in the Assembly for some time. It took note of the practice of singling out particular countries for special criticism and, more important, last night we all took a step in the direction of correcting that abuse. As this body is aware, selective name-calling is almost entirely reserved for the United States and Israel. It is very selective indeed. The Soviet Union goes unnamed in the resolution on Afghanistan; Viet Nam goes unnamed in the resolution on Kampuchea. In both of those cases, aggressive, expansionist invasions, indeed, and occupations are under way; yet no names are named. In the draft resolutions before us there is fear that some policy might lead to an aggressive, expansionist policy; yet names are named.

177. Last night, however, the General Assembly took the wise and courageous step of removing four derogatory references to the United States. That was done in the interest of fairness and justice and in the interest of the ability of the United Nations to play a constructive role in the future. We hope that the General Assembly will do no less today. That is why my delegation has asked for a separate recorded vote on paragraph 10 of draft resolution A/39/L.19. We would hope that this needed corrective action would continue.

178. But we are faced today with another draft resolution—A/39/L.20—which, through its slightly veiled reference to a permanent member of the Security Council "which prevented the Council" from adopting sanctions against Israel, would continue this obnoxious practice of selective name-calling.

179. Those are my country's strong objections to the singularly offensive treatment of the United States in these draft resolutions, and indeed too often in this debate. They alone constitute ample reason for voting against the two draft resolutions, but there is more, and that goes to the thrust and overall purpose of the draft resolutions. They speak repeatedly of "aggression", of "threats to international peace and security" and "the maintenance of international peace", of Israel as not being a peace-loving Member State and of wide-ranging sanctions in the military, diplomatic, economic, technological and cultural fields. They "condemn", "strongly condemn", "reject", "deplore", "strongly deplore" and so forth.

180. The people of the Middle East—all the people of the Middle East, Arabs, Israelis and all other peoples of that region—desire peace. They need peace. They deserve better from this Assembly than the negative finger-pointing which these draft resolutions contain. They deserve a positive approach, hopeful ideas and a constructive spirit to come out of our debates. They deserve good faith.

181. The United States, for its part, will not be distracted, nor will it flag in its efforts to work for peace between Israel and its neighbours. It believes that the basis for achieving such a goal already exists in Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), which call for direct negotiations and secure borders for all States in the region.

182. A focus in our debates on practical means to implement those two resolutions could go far towards bringing an equitable and comprehensive solution to at least one major dispute in the Middle East.

183. Mr. LEVIN (Israel): Predictably, the agenda item before the Assembly has been exploited to assist the campaign of the Arab States against Israel, thereby undermining a peaceful solution of the Arab-Israel conflict. The draft resolutions before the Assembly vividly illustrate this.

184. Draft resolution A/39/L.19 is a synopsis of the elements underlying all the draft resolutions submitted under agenda item 33, on the question of Palestine. Its purpose is precisely the same as that of the other resolutions, namely, to impede a peaceful solution to the Arab-Israel conflict.

185. Especially outrageous are paragraphs 10 and 11, which suggest that war can and should be waged against Israel through the use of United Nations machinery. It is consequently an anti-peace draft resolution and as such must be rejected.

186. Draft resolution A/39/L.20 is a blatant attempt to harm Israel and legitimize Arab aggressions of the past. For years, the Golan Heights served as a launching ground for Syrian attacks against Israel. However, instead of condemning Syria, the chief menace to peace in our area today, the draft resolution castigates Israel. Instead of calling for negotiations and conciliation, the draft resolution grotesquely calls on States to refrain from supplying Israel, the object of repeated Arab aggression, with the necessary means to defend itself. It seeks to isolate Israel so that Arab warmongers may be emboldened to strike across its borders. In its extremist language, this draft resolution stands out even among the other proposals against Israel.

187. Regarding Jerusalem, dealt with in draft resolution A/39/L.21, Israel's position is well known. For the Jewish people, Jerusalem has always been the centre of their national and spiritual life. Reunited since 1967, Jerusalem enjoys freedom and prosperity unprecedented in the city's history. In glaring contrast with the situation which prevailed in Jerusalem before 1967, the adherents of all faiths are guaranteed free access to their holy places of worship.

188. Israel will steadfastly continue to advance the peace and well-being of our capital and its inhabitants, as well as the preservation of Jerusalem's unique place in the hearts of people of diverse faiths.

189. In focusing on the Arab-Israel dispute within the context of the situation in the Middle East, the General Assembly is doing considerable harm to the cause of peace. It totally neglects the many conflicts in the area and their underlying causes. My delegation will not lend a hand to this distortion. We shall vote against the draft resolutions on this agenda item and call upon the delegations of those States committed to peace to do likewise.

190. The PRESIDENT: We have heard the last speaker in explanation of vote before the vote. I call on the representative of the United States on a point of order.

191. Mr. SCHIFTER (United States of America): I would like to clarify an issue of procedure.

192. Yesterday [98th meeting], acting under Article 18, paragraph 3, of the Charter of the United Nations, the General Assembly decided that the apartheid draft resolution was an important question requiring a two-thirds vote on the principal proposal and any subsidiary question. Paragraph 3, as we will all recall, allows the General Assembly to add by majority vote "additional categories of questions" requiring a two-thirds majority. These are categories additional to the categories set out in Article 18, paragraph 2.

193. It will be recalled that we objected yesterday to a motion under Article 18, paragraph 3, which gives the General Assembly the option to declare a matter an important question. As we made clear, we were deeply concerned that the option to make this change was put before the General Assembly so very late in the game. By contrast, we are now raising a different issue. It is an issue arising out of Article 18, paragraph 2. Paragraph 2 is mandatory, not optional. It mandates—it by law requires—a two-thirds vote on certain categories of issues.

194. To make absolutely clear what we are talking about, I shall read the relevant material from the Charter that will clarify the point I am trying to make. Yesterday the issue arose, as I indicated, under Article 18, paragraph 3, which reads as follows:

> "Decisions on other questions, including the determination of additional categories of questions to be decided by a two-thirds majority, shall be made by a majority of the members present and voting."

195. The issue that our delegation is putting before the Assembly is the following: under Article 18, paragraph 2, there is no choice, there is no option, there is no freedom for the General Assembly to decide the matter one way or the other. There is a mandate to vote certain issues by a two-thirds vote, and I quote Article 18, paragraph 2:

> "Decisions of the General Assembly on important questions shall be made by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting. These questions shall include:"—and the first category is—"recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security . . . ."

It then goes on to speak of various other matters that we all know about, such as elections to the Security Council. But the point to be made is that Article 18, paragraph 2, requires a two-thirds vote on any draft resolution that constitutes a recommendation with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security. Our point is that there is no choice.

196. Now as draft resolution A/39/L.19 calls for the commencing of a peace conference and speaks of the efforts to establish peace, and of threats to international security, and also as draft resolution A/39/L.20 makes a judgement that Israel's actions constitute a continuing threat to international peace and security, both draft resolutions clearly fall under the provisions of Article 18, paragraph 2. The necessary consequence is that the draft resolutions and all subsidiary votes require a two-thirds majority for adoption.

197. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran on a point of order.

198. Mr. RAJAIE-KHORASSANI (Islamic Republic of Iran): I totally disagree with the interpretation presented by the representative of the United States. What is meant by the paragraph just read out to us is not any reference to any world peace or world order. International peace and order is often referred to in all paragraphs of the various documents of the United Nations. To make decisions on peace and war is something different from speaking about peace, and the references to peace in the two paragraphs to which the representative of the United States referred are general references to peace and not decisions on peace or war. Therefore, they are totally different from the implication of Article 18.

199. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Democratic Yemen on a point of order.

200. Mr. AL-ASHTAL (Democratic Yemen): This is the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly. For 39 years, every year, we have had resolutions on the Middle East on which we have voted, customarily, by simple majority. All of a sudden, today the representative of the United States sees this to be an important matter under Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations. I am not going to say that this is not only an insincere and unfair method being used by the United States delegation but I want only to mention that the United States has never taken the resolutions of the General Assembly so seriously that it can now cite Article 18 of the Charter.

201. The representative of the United States did not suggest that the draft resolutions before us should be adopted by a two-thirds majority. He said that, under Article 18, paragraph 2, it is mandatory on the General Assembly to consider these draft resolutions as important. Since we have not, for the past 38 years, considered them important under Article 18, paragraph 2, I request you, Mr. President, to ask the Legal Counsel to clarify the matter.

202. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States of America): It was, of course, the General Assembly, precisely, which called the attention of all of us to the question of what is or is not an important question and does or does not therefore require a two-thirds majority. It was the General Assembly which called our attention back to the provisions of the Charter, whether or not they had been invoked in recent years, and addressing the requirements of Article 18 makes perfectly clear that it is not in fact discretionary for this Assembly to decide whether or not recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security are or are not important questions, any more than the election of non-permanent members of the Security Council is or is not an important question. It is simply postulated by the Charter of the United Nations, under Article 18, paragraph 2, that these questions are important.

203. It is also perfectly clear—as even a cursory examination of the two draft resolutions before us establishes—that they concern in their very essence recommendations with respect to maintenance of international peace and security. A significant portion of their preambular and operative paragraphs is concerned precisely with the maintenance of international peace and security.

204. Therefore, it seems to us that the mandatory decision must be that this is an important question.

205. Mr. EL-FATTAL (Syrian Arab Republic) (interpretation from Arabic): Actually, I was not surprised at the American proposal, which is twofold. I am speaking only of the interpretation—and I stress the word "interpretation"—this unilateral interpretation of the United States of the Charter of the United Nations. I am really surprised, because Mrs. Kirkpatrick herself did not consider the situation in the Golan Heights as a threat to peace. I can quote her statement on 5 February 1982 during the ninth emergency special session of the General Assembly, convened to discuss the question of the Golan Heights. After the United States had used its right of veto in the Security Council to paralyse that body, we came to the General Assembly to seek justice here.

206. At that time, Mrs. Kirkpatrick said that the draft resolution—the same resolution that has been submitted for the past three years:

> "The draft resolution . . . calls the Israeli legislation an act of aggression. But no shots were fired, no soldiers were brought into place. And the future of the Golan Heights is no less negotiable than before."[*] [12th meeting, para. 21.]

207. She herself thus recognizes that the situation, following the application of Israeli legislation in the occupied Syrian territories, does not constitute an act of aggression. Why should she now say that this question constitutes a threat to international peace and security or is relevant to international peace and security?

208. Moreover, mocking the draft resolution and wishing to minimize the importance of the question, Mrs. Kirkpatrick said:

> "Suppose this draft resolution is adopted, as regrettably I suppose it will be; what will this exercise have achieved?
>
> "—An Israeli withdrawal from the Golan? Of course not.
>
> "—An embargo on economic, technological and military goods destined for Israel? Of course not.
>
> "—A restoration of the occupied territories? Of course not.
>
> "—A resolution of the problems of Palestine? Of course not.
> "—Peace in the Middle East? Of course not."[*] [Ibid., para. 28.]

209. For three years we have been submitting the same draft resolution, this important resolution which we were forced to refer to the General Assembly for adoption because Israel has not yet rescinded the legislation and administration it imposed on the Golan Heights. For three years the United States did not make a move. The question, then, is political, in the following sense. The United States, through this attempt, wants to abort the draft resolution so as to allow Israel to shirk its international responsibility in the General Assembly. The General Assembly and the Security Council, by virtue of a unanimous decision, have called upon Israel to rescind its legislation and administration imposed on the Golan Heights. That has not happened. Therefore, there is an American-Israeli collusion to fetter the General Assembly and prevent it from following up the question. The Security Council has taken a decision on the question but has not been able to implement it owing to the United States veto. And now, under the pretext of the two-thirds majority, it comes to the General Assembly to impose something like a veto. But Mrs. Kirkpatrick does not have such a bloc in the General Assembly.

210. Let us be frank. This question must be seen in light of the strategic co-operation accords between the United States and Israel. This strategic co-operation includes the diplomatic field, that is, voting in the United Nations, and political and military questions.

211. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the United States on a point of order.

212. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States of America): Surely what is at stake here is not some representative's opinion of some speech which I made three years ago, on which occasion the General Assembly decided otherwise, I may say. The question is not my speech, the question is the clear provision of the Charter and the clear content of the draft resolutions before us.

213. A ruling from the Chair, a legal consultation, has been asked for by another Member State. The United States has no objection to such a consultation.

214. The PRESIDENT: Will the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic please continue?

215. Mr. EL-FATTAL (Syrian Arab Republic) (interpretation from Arabic): The question is not a legal question. That is what I wanted to say. It must be looked at from the angle of the strategic co-operation accord which, a few days before the annexation of the Golan Heights in 1981, was transformed into an alliance to include the military and economic fields, including military manoeuvres undertaken off Syrian shores—

216. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the United States on a point of order.

217. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States of America): The relationship between the United States and Israel is not germane to the point of order which has been raised here concerning the requirement for a two-thirds majority on matters dealing with international peace and security.

218. The PRESIDENT: Will the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic please continue?

219. Mr. EL-FATTAL (Syrian Arab Republic) (interpretation from Arabic): Now that we have done with the strategic aims of the United States, we shall move on to the legal aspects. I should like to pose a direct question to the United States delegation: Would we be in a better position today if Israel had abrogated its decision to impose its legislation and administration in the Golan Heights? If Israel had done so, we would not have needed this draft resolution, which is based on a bitter reality which our people suffer daily not only in the Golan Heights but also in Jerusalem and the occupied territories.

220. The question before us is defined in a draft resolution. We are not speaking about the eruption of a war tomorrow. We want to deter Israel, and here it is our right to put the draft resolution to the vote and the United States has no right to resort to the legal manoeuvres with which we are familiar. The United States has recourse to law only when it feels weak or when it is faced by an adverse situation, the entire international community having condemned the annexation of the Golan Heights and Jerusalem and the de facto annexation that has occurred in the other occupied Arab territories. Therefore I see no value in the United States proposal and I reject it.

221. The PRESIDENT: In view of the nature of the question put to me by the representative of the United States, I shall request the Legal Counsel to provide us with an opinion on the subject.

222. I call on the representative of Jordan on a point of order.

223. Mr. SALAH (Jordan) (interpretation from Arabic): I should like to comment on the point of order raised by the representative of the United States a moment ago. The General Assembly has discussed, ever since its inception, a great many resolutions—and many of them have been adopted—under the items entitled "The situation in the Middle East" and the "Question of Palestine". Among the most important of these is resolution 181 (II) of 29 November 1947, by which the United Nations established Israel. This was adopted by a simple majority—no more than a few votes. I should like to ask whether the question of the United States representative applies retroactively to resolution 181 (II)?

224. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Democratic Yemen on a point of order.

225. Mr. AL-ASHTAL (Democratic Yemen): Mr. President, I heard you say that you have asked the Legal Counsel to give an opinion on the nature of the question posed by the United States representative. I beg to disagree with you, Sir, because it was I who asked for the legal opinion and the question I want to ask the Legal Counsel is whether, on the basis of precedent, Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter should apply to the question of the Middle East and whether it should therefore be regarded as an important question.

226. The PRESIDENT: I shall now ask the Legal Counsel to come and provide us with an opinion on the subject, as requested by the representative of Democratic Yemen.

227. Mr. FLEISCHHAUER, Legal Counsel: My advice has been requested with regard to the question whether draft resolution A/39/L.19 requires a two-thirds majority for adoption by the General Assembly, under Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations and rule 83 of the rules of procedure of the General Assembly.

228. Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter provides:

> "Decisions of the General Assembly on important questions shall be made by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting. These questions shall include: recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security, . . ."

and then a number of other points are mentioned.

229. It has been stated by the United States representative that draft resolution A/39/L.19 contains elements which make it a recommendation with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security within the meaning of Article 18, paragraph 2.

230. Looking at draft resolution A/39/L.19, I note that in its third preambular paragraph it refers to a great number of Security Council resolutions. I also note that the draft resolution, in the tenth preambular paragraph, expresses grave concern: "at the continuing Israeli actions involving the escalation and expansion of the conflict in the region, which further violate the principles of international law and endanger international peace and security".

231. In the ninth and eleventh preambular paragraphs, the draft resolution speaks of the establishment of a "comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the region" and "in the Middle East". The same reference is made in paragraphs 1, 3 and 4. In paragraph 8, aggression is condemned, and paragraph 10 speaks of the "aggressive and expansionist policies and practices" which "would have adverse effects on efforts for the establishment of a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East and would threaten the security of the region". Paragraph 12 refers to the danger of nuclear blackmail.

232. I also note that the draft resolution refers—

233. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Democratic Yemen on a point of order.

234. Mr. AL-ASHTAL (Democratic Yemen): I think the Legal Counsel has started to speak on the substance of the draft resolution. My question was as follows: for 39 years the General Assembly has met and for 39 years there have been resolutions on the question of the Middle East. Not once has this been considered under Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations. How is it that now this question can be considered as mandatory in terms of Article 18, paragraph 2? That is my question.

235. Mr. FLEISCHHAUER, Legal Counsel: I was coming in a minute to what has just been stated by the representative of Democratic Yemen. I was saying that I also note that the draft resolution referred to a matter which is under active review by the Security Council. Now, the point has been made that the General Assembly had not at past sessions considered resolutions of this kind to fall under Article 18, paragraph 2. I would state that the practice of the General Assembly in this respect has been varied. Many of the resolutions relating to questions pertaining to the situation in the Middle East have received a two-thirds majority, so that the question of whether or not they were taken under Article 18, paragraph 2, has not arisen. In other cases, decisions have been taken that individual resolutions came under Article 18, paragraph 2.

236. I refer in this respect to a decision taken by the General Assembly in December 1961, at its sixteenth session [1086th meeting], on a draft resolution relating to the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine, which was held to require a two-thirds majority for adoption. Also, I refer to a decision taken in December 1978, at the thirty-third session of the General Assembly [84th meeting], in connection with agenda item 125, concerning military and nuclear collaboration with Israel.

237. In addition, I would like to refer to the legal situation under which these procedural decisions are taken. They are taken individually by the General Assembly at each session on an ad hoc basis and they are not binding on the Assembly at subsequent sessions.

238. The point has been made that the draft resolution is not a specific resolution referring to maintenance of peace and security, but rather a general statement and general exhortation. It is true that the draft resolution does not contain a recommendation to the Security Council to take measures under Chapter VII of the Charter. That, however, is not a prerequisite for the determination that a case falls under Article 18, paragraph 2.

239. Therefore, on the basis of what I have said before, I come to the conclusion that a finding would be appropriate that the decision on draft resolution A/39/L.19 falls into the category of decisions mentioned in Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter and requires a two-thirds majority for adoption.

240. Mr. AL-QAYSI (Iraq): Purely from a legal and non-political—I assure my colleagues in this Assembly—point of view, it is very interesting to note that the Legal Counsel, in dealing with the past practice of the General Assembly, quoted two examples to us, one relating to the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine from the Assembly's sixteenth session and the other dealing with nuclear and military collaboration with Israel from the thirty-third session. Yet, he did not tell us whether the two-thirds majority vote undertaken at those two sessions with respect to the two resolutions mentioned by him was undertaken on the basis of a specific request to do so. For if the two-thirds modality of voting on those two resolutions was made on the basis of a specific request, then, to my mind, one cannot take these two precedents as having fallen within what my colleague from the United States called the mandatory character of the language of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations and rule 83 of the rules of procedure of the General Assembly. For a provision of a mandatory character has to be applied in law without any specific request being made to that end.

241. That is point one and I require clarification from the Legal Counsel.

242. The second point, which is non-political, is again a legal point. The Legal Counsel, as I understood it, stated that each General Assembly decides individually, for its specific duration, the modality of voting on the nature of the issue before us. If this is so, how can we then employ the argument made by the United States representative to the effect that the proposal is based on Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter, being of a mandatory nature, for "mandatory nature", again, does not apply to an individual Assembly; in other words, it is not of an elective nature but of a durative nature applicable throughout in relation to all General Assemblies and to all items that have a connotation of "recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security".

243. The third legal point is this. A few days ago, on 11 December [95th meeting], we voted on a series of draft resolutions relating to the question of Palestine which included language akin to the language mentioned in the draft resolutions before us. If Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter is of a mandatory character, what is the status of the resolutions that were voted upon and adopted a few days ago? Indeed, from a legal point of view, what is the legal nature of the resolutions that were adopted during this session on the question of Afghanistan and a score of other resolutions that were adopted with language akin to the language in the draft resolutions before us?

244. I have one final remark which is not legal or political but is a factual remark. I am sure that, had it not been for the procedural wrangle that the General Assembly got itself into in the past two days with the ensuing results, we would not have faced the request that is made today by the representative of the United States and the interventions that it has generated. I feel that we should take stock from that experience in order not to be led to conclusions before we think ahead as to what is intended behind the language used in the Charter and we should not take that language lightly, action, as has been pointed out—and we have the words "international peace and security", which we assume mean "international peace and security" in the proposed draft resolution.

245. Mr. FLEISCHHAUER, Legal Counsel: First, I should like to say that of the two examples that I cited, one case is the case concerning the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine where there was no specific request, and one case is the case I quoted from the thirty-third session of the General Assembly where there was a specific request. In addition, I should like to say that even if one has a mandatory provision, then of course the question can legitimately be asked whether one is within the scope of the mandatory provision or not; and this, it seems to me, is precisely the question with which the General Assembly at this moment is confronted. This seems to be the situation in which the Assembly finds itself right now. Such questions can legitimately be asked, and I have stated that, according to my findings, we are in the realm of Article 18, paragraph 2, as far as draft resolution A/39/L.19 is concerned.

246. Mr. AL-QAYSI (Iraq): I should like to express my profound and sincere gratitude and appreciation to the Legal Counsel for having provided me with the clarifications which I sought in my earlier intervention in relation to the questions on the precedents to which he had referred earlier.

247. Since, in regard to the two examples he has quoted, it is clear that in the one precedent the two-thirds majority vote modality was resorted to without a specific request being made, and since in the other example a specific request for a two-thirds majority requirement in the voting was made, it seems to me that on this score the precedents break about even. That is point one.

248. Secondly, in raising the legal questions to the Legal Counsel, I should like to assure him, you, Mr. President, my colleagues and the representative of the United States that I would not at all question the legitimacy and, indeed, the sovereign right of any Member State to make any motion on the basis of the Charter and on the basis of the rules of procedure. Indeed, it is through the democratic practices and the non-emotional and rational procedures we should adopt in our political stand in the United Nations that we could at least see a glimmer of hope for the attainment of international peace and security.

249. But when we consider a draft resolution in terms of the mandatory language in Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter, when for 39 years the United Nations has been producing and adopting resolutions by following a practice contrary to the mandatory language of that paragraph, and when we require precedents and the precedents given are approximately evenly balanced, I can only submit that whether the mandatory language of Article 18, paragraph 2, applies to the draft resolution before us can be resolved only on the basis of a procedural vote. For if it is mandatory and must be applied without resort to a procedural vote, we shall have concluded one of two things: either past resolutions with language similar to that of the draft resolution before us are null and void or we are now trying to institute a practice that runs counter to the 39 years of the General Assembly's practice. It seems to me that either alternative would be very dangerous for the future of the United Nations.

250. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States): I have listened with great interest to the intervention of my colleague and friend, the representative of Iraq. I would note only that, first, most resolutions brought before the General Assembly do not concern recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security or the election of members of the Security Council and so on, and, secondly, many of those resolutions have been adopted with a two-thirds majority, including, I believe, all those at this session that the representative of Iraq mentioned.

251. Mr. AL-QAYSI (Iraq): I do not want to prolong the discussion because I do not think it serves the purposes and principles of the United Nations, but I would point out that the Legal Counsel referred to some paragraphs of draft resolution A/39/L.19, construing them to be in the nature of a recommendation relating to the maintenance of international peace and security. A recommendation relating to the maintenance of international peace and security must be action-oriented. When we say, in the ninth preambular paragraph of draft resolution A/39/L.19, "Reaffirming further the imperative necessity of establishing a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the region, . . ." that is the expression of an aspiration. When we say, in the tenth preambular paragraph, "Gravely concerned . . . at the continuing Israeli actions involving the escalation and expansion of the conflict . . . " and so on, that is the expression of an opinion.

252. When it is said that there is a recommendation relating to the maintenance of international peace and security, I reply that we are not calling for peacekeeping operations, nor expending money, nor deciding upon a question that has been referred to us under the "Uniting for peace" resolution [resolution 377 (V)]. I know precisely what I am talking about. That is why we should note the conclusion of the Legal Counsel's opinion. He deems it to be appropriate. That is the expression of an opinion, but the opinion is consultative and non-binding.

253. I can see no other way to resolve the question whether draft resolution A/39/L.19 comes within the mandatory language of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter than by a procedural vote. In other words, we should not be deciding upon the additional categories; we are not adding an additional category. I want to make this precisely clear to my good friends from the United States. I am not relying on Article 18, paragraph 3. I am basing myself on a motion whether the mandatory language of paragraph 2—"recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security"—applies to the language of draft resolution A/39/L.19. We must decide that by a vote, in order to pass judgement on the legal opinion we have received from the Legal Counsel. That is the only democratic way to settle the question.

254. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the United States on a point of order.

255. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States of America): I would point out only that the language of paragraph 11 of draft resolution A/39/L.19 is indeed such as to recommend. In it, the General Assembly

> "Calls upon all States to put an end to the flow to Israel of any military, economic and financial aid, as well as of human resources, aimed at encouraging it to pursue its aggressive policies against the Arab countries and the Palestinian people;".

It is precisely a recommendation.

256. Secondly, if the question whether the mandatory requirement of the Charter applies to a draft resolution that clearly contains recommendations concerning international peace and security is to be decided by majority vote of the Assembly, is the election of members of the Security Council to be decided first by a majority vote of the Assembly followed by a decision whether a two-thirds majority was required?

257. The PRESIDENT: There is clearly a sharp division of views on the question raised by the United States delegation. In these circumstances, I feel it would be appropriate for the Assembly itself to decide the issue, as it has done on several similar occasions in the past. The Assembly is master of its own procedures, and therefore it will decide on this matter. It will have to take a decision on the motion of the United States that the decision on draft resolution A/39/L.19 falls within the category of the decisions mentioned in Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations and that therefore its adoption requires a two-thirds majority of members present and voting.

258. I call on the representative of the United States on a point of order.

259. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States of America): If this question is to be submitted to a vote by the General Assembly, to determine whether the draft resolutions constitute recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security, the United States would like to inquire what the sponsors of the draft resolutions concerned mean when they speak of "international peace and security". If they do not indeed mean to refer to international peace and security, what do their words mean? Surely we require a new translation of those draft resolutions.

260. Mr. AL-ASHTAL (Democratic Yemen): I believe these draft resolutions are written in the English language and Mrs. Kirkpatrick reads English, being a professor. I do not think she should ask us to translate for her what these words mean.

261. Mr. SHIHABI (Saudi Arabia): I think the situation before the Assembly is clear; asking for a vote on whether this needs a two-thirds majority or only a half is very clear.

262. We support a vote and we support very strongly this Assembly's voting in favour of voting on it as a normal, simple draft resolution, because if we are going to take every draft resolution to be a very important resolution the functioning of this body will be handicapped in the long run and we shall be setting a very wrong precedent. I think we should keep to the procedures that have been followed so far.

263. Mr. LEVIN (Israel): I must agree with the representative of Saudi Arabia. We think the situation is very clear. A very simple, clear question is being raised here: is this or is this not an important matter—the whole debate on the Middle East and Palestine. We are hearing from representatives of the Arab Governments which time and again have taken a great deal of the time of the Assembly—by some estimates about a third of this session's time, certainly no less than a quarter, and similarly with previous sessions—on these very issues. I find it hard to believe that they have spent so much time on unimportant matters. The question indeed is, is this or is this not an important matter?

264. Mr. AL-ANSI (Oman) (interpretation from Arabic): We are facing a clear situation. The United States has asked that there should be put to the vote the question whether or not the draft resolution is one which needs a two-thirds majority and whether or not it is an important question. The representative of Iraq gave us an opinion which represents that of the Arab countries and the co-sponsors of the three draft resolutions. We support what the representative of Saudi Arabia said and we call for a vote on the United States motion in this connection.

265. Mr. LEVIN (Israel): I want to complete the point I was making earlier. Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter says that decisions of the General Assembly on important questions shall be made by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting, and those questions shall include "recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security". We have both recommendations—by the way, recommendations of action, as has been pointed out—and we have the words "international peace and security", which we assume mean "international peace and security" in the proposed draft resolution.

266. If this is not an important question, I do not know what is, but I would say to the Arab representatives here who have raised this question, what have you been doing taking up a third of the Assembly's time on unimportant questions?

267. Mr. SCHIFTER (United States of America): I would just like to clarify the procedural state and make a recommendation.

268. We did not propose a motion: we made a statement as to our interpretation and what we believe to be the correct interpretation of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter as it applies to draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20. We note that the Legal Counsel has expressed his agreement with our interpretation. The matter could rest there.

269. However, as a vote has been asked for, and as it is necessary in the circumstances to have a proposal before the Assembly on which it can vote, and as you, Mr. President, suggested that there was a motion by the United States before the Assembly, let me simply, in a spirit of accommodation and so as to make it possible for us to have an appropriate text, read to the Assembly what we would indeed propose be put before this body. Here is my motion:

> "Draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20 constitute 'recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security' within the meaning of that phrase as it appears in Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations and as affirmed by the Legal Counsel."

270. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly has heard the motion of the United States.

271. I believe the representative of Iraq wants to speak on a point of order?

272. Mr. AL-QAYSI (Iraq): I sincerely hope that the representative of the United States will not make that recommendation because it will amount, in effect, if that particular motion is rejected, to killing the draft resolutions de facto, and if it is accepted, to killing them de jure.

273. The question to be decided by the General Assembly, I submit in good faith, is the following—and this is my counter-proposal:

> "Whether the mandatory language in Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter applies in the voting process on draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20".

That is my proposal, whether the mandatory language in Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter—

274. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the United States on a point of order.

275. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States of America): The motion was, Sir, as you have pointed out clearly and as everyone present understands it, made by the United States. We made the motion prior to the motion of our friend from Iraq. The Assembly might desire to vote on both motions.

276. The PRESIDENT: I shall make the position clear when the representative of Iraq has finished. Will he proceed, please?

277. Mr. AL-QAYSI (Iraq): I sincerely hope that my good friend, Mrs. Kirkpatrick, will listen carefully to what I am going to say now. It is a factual account of what has transpired this afternoon.

278. The delegation of the United States did not make a motion; it outlined a position to the effect that, in voting on draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20, the voting modality should be two thirds because of the language in Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter, which is mandatory, and we have to vote on these two draft resolutions on a two-thirds majority basis because the language of the Charter is mandatory.

279. It was the delegation of Democratic Yemen which requested legal opinion. The Legal Counsel gave his opinion. My delegation intervened twice and concluded that the only way to resolve this question is to put the question whether the mandatory nature applies here. I agree entirely with the delegation of the United States—and I have pointed this out many times—that the language of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter is mandatory. I said nothing short of that. But the question at issue here is whether the mandatory nature of that language and the conclusion in terms of the voting modality that issues from it apply to draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20. I am not here adopting a procedural tactic in connection with my motion and the United States motion being voted upon and as to which should take precedence over the other. The factual situation is this: the United States concluded, with the support of the Legal Counsel, that the language of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter is mandatory and therefore we have to have a two-thirds majority vote on draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20.

280. My conclusion is that that has to be decided for the reasons I have outlined in my two statements. So what the Assembly has to do, in good faith and in all honesty, is to determine whether that mandatory language applies to the voting procedure on draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20—not, as it was worded by the representative of the United States, that "draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20 constitute recommendations with respect" and so on. As I have said, if that motion, or recommendation, is accepted by the General Assembly, it will amount to killing the draft resolutions de jure; if it is rejected, it will kill them de facto.

281. Indeed, this shows the sense of fairness, justice and democracy and the discontinuance of abusive practices through procedural debates to which we should all aspire.

282. Mr. SCHIFTER (United States of America): This delegation certainly agrees with the final objectives just stated by the representative of Iraq, for whose scholarship we have the highest regard. Looking at this matter for what it is, namely, a legal issue, we consider it essential that the General Assembly deal with the steps that are necessary to reach the legal conclusion that has to be reached here, and not skip any step. If we were simply to put the question: should this matter be decided by a two-thirds vote or not, we would be skipping an essential legal point, namely, the question whether draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20 are, as I suggested before, recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security. So as to deal with this question, we must go at it step by step, and going at it step by step would be to say, first, that draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20 either are or are not recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security. If they are, then Article 18, paragraph 2, applies; if they are not, it does not apply. That is the question that has to be decided. The question that the General Assembly certainly should not be called upon to decide is whether, irrespective of whether the section applies or not, it wants to proceed by a two-thirds vote. This would not be legally proper and should not be a matter before the General Assembly at any time.

283. The PRESIDENT: I appeal to members of the General Assembly, including the delegation of the United States, to consider the following as the basis of a decision that is to be made by the General Assembly.

284. In the light of the discussion which has been held, it is my understanding that the General Assembly is being called upon to determine that draft resolution A/39/L.19 is to be decided by a two-thirds majority of members present and voting, under Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter.

285. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States of America): The United States, in all good faith and in the interests of clarity and the meaningfulness of our procedures here, respectfully suggests that the question as you have put it, Mr. President, would be perfectly acceptable to us providing that, after "draft resolution A/39/L.19", the words "as recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security" were added—so that it would read:

> "The General Assembly is being called upon to determine with regard to draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20 that they should be decided by a two-thirds majority, under Article 18, paragraph 2, as recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security."

286. Mr. BOUZIRI (Tunisia) (interpretation from French): The Tunisian delegation very much appreciates the effort made by the President of the Assembly, and we believe that his proposal is relevant and absolutely clear and that it could therefore be put to the vote immediately. That would resolve the situation in which the Assembly finds itself at present.

287. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States of America): The reason that the United States desires to make specific reference to "recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security" is that Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter includes a number of categories of decisions by the General Assembly. We desire to be specific about the precise terms of that Article under which we are suggesting that the Article applies. We are suggesting that it is precisely that part of Article 18, paragraph 2, concerning recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security, and no other part of that Article, to which we are making reference.

288. Mr. AL-QAYSI (Iraq): I crave your indulgence, Mr. President, but I was unable to take down in full the proposal you read out to the Assembly. I hope that you will read it again after my present statement so that I am able to scrutinize its wording.

289. What I was able to jot down makes specific reference to two things which link it precisely to the substance of the addition which the delegation of the United States would like to make to the proposal, that is, references to the requirement of a two-thirds majority in the voting, and to Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter. What troubles me, quite honestly, about the addition proposed by the United States is that with the United States addition to your proposal, Sir, we would end up with the precise proposal made by the United States earlier, except for the difference that, while the United States proposal starts by speaking of recommendations, the United States addition to your proposal would end by speaking of such recommendations.

290. That would somehow make it a little bit unfair, in terms of substance. The cardinal issue is, as I submitted earlier, that the position of the United States is that Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter applies to the voting procedure for draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20 because its language is mandatory, and that the question has to be decided on the basis of Article 18, paragraph 2, not on the basis of the additional category on the basis of Article 18, paragraph 3. If that is the cardinal issue, why should we not be able to settle for the language put forward in an unprejudicial manner by you, Sir, which would not tip the scale either way.

291. As you pointed out earlier, according to the practice of the General Assembly there have always been requests, except in marginal cases where it is within the mandate that the voting should be by a two-thirds majority. I hope that your appeal will be heeded and that this question may be disposed of.

292. I would note that we are not deciding here whether or not the question is important linguistically or politically or geographically; we are deciding here the technical, conceptual, constitutional question of whether or not what is contained in draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20 is governed by the mandatory nature of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter.

293. Mrs. KIRKPATRICK (United States of America): The United States made a simple point about draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20. That point was that those draft resolutions concern recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and that, that being the case, they fall under the mandatory provisions of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter, which deal with recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security.

294. The position stated by the United States on a point of order was upheld by the Legal Counsel with regard to draft resolution A/39/L.19. The United States was the first country to formulate a motion here today, once the President determined that he would call for a vote. The United States feels that it cannot accept a formulation which makes no reference to precisely the point of our point of order, namely, whether these draft resolutions, making recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security, should not fall under that Article. To eliminate reference to the subject-matter of our point of order seems to me to be unreasonable and unacceptable.

295. The PRESIDENT: I propose now to suspend the meeting for a short time.

The meeting was suspended at 7.10 p.m. and resumed at 8.35 p.m.

296. The PRESIDENT: Before the suspension there was a motion by the representative of the United States, which reads as follows:

> "Draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20 constitute 'recommendations with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security' within the meaning of that phrase as it appears in Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations and as affirmed by the Legal Counsel."

297. The Assembly will now take a decision on the United States motion.

The motion was rejected by 69 votes to 28, with 23 abstentions.

298. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now vote on the various draft resolutions before it. First, we turn to draft resolution A/39/L.19 and Corr.1 and Add.1. A separate vote has been requested on paragraph 10 of that draft resolution. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cape Verde, China, Comoros, Congo, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Egypt, Ethiopia, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guyana, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mauritania, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Poland, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

The draft resolution was adopted by 88 votes to 22, with 32 abstentions (resolution 39/146 B).

301. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to draft resolution A/39/L.21 and Corr.1 and Add.1. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Israel.

Abstaining: Guatemala, Ivory Coast, Liberia, Paraguay, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, United States of America, Venezuela.

The draft resolution was adopted by 138 votes to 1, with 7 abstentions (resolution 39/146 C).

302. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call upon those representatives wishing to explain their vote after the voting.

303. Mr. ARCILLA (Philippines): The Philippines has consistently stressed the view that a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement of the Middle East conflict should be achieved on the basis of the following key principles: first, withdrawal of Israeli forces from the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem; secondly, recognition of the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to self-determination, including the right to establish an independent State in Palestine; thirdly, participation of the Palestinian people, through the PLO, in the peace negotiations; and fourthly, recognition of the right of all States in the region, including Israel, to live in peace within secure and internationally recognized boundaries, free from threats or acts of force, in conformity with Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973).

304. We also remain of the view that resolutions on the situation in the Middle East, in order that they may contribute positively to the peace efforts, should be balanced in substance and should not prejudice the sovereign right of States to conduct their own international affairs in the way they see fit.

305. In the light of the foregoing, my delegation was constrained to abstain on draft resolution A/39/L.20. By the same token, while my delegation voted in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.19, we have reservations on the way certain of its provisions were formulated.

306. Mr. LEHNE (Austria): Austria's position on the item under discussion is well known and has been consistent over the years. It has found clear expression in our contribution to the debate on this agenda item. It should therefore be evident to all that we fully share the concern expressed in the draft resolutions relating to the situation in the Middle East, and we agree with most of their elements.

307. There are however a number of provisions in these texts which we cannot support. In particular, Austria does not believe that breaking relations with Israel would bring us any closer to a solution of the Middle East problem. We also consistently oppose the singling out for criticism in General Assembly resolutions of particular countries, a practice which does not serve to promote the cause of peace in the Middle East.

308. Nor can we support any formulation which could be interpreted as impinging on the principle of universality of membership in the United Nations.

309. While Austria whole-heartedly supported draft resolution A/39/L.21, in the light of these considerations it felt obliged to abstain in the vote on draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20.

310. Let me add a few words explaining our position on the procedural motion regarding the application of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations in the vote on draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20. My delegation is concerned about the recent trend at this session of the General Assembly to change the established practice of decision-making to suit particular political interests and positions. As we fear that this tendency could undermine the role and the functioning of this body, we felt compelled to oppose this motion, just as we have previously opposed others.

311. Mr. BORIO (Brazil): With regard to draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20, let me reiterate that the Brazilian Government believes that the global solution for the situation in the Middle East must necessarily include the right of all States in the region to exist within internationally recognized boundaries. My delegation has been insisting on the withdrawal of the occupation forces from Arab territories and on the right of the Palestinians to an autonomous and independent territory. But it also considers that the possibilities for achieving such a goal should not be reduced by the diplomatic isolation of one of the parties to the conflict, even if that party has been acting in a manner incompatible with international law and with numerous resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council. We strongly condemn such behaviour, but at the same time do not want to offer the Israeli Government excuses to act in further disregard of the rules of international law and of mutually respectful relationships among peoples because of its isolation from the international community. It is necessary for Israel to understand that its attitude does not lead to peace or to its own security. No action—and in particular no illegal action—will give Israel the right to live in peace if it does not respect the security and territorial integrity of its neighbours.

312. Mr. PAPAJORGJI (Albania): The Albanian delegation voted in favour of the three draft resolutions just adopted. This is in conformity with the position of the Socialist People's Republic of Albania in support of the struggle of Arab peoples against the imperialist, Zionist aggression.

313. The Albanian delegation expressed once again the viewpoints of its Government in the statement made during the debate on this agenda item [75th meeting]. Nevertheless, we have our reservations; we have made them known in the past and we shall not repeat them now. They deal with some paragraphs, such as paragraph 13 of draft resolution A/39/L.19, as well as with the documents and resolutions adopted in the past which are now mentioned in the draft resolutions just adopted.

314. Mr. SHEHATA (Egypt): The principled position of Egypt regarding the illegality of the Israeli occupation and annexation of the Syrian Golan Heights is reflected in no uncertain terms in our sponsoring of draft resolution A/SPC/39/L.27, adopted by the Special Political Committee on 29 November and endorsed today by the General Assembly [resolution 39/95F]. It is equally reflected in our affirmative vote on draft resolution A/39/L.19 just adopted, particularly paragraph 9, which focuses on the Syrian Golan Heights.

315. During the ninth emergency special session of the General Assembly, the delegation of Egypt, on 5 February 1982, stated fully its position on the issue of the Golan Heights [12th meeting], and I need not quote from that statement.

316. As to draft resolution A/39/L.20, just adopted, it includes, in our view, both in its preambular and operative paragraphs, positive elements and established principles to which Egypt fully subscribes. The Government of Egypt strongly supports the principle of the inadmissibility of acquisition of territory by war. We likewise reaffirm the applicability of the Geneva conventions to all the occupied Arab territories in the West Bank, including Jerusalem, the Gaza Strip, and the occupied Syrian Golan Heights.

317. It is also our view that Israel's decision to extend its law, administration and jurisdiction over the Golan Heights is null and void and that Israel must withdraw from the occupied Golan Heights. There are certain aspects of draft resolution A/39/L.20 to which we cannot subscribe, in particular some parts of paragraph 13. We have therefore abstained in the voting on that resolution.

318. Mrs. BOCCHECIAMPE de CROVATI (Venezuela) (interpretation from Spanish): Our country is participating, as it always does, in the Assembly's consideration of the situation in the Middle East. We are thereby performing a duty that we owe to the international community, for we feel that there should be a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

319. We are convinced that such a peace in the region will be achieved only if it is founded upon the right of all States in the region to exist in peace within internationally recognized and secure borders, and as long as there is full respect for the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people. That is our unwavering position, which is well known.

320. In that spirit, Venezuela abstained in the voting on draft resolutions A/39/L.19, L.20 and L.21. We did so because we consider that they contain paragraphs that do not contribute to the achievement of the objective of peace. Rather than promoting the processes that have been favoured by the international community, they include points that could indeed cause a delay in the settlement of the Middle East problem.

321. Mr. HERRERA CÁCERES (Honduras) (interpretation from Spanish): My delegation concurs with the Secretary-General's statement, with regard to the conflict between the Arab countries and Israel, that "a comprehensive settlement will have to be reached, at least in its final stage, if not earlier, through a process of negotiation in which all the parties concerned will participate" [A/39/600, para. 39]; that "none of the parties to this historic and tragic conflict can hope to attain its maximum demands if there is to be a state of real peace in the region" [ibid., para. 43]; and that

> "a comprehensive settlement in the Middle East will have to meet the following conditions: the withdrawal of the Israeli forces from occupied territories; respect of and acknowledgement of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every State in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries, free from threats or acts of force; and, lastly, a just settlement of the Palestinian problem based on the recognition of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, including self-determination. In this context, the question of Jerusalem also remains of primary importance." [Ibid., para. 38.]

322. In previous years, Honduras cast an affirmative vote on the draft resolutions that today correspond to draft resolution A/39/L.21. We have continued to follow the same policy during this session. Regarding draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20, my delegation finds positive and negative elements in them, and we have already expressed the position of Honduras within the context of our bilateral and multilateral international relations.

323. We have already indicated, inter alia, the reasoning underlying our votes on previous resolutions. We support the legitimate and inalienable right of the Palestinian people to self-determination, the right to existence and security of all States in the Middle East, including Israel, and the preservation of the character and status of the Holy City of Jerusalem. That is why we have also spoken out against the use of force in international relations and condemned any act of military occupation. Everything that is in accordance with those aspects in these resolutions we deem to be positive and, therefore, has our continued support.

324. However, there are negative elements that have been merged with the positive elements. The delegation of Honduras has previously expressed its clear-cut position. There are some elements here that do not give the necessary respect to the consular and diplomatic relations we enjoy with other States of the international community, as well as to the harmonization of efforts that we must make in order to achieve the aims sought by all of the 159 Members of the United Nations.

325. Honduras does not consider the singling out of countries a justifiable practice, and it would be difficult for us to support appeals and selective measures that would be incompatible with the relations and aims we have mentioned. This is a matter of principle which, if not taken into consideration, could in our view jeopardize the security, confidence and good faith that should govern consular and diplomatic relations among States and could have a negative impact on the achievement of the aims of the United Nations, which can be achieved by promoting the peaceful solution of disputes and peaceful forms of co-operation among States Members of the Organization.

326. In view of the concurrence of the negative and positive elements I have just mentioned, we abstained in the votes on draft resolutions A/39/L.19 and L.20.

327. Mr. PAPADOPOULOS (Greece): Greece has never failed to condemn consistently and in no uncertain terms the acts of Israel against the Arab countries. Our position in this respect is determined, inter alia, by my country's unshakeable attachment to the principles enshrined in Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter of the United Nations and in the Helsinki Final Act.[7] It is for those reasons that my delegation voted in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.19, L.20 and L.21.

328. However, my delegation is unable to go along with certain paragraphs in draft resolution A/39/L.20. If a separate vote had been taken, my delegation would have abstained in the voting on paragraphs 8, 13 (c) and 13 (d) and would have voted against paragraph 14. Thus, my delegation dissociates itself from those paragraphs, while it voted in favour of the draft resolution as a whole.

329. Mr. WOOLCOTT (Australia): Australia voted in favour of the United States motion on the basis of the opinion of the Legal Counsel and of our own reading of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations. But my delegation is concerned, as I said yesterday in relation to the resolutions with regard to apartheid [99th meeting], that established procedures of the Assembly are being changed, with unpredictable consequences.

330. Australia voted against two of the three draft resolutions which have been adopted because they contain some extreme language and unacceptable elements which are contrary to Australian policy. Australia supports the urgent need to achieve a just, lasting and comprehensive settlement in the Middle East. The Palestinian issue is of central importance to a settlement, and Australia acknowledges the right to self-determination of the Palestinian people, including their right, if they so choose, to independence and the possibility of their own independent State.

331. At the same time, Australia has a fundamental commitment to Israel's right to exist within secure and recognized boundaries. Draft resolution A/39/L.19 failed to provide appropriate guarantees of that. In our view, it should, for example, have reaffirmed Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) as essential elements in a framework for a settlement. We could not support draft resolution A/39/L.19 because of its exclusive emphasis on the rights of one party to the conflict to the detriment of the rights of another.

332. Australia also rejects a number of elements in draft resolution A/39/L.20 which would, in our view, serve only to aggravate an already tense situation and obstruct the search for peace. In particular, we cannot support calls for the adoption of measures which would lead to the total isolation of Israel, including action under Chapter VII of the Charter. Such calls take no account of the need for all parties to commit themselves to end the violence and bloodshed which have so long marked the dispute and to seek negotiated solutions.

333. Australia voted in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.21. The Australian Government does not accept the validity of measures which claim to change the status of territories occupied since 1967, including East Jerusalem and the Golan Heights.

334. Mrs. CARRASCO MONJE (Bolivia) (interpretation from Spanish): The Government of Bolivia has always firmly supported the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territories by force. For this reason, we consider null and void measures adopted by Israel with regard to the occupied Arab territories, and we call for the withdrawal of the occupying troops in Lebanon and the Golan Heights, as well as withdrawal from the territories occupied in the West Bank and Gaza.

335. My delegation considers that a just and lasting settlement of the question of the Middle East must be achieved that will allow all the States in the region to live together in peace within secure and recognized borders free from any threat. However, the approach and treatment in some of the paragraphs of draft resolution A/39/L.20 made it impossible for us to support it.

336. Mr. VRAALSEN (Norway): The Norwegian delegation has voted against two and in favour of one of the draft resolutions before us on the situation in the Middle East. In this connection, I would like to stress the following points which remain at the core of my country's position on the Middle East issue.

337. First, Norway firmly believes that the basic elements of a peaceful settlement to the Arab-Israeli dispute are contained in Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973). These elements, which are recognized by the international community, include the non-acceptance of the acquisition of territory by force and the right of all States in the area to live in peace within secure and internationally recognized boundaries.

338. Equally, we believe that a just, lasting and comprehensive peace must take into account the legitimate national rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to self-determination.

339. Those basic principles strike what in our view is a fair balance of rights and obligations between the parties to the dispute.

340. I would like to stress that two of the draft resolutions before us, taken as a whole, in no way reflect the mutual balance between the interests of the parties which, in the opinion of my Government, would be necessary to achieve a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

341. Rather than promoting peace and understanding, the contents of some of the paragraphs of draft resolution A/39/L.20 are disruptive and could lead in the opposite direction. With regard to paragraphs 12 to 16 of that draft resolution, our objections relate to their substantive contents as well as to the fact that they cannot be reconciled with the division of responsibilities between the General Assembly and the Security Council as envisaged by the Charter of the United Nations.

342. Norway also voted against draft resolution A/39/L.19. Our main objection is the severe lack of balance. Regarding paragraph 10 of that draft resolution, we believe that a sovereign State has the right to conclude agreements with another State. That right is recognized by international law.

343. My delegation voted in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.21, concerning Jerusalem. Norway does not recognize Israel's annexation of Jerusalem, and we do not recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel.

344. Mr. CAPPAGLI (Argentina) (interpretation from Spanish): The delegation of Argentina voted in favour of draft resolution A/39/L.19 because it reflects my country's position and the will of the vast majority of the international community, and of the members of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries in particular, that there be a comprehensive, just, peaceful and lasting solution in the Middle East that will meet the legitimate aspirations of all the peoples of the region.

345. At the same time, my delegation would like to reaffirm its belief that the situation in the Middle East, an area of persistent instability, requires a just and equitable solution based on the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council, in particular Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973).

346. Notwithstanding that, the delegation of Argentina wishes to state that it does have some reservations with regard to some of the paragraphs in the draft resolution and the possible interpretation that might be given them, in particular, paragraph 10, upon which a separate vote was taken, and paragraphs 6 and 11, because they contain statements critical of efforts made to achieve peace in the region.

347. The Argentine delegation abstained in the vote on draft resolution A/39/L.20 because some of its paragraphs contain judgements and recommendations that would not, in our opinion, lead to a peaceful, negotiated and comprehensive solution of the situation in the Middle East.

348. On the other hand, my delegation believes that, in conformity with the provisions of the Charter, the competence of the main organs of the United Nations must be respected. Nevertheless, my delegation expresses its full support for the paragraphs in the resolution that refer to the Syrian territory of the Golan Heights, which Israel continues to occupy illegally, in violation of Security Council resolution 497 (1981) and resolutions adopted by the General Assembly.

349. Israel's decision to impose its legislation, jurisdiction and administration in the Golan Heights is null and void, and therefore has no validity or legal effect whatever. A part of the Syrian Arab Republic's sovereign territory has been illegally taken away from it. The Government of Israel must respect the principles of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force and of the territorial integrity of States, which are essential principles laid down in the Charter.

350. Mr. CHEN CHARPENTIER (Mexico) (interpretation from Spanish): Mexico has repeatedly stated that it is in favour of a peaceful, negotiated solution to the Middle East conflict, in accordance with the principles of the United Nations and the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council.

351. Any just and lasting settlement must take into account the interests of all the parties involved and must fulfil the national aspirations of the Palestinian people. So long as that core of the conflict is not resolved, there will be only provisional agreements that will impede any lasting solution.

352. The convening of an international conference, with the participation of all the interested parties and under the auspices of the United Nations, could be of great importance for peace, so long as, from the very stage of its preparation, the true political will to find satisfactory compromise formulas existed.

353. Mexico voted in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.19, L.20 and L.21, thereby demonstrating once again its real commitment to United Nations resolutions, despite its reservations on paragraphs 12, 13 and 14 of draft resolution A/39/L.20. Finally, had there been a separate vote on paragraph 6 of draft resolution A/39/L.19, my delegation would have abstained.

354. Mr. DOJE (Bhutan): I wish to explain my delegation's vote on draft resolution A/39/L.20. My delegation voted in favour of that draft resolution, but we have reservations on the use of certain phrases and on certain determinations made in the eighth preambular paragraph and in paragraph 12.

355. Mr. ADJOYI (Togo) (interpretation from French): The Government of Togo has always been very much concerned over the situation in the Middle East and has always wished peace to be restored to that part of the world, which for almost 40 years has never known that peace so greatly aspired to by all the peoples of the region. That is why my delegation voted in favour of draft resolutions A/39/L.19, L.20 and L.21.

356. The Government of Togo has always supported various actions designed to restore peace to the region, by means, of course, of the self-determination of the Palestinian people. However, the Government of Togo refuses, as it has the right to do, to take a position on agreements freely signed by sovereign States. My Government does not defend agreements to which it is not a party, but neither does it wish to attack such agreements. That is why my delegation abstained in the vote on paragraph 10 of draft resolution A/39/L.19.

357. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Israel, who has asked to speak in exercise of the right of reply.

358. Mr. NETANYAHU (Israel): I have two brief remarks. The first relates to the voting sheet that I have before me concerning the United States motion to regard international peace and security as international peace and security. I think this is a historic document. We have long argued that there is, as many people know, an abasement and a corruption of language here. We have seen that argument used in Orwell's book 1984—this very year. What Mr. Orwell was saying was that in 1984 the word "peace" would not mean peace; it would mean something else—it might mean war. What we have learned today is that the General Assembly says that "international peace and security" does not mean international peace and security. I think that, at the close of December of 1984, this is, unhappily, a fitting tribute to Mr. Orwell.

359. My second comment is this. The vote of the General Assembly on the motion regarding Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations has decreed that the issue at hand, the situation in the Middle East, with all the attendant resolutions condemning my country, is not—I repeat: is not—an important issue. My Government will in the future take this into account.

360. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Jordan on a point of order.

361. Mr. BURAYZAT (Jordan): I did not think that we were now discussing the vote which took place a while ago. The representative of Israel asked to explain his delegation's vote on the draft resolutions that have just been adopted. Now he has simply opened the debate on another issue, a substantive issue. He is interpreting the meaning of a vote. The General Assembly did not debate that vote. No delegation asked to speak in order to debate the motion put forward by the representative of the United States.

362. So I instruct you, Mr. President, to ask the representative of Israel to limit his statement to explaining his delegation's position on the motion and not to interpret what the Assembly meant when it voted on the motion.

363. The PRESIDENT: Unfortunately, the representative of Israel has already left the Hall, so I cannot tell him anything. The Assembly has concluded its consideration of agenda item 36.

The meeting rose at 9.20 p.m.

AGENDA ITEM 143

Inadmissibility of the policy of State terrorism and any actions by States aimed at undermining the socio-political system in other sovereign States

2. Mr. KESSELY (Chad), Rapporteur of the First Committee (interpretation from French): I have the honour to present to the General Assembly the reports of the First Committee on its work under item 66, on Antarctica, and on the questions of international security, under items 67, 68, 69 and 143 of the agenda. They are contained in documents A/39/756 to 759 and 761.

3. The First Committee considered the question of the Antarctic from 28 to 30 November and adopted a draft resolution. This is a very complex and sensitive subject because of the interests involved. Nevertheless, the general debate on this item demonstrated once again the peaceful and universal character of that continent. Delegations which spoke in the discussion all reaffirmed that Antarctica must be free from the arms race and from political rivalries. They renounced all claim to ownership and any territorial claims. On the other hand, international co-operation in the area of scientific research, peaceful exploitation of the resources and protection of the environment were stressed by many delegations.

4. The report of the Secretary-General [A/39/583 (Part I) and Corr.1 and A/39/583 (Part II) and Corr.1, vol. I to III] prepared in accordance with General Assembly resolution 38/77, was widely appreciated, and this appreciation is expressed in the draft resolution adopted on this item.

5. I submit to the General Assembly for adoption the recommendation of the First Committee found in paragraph 7 of the report [A/39/756].

6. Regarding the questions of international security, the Committee considered the items under this heading from 3 to 7 December 1984. The exchange of views occurred in a climate of relative détente, perhaps because international security had not been spectacularly challenged this year or because there has been a beginning of a softening of the relations between the two major Powers, and perhaps also through lassitude, because we have come to regard existing sources of tension as part of our daily lives. Nevertheless, these points of tension were not neglected. On the contrary, they served as specific examples on which to base denunciations of the lack of international security and a call for scrupulous respect for the Charter to counter-balance it.

7. Item 67, entitled "Strengthening of security and co-operation in the Mediterranean region", is, as representatives know, of particular importance for the region involved. Its consideration demonstrated that the promotion of peace, security and co-operation in the area would also make a significant contribution to the peace and security of all nations.

8. Items 68 and 69, entitled, respectively, "Review and implementation of the Declaration on the Strengthening of International Security" and "Implementation of the provisions of collective security of the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security", gave delegations an opportunity to express their views regarding various aspects of peace and security in all parts of the world.

9. Finally, item 143, entitled "Inadmissibility of the policy of State terrorism and any actions by States aimed at undermining the socio-political system in other sovereign States", appeared this year for the first time on the General Assembly's agenda, at the request of the Soviet Union, and was allocated to the First Committee for consideration. The underlying motive for the inclusion of this item was that, in the light of the frequent action to undermine the régimes of other States, the General Assembly should be much firmer in condemning such practices and should also, as a corollary to this, call upon all States to respect and strictly observe the right of peoples freely to choose their socio-political system and to pursue their political, economic, social and cultural development in complete independence.

10. Once again the First Committee sincerely believes that it has done something to try and unite the forces of the world for the maintenance of international peace and security, in order to spare mankind from the scourge of war. That is why in its various decisions it has stressed the need for effective, energetic and flexible measures to avert or eliminate threats to or breaches of the peace.

11. On behalf of the First Committee, I have pleasure in submitting to the General Assembly for adoption the recommendations contained in the final paragraph of each report.

12. Before concluding, I should like to come back to one of the disarmament items which has already been introduced, that is, item 55, entitled "Relationship between disarmament and development". The sponsors of draft resolution A/C.1/39/L.72/Rev.1, which was adopted by the First Committee, have made known their wish that the session of the Preparatory Committee for the International Conference on the Relationship between Disarmament and Development should be held at Geneva. That request was formulated after appropriate consultations with the delegations concerned in the First Committee. Consequently, I submit this request to the General Assembly and ask it to take note of it.

Pursuant to rule 66 of the rules of procedure, it was decided not to discuss the reports of the First Committee.

13. The PRESIDENT: Statements will be limited to explanations of vote. The positions of delegations regarding the various recommendations of the First Committee have been made clear in the Committee and are reflected in the relevant official records. May I remind members that under paragraph 7 of decision 34/401, the General Assembly agreed that:

> "When the same draft resolution is considered in a Main Committee and in plenary meeting, a delegation should, as far as possible, explain its vote only once, i.e., either in the Committee or in plenary meeting unless that delegation's vote in plenary meeting is different from its vote in the Committee."

I also remind members that, in accordance with decision 34/401, explanations of vote are limited to 10 minutes and should be made by delegations from their seats.

14. We now come to the report of the First Committee on agenda item 53 [A/39/743]. The Assembly will now vote on the draft resolution recommended by the First Committee in paragraph 8 of its report. The programme budget implications of the draft resolution are in document A/39/806. Separate, recorded votes have been requested on paragraphs 3 and 4. We shall vote first on paragraph 3.

A recorded vote was taken.

The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 94 votes to 2, with 44 abstentions (resolution 39/147).[2]

17. The PRESIDENT: I understand that some technical points still need to be clarified with regard to item 55, "Relationship between disarmament and development", and I therefore suggest we defer consideration of that item until later this morning.

18. The Assembly will now turn to the report of the First Committee on agenda item 59 [A/39/749]. The Assembly will take a decision on the 18 draft resolutions and the one draft decision recommended by the First Committee in paragraphs 67 and 68 of its report. Draft resolution A relates to unilateral nuclear disarmament measures. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ireland, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia.

Against: United States of America.

However, we want to state for the record that the adoption of that draft resolution should not constitute a precedent to be applied to other organs and institutes which also work on the basis of voluntary contributions. This applies in particular to the provisions concerning the financing of certain activities of the United Nations Institute for Disarmament Research from the United Nations budget.

41. Mr. BAY ROSSI (Italy) (interpretation from French): My delegation abstained in the vote in the First Committee on draft resolution A/C.1/39/L.64 regarding the prevention of nuclear war. The conclusion which can be derived from the discussion in the First Committee on this item during the present session, including draft resolution A/C.1/39/L.40, clearly brings out the need for a more detailed study of this. The prevention of nuclear war is undoubtedly a matter which is of paramount importance for all countries. It is even a tragic choice in the case of many countries, including Italy. We believe therefore that a global approach to the problem would be the most likely to lead to more specific results than certain unilateral initiatives whose conclusions are often premature. It is for that reason that my delegation voted against draft resolution A/C.1/39/L.64.

42. Mr. QIAN Jiadong (China) (interpretation from Chinese): The Chinese delegation would like very briefly to explain its vote on the draft resolution entitled "Bilateral nuclear-arms negotiations" just adopted.

43. When that draft resolution was voted on in the First Committee my delegation abstained. We did so because differences of opinion exist between the United States and the Soviet Union as to how to resume their negotiations. As we explained then, this position does not mean that we do not agree to the resumption of talks between them; on the contrary, we sincerely hope that they will respond to the wishes of the peoples of the world by endeavouring to arrive at an early resumption of their talks.

44. Recently the Soviet Union and the United States agreed to carry out negotiations on outer space and nuclear weapons. We welcome that development, and just now we voted in favour of the draft resolution. We sincerely hope they will engage in earnest negotiations and arrive at early agreement conducive to the relaxation of international tensions, without causing any harm to the interests of any other country.

45. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now turn its attention to the report of the First Committee on agenda item 62 [A/39/752]. The Assembly will take a decision on the draft resolution recommended by the Committee in paragraph 8 of its report. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of that draft resolution is contained in document A/39/801/Rev.1. The First Committee adopted the draft resolution without a vote. May I consider that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/149).

46. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to the report of the First Committee on agenda item 63 [A/39/753]. The draft resolution recommended by the Committee is contained in paragraph 8 of its report. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of that draft resolution is contained in document A/39/795. The First Committee adopted that draft resolution without a vote. May I consider that the General Assembly also wishes to adopt it?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/150).

47. The PRESIDENT: We shall now consider the report of the First Committee on agenda item 65 [A/39/755]. The Assembly will take a decision on the 10 draft resolutions recommended by the Committee in paragraph 29 of its report. The draft resolution was adopted by 108 votes to 22, with 13 abstentions (resolution 39/158).

64. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Albania, who wishes to explain his vote.

65. Mr. JANKU (Albania): As at the last session, this time too the Albanian delegation did not participate in the voting on the draft resolutions related to international peace and security recommended by the First Committee in its reports contained in documents A/39/758 and A/39/759. This was because of the reservations we have on some formulations and views expressed in those draft resolutions. Since we have already explained those reservations on previous occasions, we are not entering into the details now.

66. However, we would like to reiterate that these resolutions do not reveal the causes of the insecurity prevailing the world over. We maintain the view that it is the super-Powers, other imperialist Powers and reactionary forces which threaten and undermine international peace and security.

67. At the same time we wish to say that the adoption by consensus of the draft resolution on the strengthening of security and co-operation in the Mediterranean region in document A/39/757 shows quite clearly the wish of the Mediterranean and other countries that peace and security should prevail in this region of particular importance. Our country has always shared the concern and aspirations of these countries that the Mediterranean should belong to the people of the Mediterranean; this position of ours was clearly expressed in our speech on this problem in the First Committee.

68. However, we wish to reiterate that we have reservations about this resolution. We would like to point out that the Mediterranean and its security, like peace in general, are threatened by the super-Powers, which are responsible for the increasing tension prevailing in this region and for the tense and continuously worsening situation. Our delegation has its reservations, particularly with regard to the reference in the resolution to the Mediterranean chapter of the Helsinki Final Act and some other paragraphs. Our position on the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe is well known and is unchangeable.

69. As we have already stressed in our statements both in the General Assembly and in the First Committee, the Socialist People's Republic of Albania and its Government maintain that only when the super-Powers, together with their aggressive fleets and other military equipment, leave these waters will the Mediterranean really belong to the peoples of the Mediterranean and will genuine peace and security prevail in the region.

70. The PRESIDENT: Finally, the Assembly will turn to the report of the First Committee on agenda item 143 [A/39/761]. The Assembly will vote on the draft resolution recommended by the First Committee in paragraph 12 of the report. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, China, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Malawi, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Paraguay, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Venezuela.

The draft resolution was adopted by 117 votes to none, with 30 abstentions (resolution 39/159).

71. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their votes.

72. Mr. HERRERA CACERES (Honduras) (interpretation from Spanish): The draft resolution recommended by the First Committee in document A/39/761 refers to certain actions that are described as State terrorism and aimed at undermining the socio-political system of other sovereign States.

73. None the less, it is known that in contemporary international law there is no autonomous concept of terrorism and, if the internal law of different States shows the existence of regulations on this, comparative study shows that the meaning differs. If we have not, at the international level, defined the basic concept of terrorism, how is it possible to describe unlawful actions or sets of actions as a type of terrorism the illegality of which is a consequence of violations of internationally established laws and principles, and not a consequence of innovative concepts which have no internationally accepted legal basis? In other words, we do not yet have an international classification of terrorism, nor do we have a classification of its forms, whether individual or State terrorism; nor in the latter case, terrorism of a State against its own nationals or against other sovereign States.

74. The very formulation of terrorism offers major difficulties, since this is an area where subjective approaches predominate that can be a source of arbitrary interpretation and can lead the developing States, in particular, to take part in the East-West conflict.

75. The guidelines of contemporary international law, including the resolutions of this international Organization, are sufficiently explicit to prevent our hastily treading on uncertain and dangerous ground for the effective implementation of the principles of the Charter and its respective resolutions.

76. Amendments introduced to the draft resolution on the inadmissibility of the policy of State terrorism or any action by States aimed at undermining the socio-political system of other sovereign States have the advantage of attenuating the subjectivity of the original text, thereby expanding the list of illicit actions that might be carried out by a Government against another Government, for political or ideological reasons, to force change in the socio-political system of a State, or to avoid change in such systems.

They also extend this to all military actions of intervention or military occupation under any pretext, without exception.

77. It should be noted in passing that the contents of these amendments were not reflected in the preamble or in the title of the draft resolution before us.

78. All of these supposed actions, once having taken place, are illegal and condemnable because they infringe on principles contained not only in the Charter of the United Nations but also in specific resolutions, such as the Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention in the Domestic Affairs of States and the Protection of Their Independence and Sovereignty [resolution 2131(XX)], the Declaration on the Strengthening of International Security [resolution 2734(XXV)], resolutions concerning the implementation of that Declaration, and the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations [resolution 2625(XXV), annex].

79. Given this situation, the Honduran delegation abstained when this draft resolution was put to the vote. None the less, we do want to reiterate how prepared we are to have the Assembly act promptly to develop a global definition of terrorism and legally condemn all its forms.

80. Mr. SORZANO (United States of America): As we approach the end of 1984, the Assembly is witnessing efforts by the Soviet delegation to produce yet another example of what George Orwell called "double-think" and "double-talk" before the year runs out. My delegation finds it hardly surprising that the Soviets should do this, in light of Orwell's description of the totalitarian practice of deliberately debasing the language, inverting the meaning of commonly accepted terms and generally accusing others of acts in which they themselves systematically engage. No better illustration of this Orwellian insight could be found than the Soviet use of the term "State terrorism" in the Assembly.

81. The use of terrorism as an instrument of State policy can be seen within two contexts: first, that of domestic usage to maintain a dictatorial régime and to prevent the free expression of the will of the people, and secondly, as an element of foreign policy, that is, the application of terror to other States as a means of achieving foreign policy goals. Our century has a tragic record of the use of the most violent and inhumane methods as instruments of State terror by fascist dictatorships. Yet, the removal of fascism from the face of Europe 40 years ago regrettably did not bring relief from the practice of State terrorism.

82. On the contrary. The ghastly record of Soviet terror continues. It has been well, and often very eloquently, presented by a host of its victims, from Nobel Prize laureates to the most humble survivors of the Gulag. This record dates from the very first days of Soviet power and is so vast that it requires large volumes of tightly printed pages only to give a general summary. Shelves of documentation now exist on the terrorism which the Soviet State has deliberately directed at peasants and workers alike, at soldiers and intellectuals, at believers and sceptics, even at loyal party members and the ranks of the secret police themselves. It has encompassed the creation of deliberate famines over large areas in order to eliminate entire social classes, the forced removal into the depths of Central Asia of entire nations which were suspected of lack of loyalty to the State, the planned annihilation of religious believers of a wide spectrum of faiths, including Orthodox Christians, Protestants, Roman Catholics, Jews, Shiite Moslems, Sunni Moslems, Buddhists and many others.

83. The breathtaking scale of the great Stalin terror was too much even for the Soviet régime to paper over completely, as is evident from the numerous revelations put before the twentieth and twenty-second Congresses of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. Yet, just as Orwell predicted, the Soviet totalitarian régime has long since decided to rewrite the history of their party and to pretend not only that the crimes and abuses never took place, but even that their own revelations of some of these crimes and abuses never took place.

84. Lest anyone here prefer to regard the record of past Soviet crimes against the peoples under its control as some kind of "aberrations on the path to developed socialism", let me note that just a few days ago the Soviet Government chose to celebrate International Human Rights Day by arresting those of its citizens who attempted to mark the occasion at the monument to Pushkin which is located right in the centre of the Soviet capital. Those courageous individuals who lost their liberty on this occasion chose an appropriate location for their demonstration. The poet whose statue marks Pushkin Square spoke valiantly all his life for personal liberty and for freedom of expression and thought. Can we now forget that the current régime in Russia has engaged in thought control and suppression of ideas and thinkers on a scale undreamed of by those Czarist officials who censored Pushkin? Perhaps the demonstrators also recalled that the main speaker at the dedication of the monument to Pushkin was Dostoyevski, a writer whose eloquence in condemning political power based only on materialism and the lust for power has yet to be equalled.

85. Can we now forget that the human and spiritual qualities that Dostoyevski extolled have been the principal targets and victims of the Soviet State and that many of Dostoyevski's writings are still unavailable to readers in his own country, being regarded by the Soviet political masters as potentially dangerous to their own grasp on unlimited power? Perhaps these demonstrators also reflected on the fact that an ancient monastery once stood on the site of their demonstration, but was destroyed as a relic of a spiritual and artistic tradition for which the men in the Kremlin had no use. Can we now forget that in recent days there have been new and intensified attacks on believers in all parts of the Soviet Union, from the Western Ukraine and the Baltic States to the Caucasus and Central Asia? Those who have disappeared behind the walls of Moscow's infamous prisons cannot forget, and neither should we.

86. Evil though the use of State terrorism within the borders of the Soviet Union has been, and continues to be, we must devote at least as much attention to the extension of terrorism as State policy far beyond those borders. I trust that we are not yet so insensitive as to have forgotten the photographs of patriots who attempted to defend their national honour and independence, armed with nothing more than bricks, against Soviet tanks. I trust that we can also be equally sensitive to the continuing evidence of the brutality aimed at freedom fighters who must daily witness the devastation of their homes and the death and maiming of their families by fiendish instruments such as bombs disguised to look like children's toys. To those who would regard these exercises of Soviet State terrorism as less than an integral part of its foreign policy, I would draw attention to the cardinal principle enunciated by Lenin on 28 February 1918, that "No Marxist could, without breaking with the foundations of Marxism and socialism generally, deny that the interests of socialism are higher than the interests of the right of nations of self-determination."

87. Lenin's theory has been put into practice with mind-numbing repetition—in the Caucasus; in Central Asia; in the Baltic States; in Moldavia; in Poland; in Finland; throughout Eastern Europe, with multiple doses in Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Poland; in Viet Nam and Cambodia; and still, with increasing ferocity, in Afghanistan.

88. The reason why the Soviet Union has resorted to force on those occasions is clear. It is determined to maintain its hegemony in Eastern Europe and as far as possible to dominate other regions on its borders. In order to do so it must suppress, where necessary through armed intervention, any attempt by the peoples of the countries in its so-called zone of influence to develop democratic institutions and to assert genuine independence. In fact one might say that if internal State terrorism fails to ensure undisputed rule by the Communist Party, international State terrorism must be employed to this end. Sometimes the first works: take the case of Poland in 1981. But sometimes things go too far and we have Hungary or Czechoslovakia or Afghanistan. Thus the intensification of internal State terrorism obviates resort to international State terrorism.

89. In conclusion, the shameless introduction by the delegation of the Soviet Union of a draft resolution on State terrorism further demonstrates George Orwell's point that totalitarian régimes seek to hide their own despotic practices by debasing the language, inverting the meaning of commonly accepted terms and accusing others of acts that they themselves systematically engage in. For that reason the United States did not vote for this exercise in multilateral cynicism.

90. Sir John THOMSON (United Kingdom): I wish to explain why my delegation abstained in the vote on the draft resolution, although we agree with much of its wording. To do this it is necessary to glance at the history of the draft resolution.

91. The Foreign Minister of the Soviet Union proposed the new agenda item in his statement in the general debate [10th meeting]. Despite considerable scepticism, we raised no objection to the inscription of the item on the agenda. That is our standard policy. However, in company with many other delegations, we had profound objections to the draft resolution that the Soviet Union proposed. It was a veiled attack on the policies of the United States of America. At the same time, it was cunningly drafted so as to avoid General Assembly disapproval of the Brezhnev Doctrine—that is, the doctrine by which the Soviet Union has sought to justify its physical intervention in the internal and external affairs of States that share its socio-economic system, but that have in some respects wandered from the path approved by the Soviet Union. Of course, the Soviet draft did not put the matter as clearly as that; the Soviet Union aimed by stealth to twist principles to mean what suited it.

92. After testing the reaction of others, the Soviet delegation evidently judged, rightly, that the majority of the General Assembly was unlikely to support its original draft. It therefore put out a revision that somewhat softened the objectionable passages. But the revised draft was still unacceptable, both for what it omitted and for what it contained. My delegation, together with a number of other like-minded delegations, therefore introduced a set of amendments. A number of non-aligned delegations took the same view and also submitted amendments. In the light of those two sets of amendments, the Soviet delegation gave way further and accepted both of the amendments proposed by the non-aligned and several of the amendments proposed by my delegation and others of like mind. The resulting second revised draft is what the First Committee voted on and what we have before us today.

93. The Soviet delegation has retreated a long way; it has, I am glad to say, accepted some excellent language. But now the resolution says something different from what the Soviet delegation meant it to say.

94. In the circumstances, the Soviet delegation ought to have withdrawn its draft resolution—that is, unless it has changed its fundamental policies. It is cynical and damaging to international relations to say one thing and do another.

95. In its first preambular paragraph the draft resolution talks about "the obligation of all States to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of any State". I emphasize the use of the word "any". How do we square this new-found probity with the events of 1956 and 1968? The first preambular paragraph also talks about "the inalienable right of all peoples to determine their own form of government and to choose their own economic, political and social system free from outside intervention, subversion, coercion and constraint of any kind whatsoever". I emphasize the words "of any kind whatsoever". What about the people of Afghanistan?

96. Paragraph 2 reads as follows:

> "Demands that all States take no actions aimed at military intervention and occupation, forcible change in or undermining of the socio-political system of States, the destabilization and overthrow of their Governments and, in particular, initiate no military action to that end under any pretext whatsoever and cease forthwith any such action already in progress;".

I emphasize "cease forthwith any such action already in progress". Again I ask: what about Afghanistan? I also ask whether the Soviet Union has ceased its attempts to undermine the socio-political system of States in Africa, in Latin America and in Asia.

97. In paragraph 1 the Assembly "Resolutely condemns policies and practices of terrorism in relations between States as a method of dealing with other States and peoples". Yet we have seen little sign of willingness on the part of the Soviet Union, in practice, to co-operate with other countries in trying to stamp out terrorism.

98. My delegation is in favour of all the passages of this resolution which I have quoted—and, indeed, some others—but in the plain and original meaning of the words used, not in the twisted meaning that the Soviet Union is trying to imply they have. Some of the statements we have heard in connection with this resolution, and with the whole subject of State terrorism, remind me of Humpty Dumpty. "When I use a word," Humpty Dumpty said in a rather scornful tone, "it means just what I choose it to mean, nothing more, nothing less". This is an attitude which strikes at the roots of the proper conduct of international relations just as surely as terrorism against diplomats.

99. If words are not used honestly they become debased. It may be said that words are only symbols, but if the words are devalued what they symbolize is also devalued. This is particularly serious when the words in question are taken from the Charter of the United Nations. We have all sworn to uphold that Charter. It is very important that the principles it enshrines are not twisted to serve particular national ends.

100. My delegation stands by the plain and original meaning of the Charter. We are in favour of the Charter and against State terrorism. That is not our problem with this resolution. Our problem with it is the wide gap between the actions of the sponsor of the resolution and its language. It would be naïve to expect that the Soviet Union is about to change its fundamental policies, and it is therefore against this element of dishonesty in saying one thing and doing another that we protest. That is the reason for our abstention.

101. The PRESIDENT: The necessary technical discussions having been completed, the Assembly will now return to the report of the First Committee on agenda item 55 [A/39/745]. The Assembly will take a decision on the draft resolution recommended by the Committee in paragraph 9 of its report. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of this draft resolution is contained in document A/39/795. The First Committee adopted this draft resolution without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/160).

102. The PRESIDENT: In the light of the statement made earlier by the Rapporteur concerning the venue of the meetings of the Preparatory Committee of the International Conference on the Relationship between Disarmament and Development, may I take it that the Assembly decides that the preferred venue for the Preparatory Committee should be Geneva, provided that this would not involve any additional expenditure for the United Nations?

It was so decided (decision 39/424).

103. The PRESIDENT: I call now on the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, who wishes to speak in exercise of the right of reply.

104. Mr. OVINNIKOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (interpretation from Russian): As long as the United States remained silent on the question of State terrorism, it behaved wisely. Evidently one does not speak of rope in the house of a hanged man. Today, however, when the General Assembly has adopted, by an overwhelming majority of its Members, a resolution against State terrorism, the United States has, in full view, committed an elementary stupidity: by expressing its irritation on this occasion the way it did, the United States quite voluntarily acknowledged that this resolution was aimed against it. We congratulate it on having accepted that fact. Now the General Assembly resolution condemning State terrorism has an unmistakable addressee: the United States of America.

105. The PRESIDENT: I wish to congratulate all delegations on the efficient way in which the work was conducted and on the expeditious disposal of a heavy agenda.

The meeting rose at 12.40 p.m.

United Nations
GENERAL ASSEMBLY
THIRTY-NINTH SESSION
Official Records

103rd PLENARY MEETING

Monday, 17 December 1984,
at 3.25 p.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

AGENDA ITEM 40

Commemoration of the Fortieth Anniversary of the United Nations in 1985: Report of the Preparatory Committee for the Fortieth Anniversary of the United Nations

1. The PRESIDENT: In section V of its report [A/39/49], the Preparatory Committee for the Fortieth Anniversary of the United Nations recommends to the General Assembly for adoption a draft resolution and a draft decision. In addition, the Assembly also has before it draft resolution A/39/L.45, and I call on the representative of India, who wishes to introduce that draft resolution.

2. Mr. KRISHNAN (India): I have the honour to address the General Assembly on behalf of all the members of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries.

3. The Movement of Non-Aligned Countries attaches the highest importance to the observance of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations. This stems from its deep and abiding commitment to the United Nations, to preserving and strengthening the Organization, and to making it fulfil more effectively the purposes and principles enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations.

4. As the former Chairman of the Movement, the late Prime Minister of India, Mrs. Indira Gandhi, stated in the General Assembly at its thirty-eighth session, "firm faith in the United Nations is central to the non-aligned" [9th meeting, para. 5]. That conviction was manifested at the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi from 7 to 12 March 1983, as indeed it has been at every earlier summit meeting. At that conference, the Heads of State or Government

> "stressed the importance of the United Nations as the most appropriate international forum for finding solutions to major world issues such as the achievement of general and complete disarmament, the realization of the new international economic order, the elimination of colonialism and racism and the promotion of human rights."[1]

5. In their "Conclusions and recommendations", the Heads of State or Government declared:

> "The non-aligned countries reaffirm their firm adherence to the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and fully recognize the need to support and strengthen the world Organization in order to make it an effective instrument for the fulfilment of its central role in the maintenance of international peace and security, in developing and strengthening co-operation among nations, in establishing equitable economic relations between States and in promoting fundamental rights and freedoms in the world."[2]

6. Further, the Heads of State or Government called upon the international community to observe 1985 as the Year of the United Nations.

7. If I have quoted at some length from the New Delhi Political Declaration, it is to illustrate the firm and continuing commitment of the non-aligned countries to the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and to the strengthening of the world Organization. In view of the importance they attach to the United Nations, the non-aligned countries are resolved to involve themselves actively in the preparation and observance of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations. On 14 September 1984, my delegation officially introduced in the Preparatory Committee for the Fortieth Anniversary of the United Nations, on behalf of the delegations of all non-aligned countries, draft resolution A/AC.222/L.1 [A/39/49, para. 38].

8. It was our view that the draft resolution reflected the common interests and concerns of the international community. We subsequently conducted extensive negotiations on the text with delegations and groups of delegations in a spirit of compromise. Thus, consistent with our firm conviction that the activities and approaches that will govern the commemoration should enjoy universal consensus and support, we agreed to make numerous adjustments, with a view to meeting the concerns and interests of all delegations.

9. The constructive approach adopted by the non-aligned countries has been recognized by one and all. Nevertheless, the consensus so ardently sought by the non-aligned on that document—that is, draft resolution A/AC.222/L.1—eluded us. The non-aligned have always shown understanding for the concerns and sensitivities of others and have always remained, and still remain, ready to co-operate. Unfortunately, however, that same spirit of understanding for our concerns and sensitivities is not always displayed by others. It was with considerable regret, therefore, that we had to abandon our efforts.

10. The draft resolution submitted by India on behalf of the non-aligned countries stays on the record as reflecting the views of those countries in regard to the commemoration of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations.

11. Subsequently, we submitted draft resolution A/AC.222/L.2, and draft decision A/AC.222/L.3, for consideration by the Preparatory Committee with a view to their recommendation for eventual adoption by the General Assembly [A/39/49, paras. 71 and 72].

12. Draft resolution A/AC.222/L.2 was adopted by consensus in the Preparatory Committee on 14 December 1984, and it is now before the General Assembly for its consideration. It refers to the theme that the non-aligned countries have proposed for the anniversary—namely, "United Nations for a better world." We believe that this theme underscores the abiding relevance and importance of the United Nations and its role in shaping a better future for humanity in a world without war. It suggests that the commemorative session of the General Assembly next year should be for a short period, culminating on 24 October 1985 and coinciding with the proclamation of the International Year of Peace. It requests the Preparatory Committee to draw up a suitable text for a final document or documents to be considered for signature and/or adoption during the commemorative session. It expresses the hope that Heads of State or Government will find it possible to participate in the commemorative session in order to enhance its significance. It recommends that 1985, the year of the anniversary, be observed as the Year of the United Nations.

13. The draft resolution is mainly procedural in nature, taking note of the programme and activities recommended by the Preparatory Committee, continuing the Committee's mandate to function until the observance of the anniversary and requesting the Secretary-General to provide the necessary facilities.

14. On 14 December 1984, the draft decision was also adopted by consensus by the Preparatory Committee, after the deletion of subparagraph (e) from the draft text that had been submitted to the Preparatory Committee. The draft decision is also, in a sense, procedural and involves certain necessary matters of detail. It makes a number of recommendations in the context of the observance of the anniversary, addressed to Governments and Member States, specialized agencies and other international organizations of the United Nations system, the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat and the international mass media. The suggestion that the commemorative activities should reflect the fact that 1985 had been designated as International Youth Year was also considered in the Preparatory Committee's report [A/39/49, para. 28]. Following consultations, the Chairman of the Preparatory Committee recorded the understanding that the commemorative activities of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations should reflect in an appropriate manner the observance in 1985 of the International Youth Year. This understanding is reflected in the report [ibid., para. 51].

15. Subparagraph (e) of the draft decision, which has since been deleted, took note of the twenty-fifth anniversary, also in 1985, of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and proposed that the events commemorating the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations should appropriately reflect that event. My delegation, on behalf of the non-aligned countries, reluctantly and with deep regret agreed to delete subparagraph (e) from the draft decision, in the interest of consensus, on the clear understanding that it retained the option to introduce, on behalf of the non-aligned countries, a draft resolution along the lines of this subparagraph for action by the General Assembly when the item came up for decision in the Assembly. I refer to paragraph 53 of the report of the Preparatory Committee, in which this matter is set out. Accordingly, the draft resolution submitted by my delegation on behalf of the non-aligned countries Members of the General Assembly is before the General Assembly for consideration.

16. The non-aligned countries are conscious that the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations will be commemorated against the backdrop of an increasingly worsening international situation, characterized by tensions and conflicts which have been aggravated by the threat or use of force, acts of aggression, intervention, interference, bloc policies and confrontation; by a deepening world economic crisis which has had particularly adverse effects on developing countries; and by the growing threat to the very survival of mankind posed by the spiralling nuclear-arms race and the increased risk of nuclear war. The non-aligned countries are convinced of the vital need to reverse these trends. We firmly believe that the United Nations system is a unique and indispensable negotiating forum for harmonizing the actions of nations in the attainment of the objectives of the Charter of the United Nations. We are convinced that the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations should be an occasion for a determined rededication by the Member States to the purposes and principles of the Charter and a reaffirmation of their commitment to give those purposes and principles full effect. It should also be an occasion to review the performance of the United Nations system over the past four decades, with a view to enhancing its role and effectiveness towards the achievement of peace, security, justice and development. We are concerned that there have been attempts to weaken the role of the United Nations in international relations.

17. The non-aligned countries stress in particular that Member States should firmly commit themselves to give full effect to the principles of respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence of States, respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, the peaceful settlement of disputes, non-interference and non-intervention in the internal affairs of States, non-use or threat of use of force, the elimination of all forms of racism and racial discrimination, the right to independence of peoples under colonial domination and foreign occupation, the maintenance of international peace and security, disarmament and particularly nuclear disarmament, the development of friendly relations among nations, and the achievement of international co-operation in resolving global problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character.

18. As I stated earlier, the year 1985 will mark the twenty-fifth anniversary of the adoption of the historic Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960. The United Nations has played an important role in its implementation, and we expect that the Organization's fortieth anniversary will reflect in an appropriate manner the observance of the twenty-fifth anniversary of this Declaration, with a view to strengthening the international commitment to the total eradication of colonialism.

19. On the occasion of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations, we should recall certain historic General Assembly resolutions: resolution 3201 (S-VI) and 3202 (S-VI), adopted on 1 May 1974 at the sixth special session, and containing the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order; resolution 3281 (XXIX) of 12 December 1974, containing the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States; and resolution 3362 (S-VII), on development and international economic co-operation, adopted on 16 September 1975 at the seventh special session. We call upon Member States to take urgent steps towards the early establishment of the new international economic order as well as the new international information order.

20. We should also take note of significant documents adopted within the United Nations system, including in particular the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations [resolution 2625 (XXV), annex], the Declaration on the Strengthening of International Security [resolution 2734 (XXV)], the Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention and Interference in the Internal Affairs of States [resolution 36/103, annex], and the Manila Declaration on the Peaceful Settlement of International Disputes [resolution 37/10, annex].

21. On the occasion of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations, we would also appeal to Member States to give urgent consideration to the ratification of or accession to those multilateral instruments that have been adopted and/or supported by the United Nations and that have not entered into force for lack of sufficient ratifications or accessions, or have entered into force but could be strengthened by additional ratifications or accessions, as well as to their effective implementation.

22. In this connection, we call, inter alia, for the acceptance, ratification and putting into effect of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.

23. A befitting observance of the forthcoming event—the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations—is an exercise of common interest and concern; needless to say, this calls for a spirit of accommodation and understanding on all sides. I would like to assure you, Sir, that the non-aligned countries, for their part, will not be found wanting in this regard.

24. Mr. McDONAGH (Ireland): I have the honour to speak on behalf of the Ten member States of the European Community.

25. The United Nations and the European Community share a common origin: the terrible suffering and destruction wrought by the Second World War. The member States of the Community and the United Nations therefore share one overriding purpose: a determination to ensure that international disputes be resolved by peaceful means and that the recurrence of war be prevented. The Ten believe that 24 October 1985, the fortieth anniversary of the entry into force of the Charter of the United Nations, should be regarded not just as a time to review the achievements of the past four decades but also as an important opportunity for the international community to look to the future. We welcome whole-heartedly the note struck by the Secretary-General in his statement at the opening meeting of the Preparatory Committee for the Fortieth Anniversary of the United Nations, when he said that the occasion should be used above all to encourage a rededication by Member States to the principles and purposes of the Charter, to promote interest in the work of the Organization and support for its efforts and to reinvigorate international co-operation in all fields of human endeavour.

26. We should recall that when the United Nations was established in 1945, its success was by no means assured. It is therefore a considerable achievement that, 40 years later, the Organization is firmly established as the premier international forum for the consideration of the world's problems, whether political, economic or social. It makes a vital contribution to the necessary dialogue between all countries of the world, be they Eastern or Western, developing or developed.

27. There are other major achievements to celebrate in the anniversary year. A further global conflict has been averted, and the United Nations has contributed significantly to the containment of regional conflicts, notably through its peace-keeping operations, in which the Ten are proud to have played a major part. The past 40 years has been a dramatic and successful period of decolonization which has led to an increase in the membership of the United Nations from 51 to 159. Moreover, the Organization and its specialized agencies have done much to tackle problems of human misery throughout the world. The efforts currently under way in Ethiopia and other African countries are but the latest examples of the effective action the Organization can take.

28. Nevertheless, Member States, in celebrating such achievements, must also ask why, despite the expressed commitment of all to the principle of international co-operation, the world continues to be plagued by regional conflicts, tensions between the super-Powers, economic and social injustices and abuses of human rights.

29. The Secretary-General, in his report to the thirty-seventh session on the work of the Organization, underlined the seriousness of the situation when he stated that "we have strayed far from the Charter in recent years".[3] He expressed concern that the possibilities of the United Nations, especially of the Security Council, as a negotiating forum for urgent international problems are not being sufficiently realized or used. The question of whether present practices in the United Nations are in all instances the best suited to promote concrete and just solutions and strengthen confidence in the Organization has been raised by the Secretary-General in his report on the work of the Organization in 1984 [see A/39/1]. The Ten would like to associate themselves with his admonition that "We should beware of blurring the separate and specific functions of the main organs and specialized agencies by treating them as interchangeable platforms for pursuing the same political aims. Issues must be dealt with primarily on their own merits and in their own context."

30. The Ten share his concern at the weakening in recent years of the multilateral approach to international questions. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ireland, speaking in the general debate earlier in this session as President-in-Office of the Council of Ministers of the European Community, underlined the "evident need for a recommitment to a multilateral approach which would draw on the energy, the imagination and the potential for co-operation of the majority of the Assembly" [see 6th meeting, para. 192].

31. In this regard, he expressed the support of the Ten for "the endeavours of the Secretary-General to increase the relevance of the Organization and to improve its functioning" [ibid., para. 112].

32. Over its 40 years the Organization has been severely tested by a series of international political and economic crises. This anniversary, which coincides with the proclamation of the International Year of Peace, provides a timely opportunity for a reassertion of States Members' commitment to multilateralism, not as a bureaucratic exercise but as an essential element in the endeavour to eliminate the horrors of war and to ensure the achievement by each human being of a life of freedom and dignity.

33. The principles underlying the approach of the Ten to international affairs have been stated before in this forum. In sum, we are committed to the purposes and principles enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations; we believe in the fundamental importance of human rights and in the need for States to respect, by their actions as well as their statements, internationally agreed human rights standards; we are committed to the rule of law and to dialogue in international relations; we recognize the right of all States to security and independence and of all peoples to the determination of their own destiny; we are committed to the promotion of the economic and social advancement of all peoples. In keeping with these principles we express the hope that the fortieth anniversary of the Charter will be marked not only by appropriate ceremony but also by real progress in the promotion and upholding of multilateralism.

34. Mr. GOLOB (Yugoslavia): This plenary meeting of the General Assembly marks the end of the first phase of the work of the Preparatory Committee for the Fortieth Anniversary of the United Nations.

35. The Committee, in our opinion, did achieve a measure of success through the adoption by consensus of the texts of a draft resolution and a draft decision that were so ably elaborated by the delegation of India and submitted by Mr. Krishnan. The delegation of Yugoslavia supports this effort by India in its entirety.

36. It is important and essential that the draft resolution before the Assembly [A/39/49, para. 71], envisages that the commemorative session of the General Assembly shall be held for a short period culminating on 24 October 1985; that the text of a final declaration will be prepared for adoption during the commemorative session; and that an invitation should be extended to heads of State or Government to participate in the commemorative session in order to enhance its significance.

37. It should be recalled here that at the recent Meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs and Heads of Delegation of the Non-Aligned Countries to the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly, held in New York from 1 to 5 October 1984, stress was laid on "the importance of strengthening the role of the United Nations in dealing with the crucial issues concerning peace, security, disarmament and development" [see A/39/560, annex, para. 137].

38. They emphasized that the United Nations, particularly the General Assembly and the Security Council, offered the best framework for the promotion of those goals. We should do our best to make reason prevail so as to leave the next generation a better future, they said. That view was reflected in the statements of almost all the participants in the general debate at this session of the Assembly.

39. The political and economic situation in the world is bleak, and even the existing fragile bases for peace are threatened. Unless the present situation starts changing, the dangers threatening the world will evade any control, and that may have unforeseeable consequences. The anniversary is going to be commemorated against the backdrop of an increasingly worsening international situation characterized by tensions and conflicts, aggravated by the threat or use of force, acts of aggression, intervention, interference, bloc policies and confrontation, domination and exploitation, a deepening world economic crisis with particularly adverse effects on developing countries and a growing threat to the very survival of mankind posed by the spiralling nuclear-arms race.

40. In an interdependent world, there is no better place where this gloomy perspective can be prevented than the United Nations. Only last week the Secretary-General delivered an inspiring statement on the nuclear-arms race that should serve as additional impetus in the preparations for the anniversary of the Organization as well.

41. The fortieth anniversary of the United Nations is an important event. It is testimony to the fact that the world Organization has justified its existence, that it is capable of adapting to changes in international relations, that its role as a forum for dialogue is indispensable for the maintenance of peace and security in the world and for the establishment of new political and economic relations based on the equality of all peoples and countries of the world.

42. The United Nations has also been and remains an indispensable factor in uniting and bringing together nations of different sizes and economic power. It is the indicator of the aspirations of the international community and the single multilateral forum for the harmonization of views on the basis of equality of all the members of the international community on all the crucial problems of today. However, the United Nations is not and should not be a forum for debate only. Rather, the United Nations should be ever more a forum for negotiations and dialogue, an instrument for progress and the strengthening of independence, sovereignty, equality and freedom.

43. Preparations for the United Nations anniversary are a unique opportunity for another effort towards the solution of present issues of peace, security and development. A political content and political character of the anniversary would best contribute to strengthening its role and seeking solutions by means of negotiations through the world Organization.

44. In the programmes that we prepare a prominent place should be given to reaffirmation and recommitment to the Charter of the United Nations. Developments in the course of the past 40 years unequivocally prove the full validity and vitality of the Charter. They also show that the achievements of the world Organization have been positive and that it is an instrument for constructive changes and progress.

45. It would be useful to recall here the contribution of the United Nations to the anti-colonial revolution, which has substantially changed the political map of the world and thus the membership of the United Nations as well. Therefore particular importance should be given to the observance of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

46. In 1985, other anniversaries will be observed, such as those of the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations [resolution 2625 (XXV), annex] and the Declaration on the Strengthening of International Security [resolution 2734 (XXV)].

47. In order to overcome the problems facing the United Nations it is necessary to comply with adopted decisions and resolutions. The implementation of declarations and accession to and respect for multilateral conventions concluded within the United Nations would enhance its role and credibility in international relations.

48. The new international economic order, the new world information and communication order, the Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention and Interference in the Internal Affairs of States [resolution 36/103, annex], as well as others, are valuable concepts and documents that are not to be relegated to the archives. Reaffirmation of the commitment of Member States to implement them is certainly needed.

49. Some Member States are increasingly turning away from their previous commitment to multilateralism and are increasingly pursuing more and more of their interests through bilateral channels. We feel the anniversary will be an opportunity for all the Member States to manifest their commitment to negotiations and to multilateralism as a form of co-operation indispensable for overcoming crises and for substantial improvement of mutual relations.

50. The observance will be successful if it is done with the support and the consensus of all Member States. However, it may be necessary to recall here that consensus is a vehicle for moving forward rather than for limiting the scope of agreements arrived at earlier. And, finally, we feel that positive political will will be needed—more of it than we have seen during the present phase of the work of the Preparatory Committee.

51. We are looking forward to working under your chairmanship, Mr. President, and we of the Yugoslav delegation are offering our full co-operation in the joint efforts to make the United Nations more effective and enhance its role in the world.

52. Mr. TROYANOVSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (interpretation from Russian): In respect of the imminent fortieth anniversary of the United Nations, quite naturally the desire arises to look at the path travelled by the Organization and at the situation in the United Nations at the present time, as well as at ways and means for enhancing its effectiveness.

53. The United Nations was established at a time when the battles of the Second World War were still going on. The great victory over fascism—the fortieth anniversary of which we will be solemnly celebrating next year—will never grow dim in the memory of mankind. That victory was dearly bought. The Soviet people lost 20 million lives, and it cost us unprecedented destruction in our history. The magnitude of the victory of the Soviet people is ever greater because they made a decisive contribution to saving mankind from the fascist yoke. That feat was achieved in the name of peace and life on this earth.

54. The lessons of the Second World War are of abiding importance. The main lesson is that we have to fight against war before it starts. Historical experience teaches us that to defend peace we need harmonized, active efforts by all peace-loving forces.

55. The Soviet Union considered the task of maintaining international peace and security to be of the essence in establishing the United Nations and formulating its Charter. We continue to hold that position today and consistently support enhancing the role of the United Nations in these matters. As stressed in connection with the visit of the Secretary-General to the Soviet Union in July of this year: "The Soviet Union will continue to bring its political weight and moral authority to bear to enhance the role of the United Nations as the primary instrument for strengthening international security, peace and co-operation among peoples of the world."

56. The question of principle is, how can we move closer to the goal of the Charter of the United Nations, namely, how can we "save succeeding generations from the scourge of war"? As experience has rightly shown, there is only one answer to this, and that is the answer provided by the Charter. Success in building a stable peace can be achieved only on the basis of the concerted actions of States against aggression, against the suppression of the freedom of peoples and in favour of strengthening the sovereignty and equality of States and reaffirming the principle of peaceful coexistence in relations between States irrespective of differences in their socio-political structures.

57. A realistic assessment of the role of the United Nations in the system of international relations enables us to state that the Organization has managed to make a positive contribution towards the resolution of acute international problems in instances when Member States demonstrated willingness to be guided by the provisions of the Charter and when they made persistent collective efforts to attain the goals of the Organization.

58. The Charter of the United Nations is a reliable basis for ensuring the peaceful life of peoples and for developing inter-State relations on the basis of the principles of peaceful coexistence. In this nuclear age, the link between ensuring international peace and security and halting the arms race is becoming ever closer. Attempts to damage the security of anyone or to seek to gain one-sided advantages over others must always be resisted. Any attempt to subvert the security of others subverts one's own security. The interests of one's own national security cannot be invoked in order to damage the security of other countries with impunity or to interfere in their internal affairs. Reliance on the use of force and on destabilizing inter-State relations carries the threat of nuclear war, with all its catastrophic consequences.

59. The only realistic prospect for strengthening international peace and security, therefore, lies in averting another world war. Alarm at the increasing threat of a nuclear war and the dangerous developments in the international situation is acutely felt by the United Nations. Suffice it to recall the declarations and resolutions adopted in recent years by the United Nations condemning nuclear war, the undertaking not to be the first to use nuclear weapons, the freezing, both quantitatively and qualitatively, of nuclear arsenals, the prevention of the militarization of outer space, the strengthening of the cardinal principle of the Charter on the non-use of force and so forth. The results of the voting on these resolutions and the attitudes taken towards them are better testimony than any words to the true position of States on the key issues of the day and indicate a universal awareness of the need to bring about a decisive improvement in this dangerous situation and make genuine progress towards peace.

60. Over the years the United Nations has, to its credit, taken a number of practical steps to curb the arms race: the prohibition of bacteriological weapons, treaties on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, the use of outer space exclusively for peaceful purposes and so on. In this field, however, the United Nations will have to do much more than it has done heretofore. The efforts and decisions of the United Nations have promoted in a tangible way the break-up of the colonial system and the emergence of some 100 States that have become full Members of the United Nations. However, it is still important today to put a definitive end to the vestiges of colonialism, apartheid and racism and to the machinations of neo-colonialism.

61. In assessing the 40 years of the work of the United Nations, it can be said that, by and large, the balance is a positive one. The Organization has made a positive contribution towards implementing the purposes and principles enshrined in the Charter. The Security Council has helped to resolve a number of acute international crises. The search for a solution to existing conflicts is the overriding task of the United Nations today.

62. With regard to the Soviet Union, in the words of the General Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet, K. U. Chernenko:

> "We favour the peaceful solution of international disputes through serious, equal, constructive negotiations. The USSR will co-operate fully with all States prepared to help to reduce international tension through practical deeds and to create an atmosphere of trust in the world—in other words, with those that truly seek not to prepare for war but, rather, to strengthen the foundations of peace. We believe that all existing machinery should be used fully to that end, including, of course, the machinery of the United Nations, which was created to maintain and strengthen peace."

63. The Soviet Union would like to see the United Nations effective and authoritative and purposefully acting to implement the goals proclaimed in its Charter. We take an optimistic view of the Organization's future; we do not have a negative attitude to it, and we reject malicious attacks on the United Nations. With regard to the draft resolution and draft decision now before the Assembly relating to preparations for the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations [A/39/49, paras. 71 and 72], the Soviet Union has no objection to their adoption. At the same time, we regret that, as a result of the position taken by one delegation, the Preparatory Committee was unable to arrive at a consensus on the draft resolution submitted by India on behalf of the non-aligned countries. The important provisions contained in that draft resolution reflect, for the most part, the key issues that all States Members of the Organization are interested in resolving. In the opinion of the Soviet delegation, those provisions should be the basis of the relevant document to be prepared for the fortieth anniversary session of the General Assembly. That document should also contain an objective analysis of the work of the Organization over the past 40 years and its positive contribution in many areas.

64. The commemoration of the fortieth anniversary of the Organization should lead to an increase in the real contribution by the United Nations to eliminating the threat of a nuclear war, curbing the arms race, improving the international climate and developing broad international co-operation. The vital tasks of the Organization must be translated into concrete action that will help to promote the implementation of the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

65. Mr. VELAZCO SAN JOSÉ (Cuba) (interpretation from Spanish): As we assess the work accomplished by the Preparatory Committee for the Fortieth Anniversary of the United Nations, we wish to put on record our thanks to India for its outstanding efforts to forge a consensus text on the basis of the draft resolution which, in its capacity as Chairman of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and on behalf of its members, it submitted to the Preparatory Committee as a basis for negotiations.

66. It is regrettable that the constructive spirit of the non-aligned countries in preparing a moderate text which did not even reflect all the fundamental concerns and the preoccupations of our Movement regarding the complex international political situation was not matched by the same constructive spirit and the necessary political will on the part of some countries so as to reach a consensus on the draft that was originally submitted by the non-aligned countries. We trust that this position will change in the course of the preparatory period remaining until the commemoration of the fortieth anniversary next year.

67. My country attaches particular importance to the commemoration of the fortieth anniversary of the Organization, since, together with the broad majority of the international community—in particular the developing countries—Cuba considers that the United Nations system constitutes an appropriate and indispensable forum to find the solutions to major world problems, as was recognized by the Heads of State or Government at the Conference held at New Delhi in March 1983.

68. That is why we note with deep concern the pressures some countries have exerted on the United Nations system and, in particular, on some of its specialized agencies, such as UNESCO, UNCTAD and UNIDO.

69. The commemoration of the fortieth anniversary of the Organization should provide a timely opportunity for strengthening support for the United Nations system and for unambiguously rejecting any attempt to discredit and weaken its important role in international relations.

70. This historic commemoration should also provide an opportunity to reaffirm the commitment of Member States fully to abide by the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations in practice.

71. This objective is all the more important in an international situation characterized by heightened tensions and conflicts due to the increasing threat or use of force, acts of aggression, intervention and interference in the internal affairs of States, a sharpening of the economic crisis in capitalism, which has particularly harmful effects on developing countries, as well as the dangers to the very survival of mankind inherent in the aggressive policy of imperialism and the dizzying acceleration of the arms race, in particular of nuclear weapons.

72. The fortieth anniversary of the Organization coincides with another date of particular importance to the international community in general and to the young States, in particular, which have swelled the ranks of the Organization after freeing themselves from the colonial yoke, in many cases after violent struggles for self-determination and independence. We are referring to the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

73. Both dates are closely interconnected because of the important role played by the United Nations and its specialized bodies, such as the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, in the struggle of peoples to eradicate the last vestiges of colonialism in all its forms.

74. Accordingly, activities to commemorate the fortieth anniversary should appropriately reflect both the gains made in the process of decolonization and the important battles that still lie ahead of us to achieve full implementation of the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

75. Our country, as a member of the Preparatory Committee for the Fortieth Anniversary of the United Nations, intends to make a contribution within the limits of its possibilities and in a constructive spirit to all of the preparatory work, in order to ensure that the observance of this important historic date will provide a real opportunity to strengthen the United Nations system and enhance its role in international relations and in the solution of the most urgent problems of mankind, such as the struggle for peace, justice and social and economic development on the basis of halting the arms race, achieving disarmament, establishing the new international economic order and a new world information and communication order and developing relations of good-neighbourliness and friendship among peoples.

76. Mr. LEWIS (Canada): Some 24 hours from now, the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly will be suspended. It is therefore not the time for elaborate and lengthy speechifying. But my country cannot let this moment pass without making a few succinct and pointed observations.

77. To put matters quite simply, Canada is both weary and impatient with those who make a fetish of impugning the worth, legitimacy and relevance of the United Nations. It happens all too frequently outside this body; it even happens, on occasion, within.

78. In Canada's view, the time has come to launch a concerted campaign to defend and to strengthen the United Nations. There is no better moment to start than in the fortieth anniversary year.

79. No one in the Assembly would deny that the United Nations, and many of its organic parts, have frailties. The litany of deficiency is well rehearsed: time and again the detractors tell us that the polarization between the super-Powers reduces the United Nations to impotence; that the rhetorical excesses are extravagant; that speeches and issues and arguments coagulate in the throes of repetition; that the institutional processes are antiquated; that the incremental changes are slow to the point of inertia.

80. To each allegation, there is, alas, some truth. There is some pardonable despair; one can understand the feelings of futility when behaviour at the United Nations turns to rancour or induces immobility. But to succumb to the allegations seems, to Canada, to miss the point on two fundamental grounds.

81. First, the expectations are pitched too high. The United Nations, with the greatest will and idealism in the world, was never meant to be a panacea. It is an institutional arrangement within which individual nations operate, and the commitment and co-operation of each of its sovereign States delimits the measure of its effectiveness.

82. Back in 1946, curiously, in the introduction to his first report on the work of the Organization, the first Secretary-General, Trygve Lie, put it well:

> "The United Nations is no stronger than the collective will of the nations that support it. Of itself it can do nothing. It is a machinery through which the nations can co-operate. It can be used and developed in the light of its activities and experience, to the untold benefit of humanity, or it can be discarded and broken."

83. That brings me directly to my second point. The United Nations has obviously not yet scaled the heights of untold benefit to humanity, nor is it yet, in any sense, discarded or broken. The reality lies somewhere in between, and the reality is impressive indeed.

84. Just take a look at this session. Whatever the inevitable frustrations of individual Member States, even at times over procedural matters such as those of last Friday, we have had a General Assembly session which galvanized itself around Ethiopia, adopted by consensus a formidable declaration on the economic crisis in Africa, achieved by consensus a potentially powerful convention on torture, accepted by consensus a resolution on international drug trafficking, and reached, as well, a consensus on outer space.

85. In other words, whatever the defects in process and substance, whether in plenary or in Committee meetings, the fact remains that this was a productive thirty-ninth session reflecting urgent human concerns, considerable vision and practical measures of response. As such, it stands as a microcosm of the continuing United Nations experience. That experience has, over the 40 years, nurtured the welfare of humankind, and that is why gratuitous, fashionable assaults on the United Nations, to diminish or to demean it, just will not do.

86. The various agencies—whether UNICEF, UNDP, WHO or UNRWA—represent, all in all, the finest expressions of human aspiration and dedication. The triumph of international peace-keeping is one of those rare reflections of sustained international sanity.

87. The prestige and influence of the office of the Secretary-General augur well for the future direction of the entire Organization. Indeed, the present incumbent has won the trust of every Member State, as well he might considering his skill and initiatives in Afghanistan, in Cyprus, in Lebanon and in the Iran-

Iraq conflict, to name but a representative few. It is not so much a solution which is required here; it is rather the inspired knack of keeping doors open, countries talking, a vital process going. These modest initiatives help to keep the world on track when all around us there is menace, alarm and hostility. If the United Nations system did not exist, it would be somehow created.

88. To be sure, that section of the Charter which speaks to the most important goal of all—international peace and security—has proved the most intractable. If human survival is the ultimate raison d'être of the United Nations—and what else could be?—then we have, admittedly, a long way to go.

89. But given all the other cumulative accomplishments, 1985 should be seen as the year when we marshall every conceivable energy to encourage the super-Powers to negotiate, to compromise and to agree. The process appears to have started. We should now heed the words of the Secretary-General, delivered so eloquently in the Assembly on 12 December [96th meeting].

90. None of this is meant to be sanguine. Canada understands just how tough and complex the issues are, and we understand equally that the United Nations is an easy target for invective and derision. But the quality of the critique is fundamentally unsound. There is more vilification than analysis, more axes to grind than hatchets to bury, and, sometimes, silence from those who fear the future or favour the status quo.

91. The fortieth anniversary is surely the occasion to turn it all around and to restore to the United Nations that central role envisaged in the Charter.

92. To do that, it will be necessary to attempt some internal reforms. They will be difficult to achieve. We shall have to approach every aspect of process, of procedure, of structure and of substance with immense caution and sensitivity. Here my delegation pays tribute again to the Secretary-General. His three annual reports, individually and collectively, provide us with clear, relevant observations on many of the problems which beset the Organization. More than that, he has offered constructive solutions. Those reports are the starting point for future work on ways and means to strengthen the role and effectiveness of the United Nations. This need not involve elaborate new structures or committees; that could even prove counter-productive. It might be best to begin with more informal contacts amongst interested Member States to identify those areas of common concern which are amenable to improvement, and then to identify improvements of real consequence.

93. In his first speech to the Economic and Social Council, Trygve Lie, if I may hark back again to the words of that first Secretary-General, said:

> "While old problems will be solved, new problems will arise. The advance of science and the whims of nature and circumstances make that certain. But we are agreed to tackle our problems as we know them with stubborn and relentless energy. We will cross the other bridges when we come to them."[4]

Now is the time to reinforce and then to cross those bridges.

94. Only the Assembly brings all of the international issues and all of the Member States together. That is its unique role. Improvements here will have a telling impact on other United Nations bodies and on the difficult issues facing us. You, Mr. President—and I say this with heartfelt appreciation—have already instituted some much-needed reforms in the Assembly. Let us continue that example. Perhaps now is the time to streamline our agenda and to eliminate routine, undebated items. Perhaps we should reallocate more items from plenary meetings to the Committees. Perhaps we can arrange to have more current, less ritualistic, debates on individual items. Perhaps—dare I say it—some repetitive items have exhausted their utility and can be dropped from the agenda. Perhaps greater use of informal contacts across regional groups would generate greater agreement.

95. The Charter begins with the oft-quoted words, "We the peoples of the United Nations". Now it is time that we, the peoples of the United Nations, gathered here in the General Assembly, reflected on our past, and, more important, tackled our future, particularly the fortieth anniversary year, with that self-same stubborn and relentless energy to which Trygve Lie referred.

96. Mr. SORZANO (United States of America): My delegation will be pleased to join in the consensus on both the draft resolution and the draft decision of the Preparatory Committee for the Fortieth Anniversary of the United Nations [A/39/49, paras. 71 and 72]. We of course look forward to the proper celebration of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations, which has already achieved so much.

97. However, we wish to express our strong reservations concerning the second draft resolution on the fortieth anniversary, contained in document A/39/L.45. That draft resolution was not adopted by consensus in the Preparatory Committee; indeed, my delegation opposed including in the draft resolution discussed in that group the operative paragraph contained therein. In that draft resolution, the General Assembly would decide that the events commemorating the fortieth anniversary of the Organization should reflect the observance of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

98. We believe that the celebration of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations should be made up of elements that all of us can support wholeheartedly. Certainly, there is no scarcity of United Nations achievements which all of us can celebrate. These certainly include, from our point of view, the achievements of the United Nations in the decolonization process. We are prepared to celebrate the achievements of that decolonization process and, indeed, look forward to and continue to work towards the full achievement of decolonization.

99. However, as the Assembly is well aware, the specific Declaration to which the draft resolution in question refers makes no mention of the principle of self-determination. For that reason we could not support it in 1960, nor do we find it possible to support that Declaration today as an integral part of the fortieth anniversary commemoration. Indeed, my delegation and others were unable to vote in favour of a draft resolution last week specifically calling for the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of that Declaration.

100. Given the fact that my delegation and others have not supported this Declaration, and in view of the fact that it is very desirable that commemoration of the fortieth anniversary should prove to be a unifying rather than a divisive occasion, we appeal to the sponsors of the draft resolution not to press it to a vote.

101. Mr. HERRERA CÁCERES (Honduras) (interpretation from Spanish): On this date, 17 December, Honduras is celebrating the thirty-ninth anniversary of its entry as a Member State to the United Nations. That important date in the history of my country fortunately coincides with the date when we are discussing in the General Assembly activities relating to the commemoration of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations. Accordingly, my delegation finds several reasons for participating in this debate on the recommendations of the Preparatory Committee for the Fortieth Anniversary of the United Nations, a Committee of which Honduras is a full member, and on the suggestions of each Member State for further marking this important event.

102. In 1985 there will be several memorable dates, as we shall be celebrating the fifteenth anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations as well as the Declaration on the Strengthening of International Security, and the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; while on 24 October 1985, the International Year of Peace will be proclaimed and will be connected with International Youth Year and the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations. Thus, this last anniversary will provide the best possible opportunity for Member States of the Organization to make a sharp and objective analysis of our achievements and the lacunae in various areas of our universal duties. We should also define specific activities to enhance those achievements or make good those lacunae, in order that the Organization may achieve better results and increase its effectiveness.

103. For Honduras, these are the hopes aroused by the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations. We believe that all the preparatory work will not be very meaningful if the occasion becomes a matter of simple protocol in which rhetoric and publicity take the place of an unequivocal expression of political will and a desire for action by all Member States in order to achieve the aims of peace, security and well-being sought by all our peoples.

104. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of my country, in his statement on 9 October before the Assembly, referred to the celebration of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations as follows:

> "We are on the eve of a great celebration. In 1985 an organization which was set up to respond to the highest ideals of mankind will celebrate its fortieth anniversary: an organization created to strengthen international peace and security, to develop the links of friendship and co-operation among States, to promote respect for the fundamental rights and freedoms of all human beings, to be the crucible in which all nations might work together to achieve their common objectives.
>
> "A great deal still remains to be done if we are to bring to perfection a legal community of States governed by an order that effectively ensures the attainment of the objectives of the United Nations: the establishment of 'an order for the promotion of peace', as envisaged by the Viennese master, constitutes 'one of the most urgent matters of our times, one on the outcome of which depends the destiny of civilization'.
> "In an era characterized by uncertainty, we are obliged to reflect on the factors that prevent us from rising above a legal order which is still primitive, in spite of the advances achieved in the past 39 years. The extremely dangerous situations confronting mankind at large make it essential that we not only speak of disarmament but also disarm; . . . that we not just speak of co-operation, but actually co-operate; that we not just talk of respect for the dignity of man, but dignify him." [26th meeting, paras. 158 to 160.]

105. In this necessary review of our conduct as States, we must not overlook the unilateral and partial interpretation that we frequently give to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations. The international obligations that flow from it cannot be distorted by being implemented on the basis of a shameful policy of blocs that distorts the goals and aims of the United Nations.

106. Hegemonic ambitions should not vitiate the principles that govern the conduct of this world Organization. The interests of the North should not prevail over those of the South. The well-being of some must not and cannot be maintained by the misery of others. The principles of law among nations should not be separated one from the other, nor should they be separated from the obligations of each State to its own people.

107. It is necessary for us to return to the source, to the original ecumenical vision that sought to design a different world. There must be a clear-cut will to enhance efficiency, impartiality and the confidence that the United Nations, as the major international organization, provides the most suitable means of protecting the interests of the community of States, thereby placing the international standard above the individual interests of any of its Members and ensuring the respect of all without any kind of discrimination in regard to political, economic and social systems.

108. The principles set forth in the Charter of the United Nations continue to provide the guidelines that the peoples of Member States of the United Nations have recommended that their respective Governments follow by harmonizing their actions in the various bodies of this forum for universal diplomacy and multilateral action. That is Honduras' understanding, and that is why we have continuously reiterated our consistent adherence to universal values and the unrestricted observance of the principles of international coexistence, solidarity and co-operation.

109. In the course of our recent statements, in particular regarding Central America, Kampuchea, the Malvinas, the critical economic situation in Africa, the International Year of Peace, Afghanistan, Namibia and Western Sahara, we have emphasized this, because we basically believe that there must be a common denominator of peace and progress which we all seek for the benefit of all our peoples, and which should prevail over current bilateral rivalries and the differing views of ideological groups.

110. We welcomed the statement made by the Secretary-General when he said:

> "It is frequently said that the Charter of the United Nations is an example of confused idealism conceived without reference to the realities of world policy. There can be no doubt that the very nobility of the concept of collective security, equal rights, world economic co-operation and the peaceful settlement of disputes has caused disappointment in many circles in view of the fact that from every angle such concepts reveal all too clearly the deficiencies inherent in unilateral and multilateral initiatives. Accordingly we have to reach the conclusion that idealism is an illusion that can confound and dilute pragmatism, which is the only solid basis for national policy. I do not think this is accurate. Any forecasts of the future that are based exclusively on international realities will lead not to improvement but rather to despair.

"Knowledge and understanding of events and circumstances are fundamental to forging solid policies. However, one unique characteristic of knowledge is that, because of its very purpose, it leads to something that transcends it: to a vision of what should be. The same thing occurs with the Charter. The principles governing international conduct provide a solid basis for overcoming the problems of war, injustice and deprivation that afflict mankind in so many regions. These principles can be incorporated in national policies. Indeed, in the years that have elapsed since the end of the Second World War and the beginning of the United Nations, these principles have promoted the achievement of felicitous results in many areas. The seriousness of current problems must not lead us to forget the outstanding achievements of that period. The progress made in the past 40 years in defining human rights and responding to mankind's legitimate aspiration to independence after the period of colonialism and the achievements in health and education reaffirm our conviction that if we bend all our efforts to supporting the principles embodied in the Charter of the United Nations they will indeed be translated into action."

111. It is clear that the United Nations, as an organization of Governments, is affected in its functioning and in the attainment of its common objectives by the persistent circumstances of unresolved crisis and economic tensions, unresolved ideological confrontations and political conflicts, and unrealized social hopes inherent in the States of which it is composed.

112. This is why each Government bears a clear responsibility in this universal centre and why each Member State has a responsibility to work to ensure that its foreign policy is increasingly in keeping with the purposes and principles of the Charter and also to show the will actively to encourage the efforts of the Organization on the basis of efficiency and impartiality, criteria that should indeed govern the activities of its various organs and organizations in seeking the common good of all mankind.

113. Such will, which is more necessary than ever in these uncertain times, must continuously be reaffirmed by the organs of the Organization. The forthcoming commemoration of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations provides an extremely propitious opportunity for us to reread the Charter and show greater political will to give effect to the principles and achieve the purposes embodied in it. We should call upon all States, without exception, to discharge the duties incumbent on them vis-à-vis other States and to respect the rights of all. Only this objective attitude toward international relations can ensure for our peoples the peace, security, justice and well-being that were the aims of our efforts to establish the international Organization.

114. We believe that the institutionalized activities carried out by all Member States within the United Nations bodies have made it possible for us to become increasingly aware of our collective role. Thus we should simplify and improve our working procedures and ensure that they are in keeping with the Charter, in order to ensure that the United Nations provides a forum where we can harmonize efforts to fulfil universal aspirations. Consequently, we must exclude anything that might lead to doubt or differences among Members because of positions of discriminatory and automatic solidarity that would indeed be a divergence from the aims that we all share.

115. The recent adoption by consensus on 3 December of the Declaration on the Critical Economic Situation in Africa [resolution 39/29, annex] is a milestone in the history of the Assembly on the historic path taken by the Organization. The solidarity with Africans thus expressed by all Governments is proof of the viability of the international understanding and co-operation that our peoples expect us to achieve on their behalf. This also strengthens our belief that the responsibilities incumbent on each body in the United Nations system should be fulfilled with commitment and unity by Member States in order to ensure the realization of the purposes and principles that are of interest to all mankind. We hope that this visionary perspective will increasingly inspire the political, juridical and administrative bodies of this Organization in their thought and action.

116. The Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations [resolution 2625 (XXV), annex], and the International Development Strategy, with its necessary complement of global negotiations on economic co-operation, provide us with basic elements that must not be lost sight of. In this connection, we should also work out standards for our activities to improve and reinforce multilateral economic and social co-operation, and instruments and modalities for the implementation of such co-operation, and we should give further thought to the role of the United Nations in this connection.

117. As we stated on 29 November in the context of the discussion on the question of Namibia [79th meeting], we believe we should work together more closely to bring about self-determination, independence, freedom and unity for the Namibian people and to ensure the territorial integrity of that country and the preservation of its natural resources. We must ensure that our direct and special responsibility regarding Namibia is fulfilled, giving it priority consideration and increasing the support which the Secretary-General deserves from all States, thereby making possible the establishment of an international climate conducive to a solution that will mean as speedy an implementation as possible of the United Nations plan for Namibia—at the latest, on the occasion of the commemoration of the anniversary of the United Nations.

118. My delegation concurs with the Secretary-General when he states that:

"The fortieth anniversary of the United Nations provides one more opportunity, not only to consider the performance of the Organization in the course of the past four decades, but also and in particular to ensure that Member States will further respect the purposes and principles of the Charter to promote interest in the endeavours of the Organization and to support its efforts and revitalize international co-operation in all areas of human activity. There can be very little doubt that the commemoration, if based on such an approach, could indeed promote the cause of international understanding."

119. On the eve of the fortieth anniversary of the end of the Second World War and the creation of the Organization, I should like to reaffirm the political will of Honduras further to merge its efforts with those of all other States who also wish to make certain that their national policies will be free from ideological interests and mental reservations, so as to ensure that we shall be able to achieve the extremely important objectives of peace and universal well-being. Accordingly, we should like to reiterate our readiness to work with persistence and interest in order to achieve the peaceful, just and honourable solution of political problems confronting States in various regions of the world. We wish to ensure security for economic and social co-operation and to support and enhance the responsibilities borne by the respective continental organizations, as well as those of the world Organization.

120. This renewed political will on the part of all Member States would enable the United Nations to ensure a better world. It could preserve coming generations from the scourge of war and provide a future in which liberty, tolerance, justice and progress would indeed encompass harmonious and civilized co-existence among all peoples of the world. In this spirit, we shall worthily bequeath to succeeding generations a destiny which would be imbued with the message that we frequently repeat at the beginning of each new year, that is to say, "Peace on earth to men of good will".

121. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now begin the voting process. The Assembly will first turn its attention to the recommendations contained in the report of the Preparatory Committee for the Fortieth Anniversary of the United Nations [A/39/49, paras. 71 and 72]. As indicated in paragraph 54 of the report, the recommendations of the Preparatory Committee would not entail any additional costs. The Committee recommends the adoption of the draft resolution contained in paragraph 71 of its report. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/161A).

122. The PRESIDENT: The Preparatory Committee also recommends the adoption of the draft decision contained in paragraph 72 of its report. May I consider that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft decision?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/425).

123. The PRESIDENT: Finally, we come to draft resolution A/39/L.45. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

124. Mr. AL-HADDAD (Democratic Yemen) (Rapporteur of the Second Committee) (interpretation from Arabic): I have the honour to submit to the General Assembly the reports of the Second Committee on all the agenda items allocated to it. The report on agenda item 80 is contained in documents A/39/790 and Add.1 to 17.

125. The report on item 82 is contained in document A/39/792.

126. The report on item 83 is contained in documents A/39/793 and Add.1.

127. Finally, the report on item 141 is contained in document A/39/652.

Pursuant to rule 66 of the rules of procedure, it was decided not to discuss the reports of the Second Committee.

128. The PRESIDENT: Statements will therefore be limited to explanations of vote. The positions of delegations regarding the various recommendations of the Second Committee have been made clear in the Committee and are reflected in the relevant summary records.

129. May I remind members that under paragraph 7 of decision 34/401, the General Assembly agreed that when the same draft resolution is considered in a main Committee and in plenary meeting, a delegation should, as far as possible, explain its vote only once, that is, either in the Committee or plenary meeting, unless that delegation's vote in plenary meeting is different from its vote in the Committee.

130. May I also remind members that, in accordance with the same decision, explanations of vote are limited to 10 minutes and should be made by delegations from their seats.

131. We turn now to part I of the report of the Second Committee on item 80 [A/39/790]. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to take note of this part of the report?

It was so decided (decision 39/426).

132. The PRESIDENT: We now turn to part II of the report of the Second Committee on item 80 (a) [A/39/790/Add.1]. In paragraph 8, the Second Committee recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of a draft resolution entitled "Review and appraisal of the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/162).

133. The PRESIDENT: In paragraph 9 of the same part of the report, the Second Committee also recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of a draft decision entitled "Report of the Secretary-General on social aspects of development". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft decision?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/427).

134. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to part III of the report of the Second Committee on item 80 (b) [A/39/790/Add.2]. The Assembly will now turn to paragraph 7. The draft resolution recommended by the Second Committee for adoption is entitled "Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States". The programme budget implications of this draft resolution are contained in the report of the Fifth Committee in document A/39/815. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

Abstaining: Australia, Austria, Finland, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden.

The draft resolution was adopted by 125 votes to 10, with 12 abstentions (resolution 39/163).[6]

135. The PRESIDENT: May I now invite members of the General Assembly to turn their attention to part VI of the report of the Second Committee on item 80 (e) [A/39/790/Add.5] In paragraph 11, the Second Committee recommends for adoption a draft resolution entitled "Report of the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/164).

136. The PRESIDENT: The Second Committee also recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the draft decision entitled "Long-term financial and institutional arrangements for the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development" contained in paragraph 12 [A/39/790/Add.5]. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of that draft decision is contained in document A/39/829. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft decision?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/428).

137. The PRESIDENT: We now turn to part VII of the report of the Second Committee on item 80 (f) [A/39/790/Add.6]. The Assembly will take a decision on the two draft resolutions contained in paragraph 15, which are recommended for adoption. Draft resolution I is entitled "Critical situation of food and agriculture in Africa". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt this draft resolution?

Draft resolution I was adopted (resolution 39/165).

138. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution II is entitled "Food and agricultural problems". May I consider that the General Assembly wishes to adopt this draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/166).

139. The PRESIDENT: I invite members of the Assembly to turn their attention next to part X of the report on item 80 (i) [A/39/790/Add.9]. The Assembly will now take action on the recommendation of the Second Committee in paragraph 21 of this part of the report. Draft resolution I is entitled "Remnants of war". A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Fiji, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Gambia, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Senegal, Spain, Sweden, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

Draft resolution I was adopted by 121 votes to none, with 24 abstentions (resolution 39/167).[6]

140. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolutions II A and B deal with the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification. Draft resolution II A is entitled "Implementation of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification" and draft resolution II B is entitled "Implementation in the Sudano-Sahelian region of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification". The Second Committee adopted draft resolutions II A and B without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do likewise?

Draft resolutions II A and B were adopted (resolutions 39/168 A and B).

141. The PRESIDENT: The Second Committee also recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the draft decision entitled "Environment", contained in paragraph 22 of part X of its report [A/39/790/Add.9]. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft decision?

It was so decided (decision 39/429).

142. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on representatives who wish to explain their position on the draft resolutions and the draft decision just adopted.

143. Ms. DANIELSEN (Norway): Under agenda item 80 (i), my delegation introduced a draft resolution on international co-operation on the environment. That draft resolution was contained in document A/C.2/39/L.24. We did so on the assumption that it would be possible during this General Assembly session to take international co-operation on the environment one step forward. The wide support for this effort was reflected in the fact that delegations from many parts of the world were willing to sponsor the text.

144. After lengthy consultations, we almost reached consensus. However, a controversial issue was introduced which diverted attention from the objective that we all shared—that is, to generate and promote international co-operation in the vital field of environmental protection.

145. During the second regular session of the Economic and Social Council, my delegation sponsored a similar draft resolution. Faced with the very same problem—namely, the introduction of an issue outside the framework of our text—we chose to withdraw it.

146. This course of action was certainly not foreseen as an outcome of the deliberations during this session of the General Assembly. However, a situation arose which made us feel impelled, together with the other sponsors, to follow the same path that we had taken during the Economic and Social Council session.

147. At this juncture, it seems more important to look to the future than to dwell on the question of distribution of blame. My delegation sincerely hopes that we shall be able to avoid repetition of this year's experience. We must join forces and work towards this end, making it possible for us next year to reach consensus on international co-operation on the environment, an issue of crucial importance to our common future.

148. Mr. GOETTELMANN (Federal Republic of Germany): This year the General Assembly has adopted only one procedural decision, which takes note of the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme on its twelfth session. The twelfth session of the Governing Council dealt with a number of important issues concerning international co-operation in the field of the environment.

149. My delegation was a sponsor of a draft resolution focused mainly on the substantive decisions of this year's session of the Governing Council and aiming at a better understanding of the important role of environmental issues in the broad context of economic and social development. Together with a great number of co-sponsors from many parts of the world, we submitted this draft resolution to the Second Committee for adoption by consensus, conscious of the international dimension of environmental problems, the importance of dialogue between developed and developing countries, and among them, and of the need to combine all efforts and undertake practical measures to protect the environment.

150. My delegation very much regrets that a possible consensus on the substantive text of draft resolution A/C.2/39/L.24/Rev.1 was made impossible by the introduction of a controversial amendment outside the framework of environmental co-operation, and that this draft resolution had to be withdrawn by the co-sponsors.

151. My delegation reiterates its concern at the increasing tendency to introduce political questions into technical draft resolutions. Questions relating to peace, security and disarmament are important. These questions, however, do not fall within the competence of the Second Committee and should be dealt with in the appropriate forums.

152. It is our sincere hope that we can avoid a repetition of this year's experience in the future and that we can maintain a genuine consensus on the very important issue of international co-operation in the field of the environment.

153. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on a point of order.

154. Mr. LAVROV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (interpretation from Russian): The representatives of Norway and the Federal Republic of Germany said that the General Assembly had not been able to adopt a draft resolution [A/C.2/39/L.24] this year on the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme, allegedly because a controversial amendment [A/C.2/39/L.55] had been submitted. I wish to say the following in order to make things clear to everyone. This "controversial" amendment was, in fact, submitted by my delegation. The "controversy" in it was that it reproduced word for word the consensus that the General Assembly had adopted last year [see resolution 38/165]. The sponsors of the draft resolution did not want to reaffirm that consensus.

155. Moreover, when the Second Committee discussed draft resolution A/C.2/39/L.118 on food and agricultural problems, those same sponsors did not want to reaffirm the consensus adopted by the World Food Council in June this year [see A/39/19, part one, para. 15].

156. That was all I wanted to say.

157. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now consider part XI of the report of the Second Committee on item 80 (j) [A/39/790/Add.10]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolutions recommended for adoption in paragraph 17. Draft resolution I is entitled "Living conditions of the Palestinian people in the occupied Palestinian territories". The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of that draft resolution is contained in document A/39/699. A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Israel, United States of America.

Abstaining: Gabon, Ivory Coast.

Draft resolution I was adopted by 143 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions (resolution 39/169).

158. The PRESIDENT: The following draft resolutions deal with human settlements. Draft resolution II A is entitled "Report of the Commission on Human Settlements" and draft resolution II B is entitled "Co-ordination of human settlements programmes within the United Nations system". May I consider that the Assembly wishes to adopt draft resolutions II A and B?

Draft resolutions II A and B were adopted (resolutions 39/170 A and B).

159. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution III is entitled "International Year of Shelter for the Homeless". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it?

Draft resolution III was adopted (resolution 39/171).

160. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to part XII of the report on item 80 (k) [A/39/790/Add.11]. The Assembly will take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "World survey on the role of women in development", contained in paragraph 6. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/172).

161. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to part XIII of the report on item 80 (l) [A/39/790/Add.12]. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to take note of this report?

It was so decided (decision 39/430).

162. The PRESIDENT: We now turn to part XIV of the report of the Second Committee on item 80 (m) [A/39/790/Add.13]. The Assembly will take a decision on the draft resolution contained in paragraph 7. The draft resolution is entitled "Implementation of the Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt this draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/173).

163. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now turn to part XV of the report on item 80 (n) [A/39/790/Add.14]. In paragraph 9, the Second Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of a draft resolution entitled "Implementation of the Substantial New Programme of Action for the 1980s for the Least Developed Countries". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/174).

164. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now consider part XVI of the report on item 80 (o) [A/39/790/Add.15]. The Assembly will turn to the draft resolution entitled "Immediate measures in favour of the developing countries", contained in paragraph 7. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/175).

165. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now turn to part XVII of the report of the Second Committee, on item 80 (p) [A/39/790/Add.16].

166. I call on the representative of Egypt on a point of order.

167. Mr. SAAD (Egypt): With regard to the draft resolution entitled "Development of the energy resources of developing countries", further consultations have taken place and there was general agreement that, in paragraph 2 of this draft resolution, the phrase starting by "taking into account the opinion of Member States expressed before the Second Committee of the General Assembly at its thirty-ninth session" should be deleted as it was unnecessary. Therefore, and on this understanding, I propose the deletion of that phrase.

168. The PRESIDENT: May I take it that the deletion is accepted by the Assembly?

It was so decided.

169. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution entitled "Development of the energy resources of developing countries" contained in paragraph 10 of part XVII of the report [A/39/790/Add.16]. The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of that draft resolution is contained in document A/39/814. The Second Committee recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of that draft resolution. May I take it, in the light of what the representative of Egypt has just said and of the decision of the General Assembly, that the Assembly wishes to adopt it?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/176).

AGENDA ITEM 82

Training and research:

(a) United Nations Institute for Training and Research:

(i) Report of the Executive Director;

(ii) Report of the Secretary-General;

(b) United Nations University: report of the Council of the United Nations University

170. The PRESIDENT: I now invite the Assembly to turn its attention to the report of the Second Committee on item 82 [A/39/792]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the recommendation on the three draft resolutions contained in paragraph 21 of the report. Draft resolution I is entitled "Long-term financing and the future role of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research". The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of that draft resolution is contained in document A/39/828. A separate recorded vote has been requested on paragraph 5 of draft resolution I.

A recorded vote was taken.

at 11.20 a.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

AGENDA ITEM 80

Development and international economic co-operation (continued):

(c) Trade and development:

(i) Report of the Trade and Development Board;

(ii) Reports of the Secretary-General;

(g) Economic and technical co-operation among developing countries: report of the Secretary-General;

(h) Restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system: report of the Secretary-General

1. The PRESIDENT: Before we take up the reports of the Second Committee, I should like to inform members that agenda item 12 and sub-item 80 (d) will be taken up as the last items this morning in order to allow for further consultations. I invite members to turn their attention to part IV of the report of the Second Committee on sub-item 80 (c) [A/39/790/Add.3]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolutions and draft decisions recommended by the Second Committee for adoption. Paragraph 41 contains six draft resolutions. Draft resolution I is entitled "Specific action related to the particular needs and problems of land-locked developing countries". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it?

Draft resolution I was adopted (resolution 39/209).

Draft resolution III was adopted by 119 votes to 21, with 1 abstention (resolution 39/211).[1]

4. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution IV is entitled "Specific measures in favour of island developing countries". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt draft resolution IV?

Draft resolution IV was adopted (resolution 39/212).

5. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution V is entitled "United Nations Conference on Conditions for Registration of Ships". The report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of that draft resolution is contained in document A/39/816. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to adopt draft resolution V?

Draft resolution V was adopted (resolution 39/213A).

6. The PRESIDENT: Next we turn to draft resolution VI, entitled "Report of the Trade and Development Board". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft resolution?

Draft resolution VI was adopted (resolution 39/214).

7. The PRESIDENT: I now invite members to turn to the three draft decisions recommended by the Second Committee for adoption in paragraph 42 of part IV of the report. Draft decision I is entitled "Protectionism and structural adjustment". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft decision?

Draft decision I was adopted (decision 39/432).

8. The PRESIDENT: Draft decision II is entitled "Preferential Trade Area for Eastern and Southern African States". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft decision?

Draft decision II was adopted (decision 39/433).

9. The PRESIDENT: Finally, draft decision III is entitled "Specific action relating to the particular needs and problems of the land-locked developing countries; status of the Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft decision?

Draft decision III was adopted (decision 39/434).

10. The PRESIDENT: I shall now call on those representatives who wish to explain their votes.

11. Mr. ABBAS (Bahrain): My delegation's preoccupation is to reaffirm the right of the island developing countries to receive adequate assistance from the competent organizations of the United Nations system as it did during the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi from 7 to 12 March 1983, and during the sixth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, held at Belgrade from 6 June to 2 July 1983. Nevertheless, we stress the need to exert timely additional efforts to implement the specific measures required to assist island developing countries in offsetting the major handicaps which retard their development process.

12. Subsequently, we participated collectively with other island developing countries in formulating the first draft of this biennial text. We then took part in the intensive informal negotiations to reach a consensus text. However, our full support for draft resolution IV does not imply that we approve of paragraph 18 of the inequitable study by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development reflected in document A/39/463, and as envisaged in paragraphs 5 and 6 of draft resolution IV, which we have just adopted.

13. Ironically, the inexact study discredits the peculiar geographical status of Bahrain as an island. In this context, we would like to place on record our reservations on paragraph 18 of the study I have mentioned.

14. In the mean time, we feel that it is our prerogative to demand that the ambiguity of this paragraph be corrected in accordance with our position, already stated in the Second Committee when this item was debated.

15. Ms. RODRIGUES (Mozambique): The delegation of Mozambique joined in the consensus on draft resolution I, because we believe that concrete and concerted action should be taken in order to enable the land-locked developing countries to face the particular problems imposed by their geographical conditions.

16. Although we abstained in the separate vote on operative paragraph 1 of the draft resolution in the Second Committee, we would like to reaffirm the commitment of the Government of the People's Republic of Mozambique in dealing with this question in the southern African region on a bilateral and subregional basis.

17. Mr. LEONARDO KAM (Panama) (interpretation from Spanish): My delegation attributes special importance to draft resolution V, which we have just adopted, because Panama has the fourth largest mercantile fleet in the world. On 20 December 1982, as will be recalled, the General Assembly adopted by consensus resolution 37/209, in which it decided to convene a conference in 1984 to consider the adoption of an international agreement concerning the conditions under which vessels should be accepted on national shipping registers.

18. Our delegation worked very hard on the text of that resolution and sponsored it. We felt that properly implemented its provisions would lay the groundwork for suitable preparations for the United Nations Conference on Conditions for Registration of Ships.

19. Regrettably, the work of the Preparatory Committee and the holding of the first part of the Conference were not in keeping with the letter and spirit of resolution 37/209. In spite of that, however, my delegation did not oppose the adoption without a vote of draft resolution V. The Conference is to meet at Geneva from 28 January to 15 February 1985. We believe that the terms of reference and the framework for the Conference are clearly defined in resolution 37/209, which is still valid and remains unchanged.

20. Accordingly, I wish to reaffirm that resolution 37/209 convened a conference to consider the adoption of an international agreement concerning the conditions under which vessels should be accepted on national shipping registers. It in no way—I stress, in no way—called for the elimination of open registers, as was tendentiously claimed by one member in the Second Committee.

21. I should like to call the attention of the General Assembly to the fact that the resolution to which I am referring—draft resolution V—endorses the resolution adopted on 3 August 1984 by the United Nations Conference on Conditions for Registration of Ships. It is appropriate to point out that in the latter resolution there is an appeal to all participating States to make every possible effort during the resumed session of the Conference to complete the preparation of the international agreement and proceed to its adoption. We believe that it is necessary that all participating States make a genuine effort to bring about understanding and avoid the kind of imposing and mechanical ways of thinking such as appear to be in the minds of certain majority groups.

22. The resolution of 3 August 1984 to which I have referred also contains a recommendation to the President of the Conference to continue consultations with Governments and other parties concerned on questions before the Conference. We believe that if these consultations proceed in good faith, taking account of the genuine interests and legitimate concerns of all parties and in a spirit of accommodation and consensus, with respect for the sovereignty and the rights of all States, this will surely benefit the work of the Conference. To proceed in any other way would only lead to failure.

23. Finally, I should like to stress that my delegation accepts the resolution because Panama is in favour of conciliation, not confrontation; of consensus, not the imposing of conditions.

24. Mr. DUN (United Kingdom): In the Second Committee there was a vote on one paragraph of draft resolution I. If it were possible at this late stage to call for a vote on that paragraph, Mr. President, I should like to do so. If not, I should like to make a statement.

25. The PRESIDENT: I would advise the representative of the United Kingdom to make his statement.

26. Mr. DUN (United Kingdom): I assume from your reply, Mr. President, that it is not possible for us to call for a separate vote on that one paragraph at this stage. I should therefore like to state that our joining the consensus on draft resolution I in no way changes my Government's well-known views concerning the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.

27. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to part VIII of the report of the Second Committee on sub-item 80 (g) [A/39/790/Add.7]. The Assembly will now take a decision on the two draft resolutions contained in paragraph 14. Draft resolution I is entitled "Co-operation between the United Nations and the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it?

Draft resolution I was adopted (resolution 39/215).

28. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution II is entitled "Activities of the United Nations system in support of economic co-operation among developing countries". May I take it that the Assembly wishes to adopt it?

Draft resolution II was adopted (resolution 39/216).

29. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now take action on the draft decision contained in paragraph 15 of part XIII of the report. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/435).

30. The PRESIDENT: We now turn to part IX of the report of the Second Committee on sub-item 80 (h) [A/39/790/Add.8]. The Assembly will take a decision on the draft resolution and draft decisions recommended therein by the Second Committee for adoption. Paragraph 9 contains the draft resolution entitled "Biennial programme of work for the Second Committee". May I consider that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/217).

31. The PRESIDENT: In paragraph 10, the Second Committee first recommends the adoption of two draft decisions. Draft decision I is entitled "Implementation of section II of the annex to General Assembly resolution 32/197 on the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system". May I take it that the General Assembly adopts that draft decision?

Draft decision I was adopted (decision 39/436).

32. The PRESIDENT: Finally, we come to draft decision II entitled "Restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt draft decision II?

Draft decision II was adopted (decision 39/437).

33. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now turn to part XVIII of the report of the Second Committee dealing with proposals submitted under no specific sub-item of item 80 [A/39/790/Add.17]. The Assembly will take a decision on the recommendations of the Second Committee. First we turn to the draft resolution in paragraph 16 which is entitled "Development and international economic co-operation . A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cape Verde, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Iraq, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia.

The draft decision is entitled "Reconvened special session of the Commission on Transnational Corporations". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/443).

60. The PRESIDENT: Next the Assembly will take a decision on the two draft decisions contained in paragraph 11 of part III of the report. [A/39/789/Add.2]. Draft decision I is entitled "Consumer protection". The Second Committee recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of this draft decision. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/444).

61. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the representative of the United States for an explanation of vote.

62. Mr. SORZANO (United States of America): It is hardly unknown that my Government has some very real misgivings over United Nations involvement in the regulation of business. We seriously question whether this is a proper role for the United Nations as envisaged in the Charter. Such regulation, we believe, can in most cases be better carried out individually by countries. Nevertheless, the United Nations has in recent years taken an increasingly active stance in this area, spurred on by a limited number of interested delegations, non-governmental organizations and others. The United States, consequently, despite its misgivings, has been called upon to play an important part in these proceedings in the United Nations.

63. In the case of the draft guidelines on consumer protection, a very considerable amount of work has been devoted to the effort culminating in draft decision I. We would like to think that our own efforts on this have been positive, balanced and helpful. We believe those of a number of others, in particular Mr. Mikael Ankers of the Swedish delegation and my good friend Mr. Shaukat Fareed of the Pakistani delegation, have been indispensable in achieving this ad referendum consensus.

64. The agreement reached is not, in our judgement, a perfect one, nor could we expect it to be. There are still some things we believe should have been included and others, of course, that would have been better omitted. For example, we think that in referring to hazards it would be far better to speak of unreasonable hazards or perhaps unreasonable risks, since all of us are regularly exposed to normal risks and hazards from which no one would expect special consumer protection. We also have very real doubts as to the need to include references to specific products in what is meant solely to be a set of general guidelines rather than a code of conduct.

65. Nevertheless we believe that, on balance, if we are to have United Nations guidelines on consumer protection, then, through the hard work and spirit of compromise shown by all, we have indeed come up with a sensible, balanced and fair document. We expect and hope to see this document given final approval at the resumed session of the General Assembly.

66. The PRESIDENT: The Second Committee recommends also that the General Assembly adopt draft decision II, entitled "Reports of the Secretary-General". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft decision?

Draft decision II was adopted (decision 39/445).

AGENDA ITEM 80

Draft resolution IV was adopted (resolution 39/234).

74. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution V is entitled "World industrial restructuring and redeployment". May I take it that the Assembly wishes to adopt it?

Draft resolution V was adopted (resolution 39/235).

75. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now turn its attention to the three draft decisions contained in paragraph 29 of part V of the Second Committee's report [A/39/790/Add.4]. Draft decision I is entitled "World industrial restructuring and redeployment". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it?

Draft decision I was adopted (decision 39/446).

76. The PRESIDENT: Draft decision II is entitled "Mobilization of financial resources for industrial development". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it?

Draft decision II was adopted (decision 39/447).

77. The PRESIDENT: Finally, we come to draft decision III, entitled "Report of the Fourth General Conference of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it?

Draft decision III was adopted (decision 39/448).

78. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Brunei Darussalam.

79. Mr. SAJI bin Mudin (Brunei Darussalam): I should like to take this opportunity to make a brief statement about the addition of Brunei Darussalam to the lists of States eligible for membership in the Industrial Development Board. I refer to draft resolution IV, which was just adopted by the General Assembly by consensus.

80. My delegation expresses its deep appreciation to Mr. Habib Kaabachi of Tunisia, Vice-Chairman of the Second Committee, for introducing that draft resolution in the Second Committee, and its thanks to all the delegations in the Second Committee and here in the General Assembly for supporting our membership on the Board. We are very delighted and very much appreciate that the draft resolution was adopted unanimously on both occasions.

The meeting rose at 1.10 p.m.

NOTES

[1] The delegations of Lesotho and Madagascar subsequently informed the Secretariat that they had intended to vote in favour of the draft resolution.

[2] The delegation of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland subsequently informed the Secretariat that it had intended to vote against the draft resolution.

[3] The delegation of Denmark subsequently informed the Secretariat that it had intended to vote against the draft resolution.

[4] The delegation of India subsequently informed the Secretariat that it had intended to vote in favour of the draft resolution.

[5] The delegation of the Ivory Coast subsequently informed the Secretariat that it had intended to abstain in the vote on the draft resolution.

United Nations
GENERAL ASSEMBLY
THIRTY-NINTH SESSION
Official Records

105th PLENARY MEETING

Tuesday, 18 December 1984, at 3.30 p.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

AGENDA ITEM 15

Elections to fill vacancies in principal organs (concluded)*

(a) Election of five non-permanent members of the Security Council

1. The PRESIDENT: As the result of the fact that the third restricted ballot held at its 77th meeting on Wednesday, 28 November 1984 was inconclusive, the Assembly will now continue the balloting for one seat which still remains to be filled in the Security Council from an African or an Asian State.

2. In accordance with established practice, there is an understanding to the effect that of the two States to be elected from Africa and Asia, one should be from Africa and one from Asia. Thailand was elected at the 33rd meeting, held on Monday, 22 October 1984. Therefore, one seat still remains to be filled by an African State.

3. I call on the representative of the Congo, who will speak in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of African States.

4. Mr. GAYAMA (Congo) (interpretation from French): I have the honour to report to the Assembly that in accordance with the two notes from the Office of the Organization of African Unity and the Permanent Mission of Madagascar, which were distributed to all delegations, the Group of African States is officially presenting the candidature of Madagascar for the non-permanent seat on the Security Council which is allocated to Africa.

5. In arriving at this single, unanimous candidate, the Group of African States was concerned, above all, with the unity of the Group and the general interests of the international community. Hence the candidature of Ethiopia, which was previously endorsed by our Group, and of Somalia were simultaneously withdrawn. We are grateful to the delegations of Ethiopia and Somalia for having acted so constructively for the sake of Africa and the international community.

6. Our appreciation goes as well to the delegations of Kenya and the Comoros, which also agreed to withdraw for the benefit of a single candidate, thereby making possible our decision to submit the candidature of Madagascar, which they too are pledged to support.

7. Accordingly, we invite the General Assembly to take account of this unanimous decision of the Group of African States which we trust will be agreed to by all delegations, thereby facilitating a final decision on this matter.

8. The PRESIDENT: As the result of the fact that the third restricted ballot, held at the 77th meeting, was inconclusive, we must now, in accordance with rule 94 of the rules of procedure, proceed to an unrestricted ballot, taking of course into account the statement of the Chairman of the Group of African States.

9. In unrestricted balloting, any Member State from among the African States may be a candidate, except for Zimbabwe, which is an outgoing member not eligible for immediate re-election, and for Burkina Faso and Egypt, which remain members of the Council in 1985.

10. Ballot papers will now be distributed. I request representatives to write the name of one State only. Ballot papers bearing more than one name will be declared invalid.

At the invitation of the President, Mr. Ouyahia (Algeria), Ms. Luostarinen (Finland), Ms. Rovirosa-Priego (Mexico), Mr. Fernandez (Philippines) and Mr. Rydzkowski (Poland) acted as tellers.

A vote was taken by secret ballot.

The meeting was suspended at 3.45 p.m. and resumed at 3.55 p.m.

11. The PRESIDENT: The result of the voting for the election of one non-permanent member of the Security Council is as follows:

Number of ballot papers:	147
Number of invalid ballots:	0
Number of valid ballots:	147
Abstentions:	11
Number of members voting:	136
Required majority:	91
Number of votes obtained:
Madagascar	126
Kenya	4
Comoros	3
Burundi	1
Mali	1
Morocco	1

Having obtained the required two-thirds majority, Madagascar was elected a non-permanent member of the Security Council for a two-year period from 1 January 1985 (decision 39/323).

12. The PRESIDENT: I congratulate Madagascar, which has been elected a non-permanent member of the Security Council and I thank the tellers for their assistance in this election.

AGENDA ITEM 118

United Nations pension system: report of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board

13. The PRESIDENT: The members of the General Assembly have before them the reports of the Fifth Committee on agenda items 12, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 116 and 118 now being considered by the Assembly.

Pursuant to rule 66 of the rules of procedure, it was decided not to discuss the reports of the Fifth Committee.

14. The PRESIDENT: The positions of delegations regarding the various recommendations of the Fifth Committee have been made clear in the Committee and are reflected in the relevant official records.

15. May I remind the members of the General Assembly that in paragraph 7 of its decision 34/401, the General Assembly decided that when the same resolution was considered in a Main Committee and in plenary meeting a delegation should, as far as possible, explain its vote only once—that is, either in the Committee or in plenary meeting, unless that delegation's vote in plenary meeting was different from its vote in the Committee. May I also remind members that, in accordance with the same decision, explanations of vote are limited to 10 minutes and should be made by delegations from their seats.

16. The General Assembly will first consider part II of the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 12, dealing with those chapters of the report of the Economic and Social Council which were allocated to the Fifth Committee. Part II of the report of the Fifth Committee is contained in Document A/39/847. The Assembly will now take a decision on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee which appears in paragraph 4 of the report in the form of a draft decision. The Fifth Committee adopted the draft decision without objection. May I take it that the Assembly also adopts that draft decision?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/449).

17. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 109 concerning the programme budget for the biennium 1984–1985. That report is contained in document A/39/839 and contains, in paragraph 67, the recommendations of the Fifth Committee in the form of four draft resolutions, I and II A, B and C.

18. I shall first call on any representatives who wish to explain their vote before the vote on any or all of the draft resolutions recommended by the Fifth Committee under this item. Representatives will also have an opportunity to explain their vote after all the votes have been taken.

19. Mr. NYGARD (United States of America): The plenary Assembly has before it the Fifth Committee's report on the programme budget for the biennium 1984–1985. Section III of draft resolution I contains the Fifth Committee's recommendation to construct new conference facilities for the Economic Commission for Africa.

20. The United States delegation does not view the proposal to spend $73.5 million for a new conference building at Addis Ababa as just one more addition to the budget. As a symbolic statement of the priorities of the United Nations, it represents a perversion of the ideals so eloquently enunciated in the Charter of the United Nations. It is a cruel rebuff to the poor, the hungry and the downtrodden who have invested their hopes and dreams in the promise of international co-operation. For the General Assembly casually to dispose of this item without consideration of its full implications would be a grave mistake.

21. Daily we see ghastly reports of the deteriorating conditions in Ethiopia. The horrors of the relief centres are beyond imagination. The international community is struggling to cope with one of the worst famines of modern times. Despite current efforts, the situation is expected to worsen in the near future. It is in these circumstances that private citizens, non-governmental organizations and Member States look to the United Nations for leadership.

22. Organizations and programmes of the United Nations system are making significant contributions towards the alleviation of the suffering. But these efforts will be diminished if the General Assembly decides to spend $73.5 million for conference facilities most delegations would privately agree exceed the needs of the Economic Commission for Africa.

23. What signal will the United Nations send to the international community by spending so lavishly on a status symbol for a country where millions are threatened with starvation? What will people contributing to relief efforts in Ethiopia think of United Nations priorities? How can Member States take the United Nations seriously when, at a session focusing on the economic crisis in Africa, the General Assembly makes its largest commitment of financial resources for a conference centre?

24. My delegation believes construction of the proposed Addis Ababa conference centre should be deferred. We do not believe the Organization should allocate limited resources to a prestige project at a time of such unprecedented human suffering. The $73.5 million the General Assembly is asked to devote to this project is an amount of money large enough, for example, to innoculate 1 million children against all major communicable diseases; to build 25,000 wells and install pumps to bring water to 12.5 million people; to feed 125,000 Ethiopian families by providing cash grants for one year; and to supply all of Chad's cereal imports for 1985. All of these more urgent needs could be met at the cost of building one state-of-the-art conference centre.

25. The United States delegation believes the General Assembly should reconsider the propriety of the Fifth Committee's recommendation and reject section III of draft resolution I. In the light of the human suffering in Africa, surely we can establish more humane priorities for the Organization.

26. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now take a decision on the recommendations contained in the report of the Fifth Committee.

27. The Assembly will first consider draft resolution I which is entitled "Questions relating to the programme budget for the biennium 1984-1985" and consists of 17 sections, I to XVII. The Fifth Committee adopted section I without objection. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

Section I of draft resolution I was adopted (resolution 39/236, section I).

28. The PRESIDENT: A separate vote has been requested on section II, entitled "Parking in the United Nations Headquarters Garage". As there is no objection to that request, the Assembly will now vote on section II. A recorded vote has been requested.

Draft resolution II C was adopted by 122 votes to 16, with 7 abstentions (resolution 39/237 C).

41. The PRESIDENT: I now invite the members of the General Assembly to turn their attention to the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 110, concerning programme planning. That report is contained in document A/39/840. The Assembly will now take a decision on the draft resolution recommended by the Fifth Committee in paragraph 13 of the report and entitled "Programme planning". It was adopted by the Fifth Committee without a vote. May I consider that the General Assembly also adopts that draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/238).

42. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to draft decision I recommended by the Fifth Committee in paragraph 14 of its report and entitled "Correction to General Assembly resolution 38/227 A". A recorded vote has been requested. Those in favour please signify; those against; those abstaining.

43. I call on the representative of the United Kingdom on a point of order.

44. Mr. MAXEY (United Kingdom): With reference to draft decision I recommended in paragraph 14 of document A/39/840, I should like to question whether it would be proper for a matter of this kind—namely the correction of what is referred to as a typographical error in an existing resolution—to be dealt with by means of a decision of a subsequent session of the General Assembly. Both the facts—that is to say, the course of events leading to the original decision of the thirty-eighth session—and the procedure now proposed to change that decision have led to a good deal of confusion in the minds of some delegations, including my own. We would, therefore, be grateful for your guidance, Mr. President.

45. The PRESIDENT: I should like to point out that resolution 38/227 A was adopted by consensus. It is an important resolution since it deals with the planning, programming and budgeting procedures. Any move designed to maintain and reinforce that consensus obviously deserves serious consideration. If I hear no objection, I shall take it that the General Assembly decides that agenda item 110 should be held open for consideration at a resumed session, after appropriate review and analysis have been completed.

It was so decided (see decision 39/456).

46. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now consider the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 111, concerning the financial emergency of the United Nations, which is contained in document A/39/841 and Corr.1. The Assembly will take a decision on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee contained in paragraph 8 of the report in the form of two draft resolutions, A and B, grouped under the general title "financial emergency of the United Nations".

47. I understand that the representative of Burkina Faso wishes to speak on a point of order. I call on him.

48. Mr. ZIDOUEMBA (Burkina Faso) (interpretation from French): This is not a point of order. My delegation would simply like to say that, had it been present when the decision on item 110 was taken, it would have been in favour of the draft resolution.

49. The PRESIDENT: The statement by the representative of Burkina Faso will be reflected in the verbatim records. I call now on the representative of Egypt on a point of order.

50. Mr. EL-SAFTY (Egypt): This is not a point of order either. I had raised my hand before the decision on agenda item 110 was taken. However, now that the decision has been taken, it is too late for me to make my point.

51. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now take a decision on the recommendation made by the Fifth Committee regarding agenda item 111. Draft resolution A, entitled "Issue of special postage stamps", was adopted by the Fifth Committee without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution A was adopted (resolution 39/239 A).

52. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution B is entitled "Financial situation of the United Nations". The Fifth Committee adopted it without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution B was adopted (resolution 39/239 B).

53. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 112, concerning the administrative and budgetary co-ordination of the United Nations with the specialized agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency, which is contained in document A/39/842. The recommendations of the Fifth Committee appear in paragraph 11 of the report in the form of two draft resolutions, I and II and in paragraph 12 in the form of a draft decision. I first put to the vote draft resolution I entitled "Impact of inflation and monetary instability on the regular budget of the United Nations". A recorded vote has been requested.

A recorded vote was taken.

54. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution II is entitled "Administrative and budgetary co-ordination of the United Nations with the specialized agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency". The Fifth Committee adopted it without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution II was adopted (resolution 39/241).

55. The PRESIDENT: Next I put before the General Assembly the draft decision entitled "Feasibility of establishing a single Administrative Tribunal". It was also adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I consider that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/450).

56. The PRESIDENT: We turn now to the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 113, concerning the Joint Inspection Unit, which is contained in document A/39/843. The General Assembly will now take a decision on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee appearing in paragraph 7 of the report in the form of a draft resolution entitled "Joint Inspection Unit". The draft resolution was adopted by the Committee without a vote. May I consider that the Assembly also wishes to adopt the draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/242).

57. The PRESIDENT: We turn next to the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 116, concerning personnel questions, which is contained in document A/39/845. The General Assembly will take a decision on the recommendations of the Fifth Committee in paragraph 20 of the report, in the form of three draft resolutions, I to III, and, in paragraph 21, in the form of a draft decision. The Assembly will first take action on draft resolution I entitled "Staff and administrative questions of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia". A recorded vote has been requested.

58. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution II, entitled "Respect for the privileges and immunities of officials of the United Nations and the specialized agencies and related organizations", was adopted by the Fifth Committee without a vote. May I consider that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution II was adopted (resolution 39/244).

59. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution III, entitled "Composition of the Secretariat", was also adopted by the Fifth Committee without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

Draft resolution III was adopted (resolution 39/245).

60. The PRESIDENT: The draft decision is entitled "Amendments to the Staff Rules". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/451).

61. The PRESIDENT: We shall now consider the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 118, concerning the United Nations Pension System, which is contained in document A/39/846. The Assembly will take a decision on the two recommendations of the Fifth Committee in paragraphs 9 and 10 of its report, in the form of a draft resolution and a draft decision, respectively.

62. The draft resolution is entitled "Report of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board". The Fifth Committee adopted it without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/246).

63. The PRESIDENT: The draft decision is entitled "Investments of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund". It was adopted by the Fifth Committee without objection. May I consider that the General Assembly wishes to adopt it also?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/452).

AGENDA ITEM 11

Report of the Security Council

64. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now turn to agenda item 11, "Report of the Security Council". I understand that the Security Council has not yet adopted its report. Pending further consultations among members of the Security Council, I propose that the General Assembly retain the item on the agenda of the thirty-ninth session. May I take it that it is the wish of the Assembly to retain this item on the agenda of the current session?

It was so decided (see decision 39/456).

65. The PRESIDENT: Members of the General Assembly will recall that chapters I, II, VIII and IX (part I, sects. A, B and P and part II, sects. A to E) of the report of the Economic and Social Council [A/39/3] were assigned to plenary meetings. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to take note of those chapters of the report?

It was so decided (decision 39/453).

AGENDA ITEM 17

Appointments to fill vacancies in subsidiary organs and other appointments (continued)*

(g) Appointment of members of the Joint Inspection Unit;

(i) Confirmation of the appointment of the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development;

(j) Appointment of the United Nations Commissioner for Namibia

66. The PRESIDENT: We now turn to agenda item 17 (g). May I invite the attention of members to documents A/39/762/Rev.1 and Add.1.

67. As a result of consultations, including consultations with the President of the Economic and Social Council and with the Secretary-General in his capacity as Chairman of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, I have drawn up the following list of candidates for appointment as members of the Joint Inspection Unit for a five-year term beginning on 1 January 1986: Mr. Enrique Ferrer Vieyra of Argentina, Mr. Alain Gourdon of France, Mr. Richard V. Hennes of the United States of America, Mr. Ivan Kojić of Yugoslavia and Mr. Kabongo Tunsala of Zaire.

68. May I take it that it is the wish of the General Assembly to appoint those candidates?

It was so decided (decision 39/305B).

69. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now turn its attention to document A/39/852, which has just been circulated, containing a note by the Secretary-General on agenda item 17 (i), relating to the confirmation of the appointment of the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development.

70. In his note the Secretary-General indicates that he has not yet reached a stage in his consultations where he can present a name for the post under consideration. He intends to continue consultations, however, in the hope of being in a position to present a name early in 1985.

71. In the interim period, the Secretary-General will appoint a senior Deputy Secretary-General of UNCTAD to act as its officer-in-charge.

72. May I take it that the Assembly takes note of the information contained in the note from the Secretary-General?

It was so decided (decision 39/324A).

73. Mr. KHALIL (Egypt): I just want to say a brief word, on behalf of the Group of 77, with respect to the decision just taken by the General Assembly. We would like to express our appreciation for the efforts of the Secretary-General to appoint a Secretary-General of UNCTAD. We understand the situation in which the Secretary-General has found himself, but the Group of 77, which for obvious reasons attaches special importance to the proper functioning of UNCTAD, would like to see that office of the head of UNCTAD filled as soon as possible.

74. The present arrangement, we understand, is inevitable, but at the same time it is obvious that such an important organ should be able to function with a head that would have all the possible and necessary requirements to enable him to function properly and satisfactorily. Therefore, we are hopeful that this very important post will be filled in the very near future, as in fact suggested in the document before us.

75. I take this opportunity also to offer special praise to Mr. Corea, who, for more than 10 years, devoted all his time and effort to the functioning of UNCTAD. In wishing him success in whatever other post he may occupy, I wish to place on record the gratitude of the Group of 77 for all he has done for UNCTAD and for the developing countries during his long tenure of service.

76. Mr. WANG Baoliu (China) (interpretation from Chinese): We have noted the Secretary-General's provisional arrangement with respect to the post of Secretary-General of UNCTAD. In his term of office as Secretary-General of UNCTAD, Mr. Corea made outstanding contributions to the promotion of international trade and development, to the safeguarding of the rights and interests of the developing countries, and to the establishment of a new international economic order. As his term of office comes to an end, I wish on behalf of the Chinese delegation to express to him our admiration and gratitude. It is our hope that the question of the post of UNCTAD Secretary-General will soon be settled satisfactorily.

77. Pending the appointment of a new UNCTAD Secretary-General, we also hope that, under the leadership of a Deputy Secretary-General, UNCTAD will move forward and exert a positive, useful influence on the international economy.

78. Mr. SKOFENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) (interpretation from Russian): Speaking on behalf of the delegations of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, the People's Republic of Bulgaria, the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, the German Democratic Republic, the Hungarian People's Republic, the Mongolian People's Republic, the Polish People's Republic, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, it is an honour for me to make the following statement.

79. In connection with the consideration of the note of the Secretary-General [A/39/852] concerning the appointment of the Secretary-General of UNCTAD, the delegations of the socialist countries for whom I am speaking regret the fact that UNCTAD will temporarily be without a proper head. We hope that that period will be as short as possible and that a candidate for the post of UNCTAD Secretary-General will soon be confirmed. UNCTAD has won the respect of a majority of Members of the United Nations for its important work in the field of trade and development. If it is to enjoy further success, UNCTAD must have an authoritative leader who enjoys the broad support of the Member States.

80. On behalf of the aforementioned socialist countries, I also take this opportunity to thank Mr. Gamani Corea, who has successfully headed UNCTAD for a number of years. I wish him good health and further success in his efforts to strengthen the principles of equality, justice and democracy in the field of international trade and development.

81. Mr. GAYAMA (Congo) (interpretation from French): On behalf of the Group of African States, I wish to say that we take note of the Secretary-General's intention to continue consultations relating to the appointment of a Secretary-General of UNCTAD. We also share his hope that appointing one of the Deputy Secretaries-General of the Conference to act as officer-in-charge will indeed be in UNCTAD'S interests. Our group attaches great importance to UNCTAD. This is a point that has just been made by the representative of Egypt, Chairman of the Group of 77.

82. At this juncture we wish to assure the Secretary-General of the Group of African States' full co-operation in whatever consultations he holds on the appointment of a new UNCTAD Secretary-General.

83. Count YORK von WARTENBURG (Federal Republic of Germany): The Group of Western European and other States has taken note of the new document and has no objection to it. Indeed, we are confident that the Secretary-General will conduct those consultations successfully.

84. Let me also take this opportunity to pay tribute to the departing Secretary-General of UNCTAD, Mr. Gamani Corea, who for more than a decade has played an important part in our work within the framework of the North-South dialogue. He has been an outstanding personality both because of his functions as head of UNCTAD and because of his personal qualifications. His name will always be associated with the major UNCTAD conferences and achievements of the past decade. As one example, I might mention the Common Fund for Commodities. It was always a pleasure to listen to him, and one had to admire his eloquence and his inspiring and sometimes unorthodox ideas. This kind of inspiration is needed, and this ability to inspire is part of the qualifications for leadership.

85. At this stage, it is for all of us to express our appreciation and gratitude to Mr. Corea for his tireless efforts to foster the dialogue and co-operation between developing and developed countries to which we all remain committed. We hope that in the future as well, the international community will have the benefit of his advice.

86. Mr. HENAR (Suriname): On behalf of the Group of Latin American States, I should like to express our great appreciation and gratitude to Mr. Corea for the efforts he has made and for the valuable work he has done in his capacity as Secretary-General of UNCTAD. Mr. Corea, whose term is nearly at an end, will leave UNCTAD at the end of this month.

87. It is regrettable that the United Nations has not yet been in a position to appoint a successor to Mr. Corea. We take note of the communication that consultations with regional groups have, unfortunately, not yet reached the stage where a nomination to this very important post can be presented. We are confident, however, that the provisional arrangement by the Secretary-General to appoint a senior Deputy Secretary-General of UNCTAD to act as officer-in-charge will be successful, and that a successor to Mr. Corea will soon be appointed.

88. May I conclude by thanking Mr. Corea once more, on behalf of the Group of Latin American States, and wishing him well and success for the future.

89. Mr. KASRAWI (Jordan) (interpretation from Arabic): On behalf of the Group of Asian States, I wish to express our deepest appreciation for the excellent services rendered by Mr. Corea, Secretary-General of UNCTAD and to extend our best wishes to him.

90. We agree with the Chairman of the Group of 77, who stressed the importance of UNCTAD's work, particularly for the developing countries, as well as the importance of providing UNCTAD with all possible services so that it may continue to function without interruption.

91. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now turn its attention to document A/39/832, containing a note by the Secretary-General on agenda item 17(j), relating to the appointment of the United Nations Commissioner for Namibia.

92. In his note, the Secretary-General proposes the extension of the appointment of Mr. Brajesh Chandra Mishra as United Nations Commissioner for Namibia for a one-year term beginning on 1 January 1985.

93. May I take it that the General Assembly approves this proposal?

It was so decided (decision 39/325).

AGENDA ITEM 25

The situation in Central America: Threats to international peace and security and peace initiatives: report of the Secretary-General (continued)*

94. The PRESIDENT: May I propose that agenda item 25, relating to the situation in Central America, be retained on the agenda of the thirty-ninth session of the Assembly?

It was so decided (see decision 39/456).

AGENDA ITEM 38

Launching of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development

95. The PRESIDENT: Members are aware that the subject of global negotiations has been before the General Assembly ever since the adoption of resolution 34/138 on 14 December 1979, five years ago. Since then, the question of global negotiations has been the subject of intensive discussions and consultations in a wide variety of forums and at various levels, including that of Heads of State and Government. Those in themselves testify to the importance Member States attach to the issue.

96. Most recently, during the thirty-eighth session of the General Assembly, there were detailed and serious consultations between the various interested parties, with the active encouragement of my predecessor, Mr. Jorge Enrique Illueca, and the able assistance of Mr. Mohamed Sahnoun of Algeria, in his capacity as a Vice-President entrusted by Mr. Illueca with the task of conducting, in his absence, informal consultations on this item.

97. Despite these strenuous efforts, members will recall that the President of the thirty-eighth session reported, on the closing day of the Assembly, 17 September 1984, that "Regrettably, it has not been possible to make further substantive progress on this occasion." [See 106th meeting, para. 16.] He then proposed, and the Assembly agreed, that the item be included in the agenda of the thirty-ninth session.

98. Since assuming office as President of the thirty-ninth session, I have given this matter considerable thought, and I have also engaged in informal consultations with various interested delegations.

99. On 23 October 1984, I requested one of our Vice-Presidents, Mr. Azraai Zain of Malaysia, to undertake on my behalf informal consultations on this agenda item with delegations. Mr. Zain has subsequently informed me of the results of those informal consultations. While I believe it is the desire of all parties to make progress, it has become clear to me that too little time has elapsed since the final rounds of consultations which were conducted by my predecessor to realistically expect any movement to have occurred on this complex but vital issue. Moreover, the last months have also been particularly busy for many delegations with other equally urgent issues.

100. In these circumstances, I should like to state the following: First, I wish to remind all Member States of the continuing validity of the concept of the commitment of the General Assembly to global negotiations as embodied in resolution 34/138, which was adopted by consensus. Secondly, I wish to address an appeal to all Member States to take stock seriously of the current situation and to renew their efforts and their commitment to co-operate in the spirit of mutual accommodation and flexibility and in the interest of the international community as a whole, so as to launch global negotiations at the earliest practicable date. I will remain available for any consultations or any initiative which Member States may wish to propose. Thirdly, I wish to propose that the item "Launching of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development" be held in abeyance in order to allow for the continuation of informal consultations. At the same time, I propose that the Assembly authorize me, in the light of developments and of such consultations, to re-convene the session at an opportune time. If I hear no objection to this proposal, it will be so decided.

It was so decided (see decision 39/456).

101. The PRESIDENT: I should like at this point to pay tribute to Mr. Zain for the efficient manner in which he carried out the consultations in spite of his other heavy responsibilities.

102. May I therefore propose that agenda item 38 be kept open, in order to allow for the continuation of informal consultations after the suspension of the session, and that the Assembly reconvene on short notice to consider any decisions or agreements that might emerge from the negotiations?

It was so decided (decision 39/454 A).

AGENDA ITEM 39

Question of equitable representation on and increase in the membership of the Security Council

103. The PRESIDENT: I understand that there is no request to consider this item at the present session. If this is the case, may I take it that the Assembly decides to include the item in the provisional agenda of the fortieth session?

It was so decided (decision 39/455).

AGENDA ITEM 41

Observance of the quincentenary of the discovery of America

104. The PRESIDENT: In this connection, I have received a request that this item be kept on the agenda of the thirty-ninth session in order to allow for further consultations. May I take it that it is the wish of the General Assembly to retain this item on the agenda of the thirty-ninth session?

It was so decided (see decision 39/456).

AGENDA ITEM 42

Question of Cyprus: report of the Secretary-General

105. The PRESIDENT: Members of the Assembly will recall that on 21 September 1984 [3rd meeting, paras. 141 and 143], the Assembly decided to include this item in the agenda of the present session but deferred a decision on the allocation of the item to an appropriate time in the future. It is my understanding that it would be desirable to leave the question of Cyprus open at the present session. May I take it that the General Assembly agrees to that understanding and decides to retain the item on the agenda of its thirty-ninth session?

It was so decided (see decision 39/456).

AGENDA ITEM 43

Implementation of the resolutions of the United Nations

106. The PRESIDENT: I have received a request to the effect that this item be retained on the agenda of the current session. May I take it that it is the wish of the Assembly to retain this item on the agenda of the thirty-ninth session?

It was so decided (see decision 39/456).

AGENDA ITEM 44

Consequences of the prolongation of the armed conflict between Iran and Iraq

107. The PRESIDENT: In this connection, I have received a request that this item be kept on the agenda of the current session. May I take it that it is the wish of the General Assembly to retain this item on the agenda of the thirty-ninth session?

It was so decided (see decision 39/456).

AGENDA ITEM 140

Celebration of the one-hundred-and-fiftieth anniversary of the emancipation of slaves in the British Empire

108. The PRESIDENT: I have received a request that this item be kept on the agenda of the thirty-ninth session in order to allow for further consultations. May I take it that it is the wish of the Assembly to retain this item on the agenda of the thirty-ninth session?

It was so decided (see decision 39/456).

AGENDA ITEM 126

Report of the Special Committee on Enhancing the Effectiveness of the Principle of Non-Use of Force in International Relations (concluded)*

109. The PRESIDENT: I should like to draw the attention of Members to document A/39/849, containing a letter from the Chairman of the Group of Latin American States relating to the membership of the Special Committee. In accordance with that communication, the following countries will withdraw from membership of the Special Committee in 1985: Argentina, Brazil and Chile. The following countries have been endorsed by the group to replace them: Nicaragua, Panama and Peru. On the basis of that communication, I have appointed Nicaragua, Panama and Peru as members of the Special Committee on Enhancing the Effectiveness of the Principle of Non-Use of Force in International Relations with effect from 1 January 1985. May I take it that the Assembly takes note of this appointment?

It was so decided (decision 39/326).

AGENDA ITEM 129

Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries (concluded)*

110. The PRESIDENT: I draw the attention of representatives to documents A/39/850 and A/39/851 from the Chairman of the Group of African States and the Chairman of the Group of Latin American States, respectively, relating to the membership of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries.

111. In accordance with document A/39/850, the Group of African States has endorsed Nigeria to replace Benin, which has decided to withdraw from membership of the Ad Hoc Committee in 1985. In accordance with the communication contained in document A/39/851, Guyana will also withdraw from membership of the Ad Hoc Committee in 1985, and Haiti has been endorsed by the Group of Latin American States to replace it.

112. On the basis of those communications, I have appointed Haiti and Nigeria as members of the Ad Hoc Committee, with effect from 1 January 1985. May I take it that the Assembly takes note of this appointment?

It was so decided (decision 39/327).

AGENDA ITEM 55

Relationship between disarmament and development: report of the Disarmament Commission (concluded)

113. The PRESIDENT: The next pending appointment refers to agenda item 55. Under this item, the General Assembly adopted resolution 39/160.

114. In paragraph 3 of that resolution, the Assembly decided to set up a Preparatory Committee for the International Conference on the Relationship between Disarmament and Development, composed of 54 members.

115. May I take it that it is the wish of the Assembly to entrust its President with the task of appointing the members of the Committee?

It was so decided.

AGENDA ITEM 69

Implementation of the collective security provisions of the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Implementation of the Collective Security Provisions of the Charter of the United Nations (concluded)

116. The PRESIDENT: Next we come to appointments relating to agenda item 69. Under this item the General Assembly adopted resolution 39/158.

117. In paragraph 2 of that resolution, the President was requested, as a matter of urgency, to undertake consultations with the regional groups to appoint 54 Member States, on the basis of equitable geographical representation and including the Permanent Members of the Security Council, for membership of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Implementation of the Collective Security Provisions of the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security.

118. In compliance with that request, I shall proceed with the necessary consultations and announce the appointments as soon as possible.

*Resumed from the 99th meeting.

Resumed from the 102nd meeting.

AGENDA ITEM 31

Policies of Apartheid of the Government of South Africa (concluded):*

(a) Report of the Special Committee against Apartheid;

(b) Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against Apartheid in Sports;

(c) Report of the Secretary-General

119. The PRESIDENT: In connection with agenda item 31, I have been informed by two delegations of their desire to become members of the Special Committee against Apartheid.

120. I remind members that in its resolution 34/93 R of 17 December 1979, the General Assembly requested "the President of the General Assembly, in consultation with the regional groups, to expand the membership of the Special Committee, bearing in mind the principle of equitable geographical distribution".

121. Taking into account this provision, it will be necessary to hold further consultations before the Assembly takes a decision on this subject.

122. May I take it that it is the intention of the Assembly to entrust the President with pursuing this matter in the light of the provision of General Assembly resolution 34/93 R which I have just quoted?

It was so decided.

AGENDA ITEM 18

Implementation of the Declaration of the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (concluded):

(a) Report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples;

(b) Reports of the Secretary-General

123. Mr. LOHIA (Papua New Guinea): As you know, Mr. President, Papua New Guinea's application for membership of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples has been before the Assembly since the beginning of the session and has been on the agenda for some time.

124. Since there is apparently no objection on the part of any delegation here to our becoming a member, may I be advised when the decision on our application will be taken?

125. The PRESIDENT: I have received several communications from Member States, including Papua New Guinea, expressing the desire to be appointed members of the Special Committee.

126. As it will be necessary to proceed to hold further consultations on this matter, may I consider that it is also the wish of the Assembly to entrust the President with this task?

It was so decided.

127. The PRESIDENT: I have taken note of the statement of the representative of Papua New Guinea, and I assure him that I shall actively continue consulting the regional groups, with a view to making an appointment as soon as possible. I believe that he will understand, in a spirit of co-operation, the problem that I face at present.

The meeting was suspended at 5:30 p.m. and resumed at 5:45 p.m.

AGENDA ITEM 115

Scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of the United Nations: report of the Committee on Contributions (continued)

128. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now consider part I of the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 115, concerning the scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of the United Nations. Part I of the report is contained in document A/39/844.

129. The recommendation of the Fifth Committee appears in paragraph 17 of the report in the form of a draft resolution entitled "Scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of the United Nations".

130. The Assembly will first take action on the draft resolution. The Fifth Committee adopted it without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/247).

131. The PRESIDENT: I now wish to draw the attention of the Assembly to paragraph 15 of the report of the Fifth Committee. The Committee decided to recommend postponement of further consideration of this agenda item to the resumed session of the General Assembly. May I take it therefore that the General Assembly wishes to retain this item on the agenda of the thirty-ninth session?

It was so decided (see decision 39/456).

Programme of work

132. The PRESIDENT: In the light of the action already taken at its 104th meeting, as well as action taken at the present meeting, the General Assembly has decided to resume its thirty-ninth session at a date to be announced, for the sole purpose of considering the following agenda items: item 11, "Report of the Security Council"; item 12, "Report of the Economic and Social Council" (draft resolution on consumer protection); item 17 (i), "Confirmation of the appointment of the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development"; item 25, "The situation in Central America: threats to international peace and security and peace initiatives"; item 38, "Launching of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development"; item 41, "Observance of the quincentenary of the discovery of America"; item 42, "Question of Cyprus"; item 43, "Implementation of the resolutions of the United Nations"; item 44, "Consequences of the prolongation of the armed conflict between Iran and Iraq"; item 81 (j), "Liquidation of the United Nations Emergency Operation Trust Fund and allocation of the remaining balance"; item 110, "Programme planning"; item 115, "Scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of the United Nations"; and item 140, "Celebration of the one-hundred-and-fiftieth anniversary of the emancipation of slaves in the British Empire" [decision 39/456]. With those exceptions, therefore, we have concluded our consideration of all the items on the agenda of the thirty-ninth session.

Statement by the President

133. The PRESIDENT: Three months ago, on 18 September [1st meeting], when I assumed the responsibility of presiding over the work of the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly, I suggested that what was required at that critical juncture was a time to pause, to reflect deeply and to re-evaluate the direction in which we ought to move if the Organization was to regain its credibility and full acceptance. I observed also that the effort to build this structure of peace required our collective commitment and sustained support.

134. Although, as we have just decided, a few outstanding issues on our agenda will be taken up at a later date, we should ask ourselves today to what extent we have enhanced the credibility of the United Nations.

135. Each of us in this Hall will assess the work of the session on the basis of our respective national policies and perceptions of the Organization, as well as from the perspective of failures and successes. However, the correct yardstick of any objective assessment should be based on the Charter of the United Nations itself. We should therefore ask ourselves whether in terms of the Charter we have achieved any of the hopes and aspirations of the peoples of the world, whom, after all, we represent.

136. In the course of this session of the General Assembly we have witnessed significant changes and developments, both internationally and within these walls. As we opened the session, we all expressed concern regarding the relations that existed between the two super-Powers. It was pertinent that Member States, expressing the yearnings of the peoples of the world, should appeal to the two super-Powers to resume dialogue and pursue negotiations with a view to halting the development, improvement and stockpiling of nuclear weapons and their delivery systems.

137. I am gratified that the initial steps in responding to this universal appeal were taken in this building. Since then, we have witnessed efforts being made to lift the dark clouds that have hung over relations between the two super-Powers. While it may be premature to determine the outcome of this trend, we can all express the fervent hope that the coming year, the fortieth anniversary of the Organization, will be marked as a year in which a major breakthrough was made in developing effective communication between the two super-Powers.

138. I am sure that we are all encouraged by the decision of the United States and the Soviet Union to resume dialogue on arms control and disarmament at the Foreign Ministers' level at Geneva early in the New Year. Even though we are all aware of the obstacles in any effort to tackle strategic arms limitation and total nuclear disarmament, we hope that some progress will be made at these meetings. Even if the achievement of a framework of understanding to resume serious negotiations on the limitation, freezing and control of nuclear weapons should elude us, we may, none the less, derive some satisfaction if the super-Powers can at least maintain dialogue and begin the process of restoring the spirit of détente which in the past contributed to an atmosphere of relaxation of international tension.

139. The present session of the Assembly adopted a record number of resolutions on disarmament. This underlines the continuing concern of the international community over the escalating arms race and the threat it poses to mankind. In this connection, I am most grateful to the Secretary-General for the important and timely statement he made to the Assembly on 12 December on the question of disarmament [97th meeting, paras. 292 to 307]. I share the views he expressed in that statement and join him in his appeal to the super-Powers to undertake urgent measures with a view to promoting agreements on all aspects of disarmament.

140. A new spirit seems to have prevailed at this session of the General Assembly. I know all members have observed that delegations have shown more readiness to accommodate and harmonize their views with others taking divergent positions. This is as it should be if we are to strengthen the capacity of the Organization to tackle the many urgent issues of our time. There has unquestionably been a determined effort to search for common ground and a convergence of views.

141. I dare to draw that conclusion in spite of the unfortunate developments of the last few days over certain issues. Unless we strive to maintain proper balance, we run the risk of allowing that occurrence to cloud our perspective of the general sweep of events during the present session. Indeed, I would be remiss in carrying out my responsibility as President of the Assembly if I failed to remind all delegations that it is in the nature of parliamentary diplomacy that this or that Government may find it difficult at times to secure majority support for its own point of view. In this context, it is of the utmost importance that we turn away from the easy temptation to condemn, disparage or minimize the efficacy of the Assembly when we are unable to prevail.

142. As is the case for most truly deliberative bodies, whether here, in the Assembly, or in national legislatures, parties and Governments have often employed parliamentary strategies and tactics to secure their particular goals. Obviously such practices, particularly when they succeed, appear disconcerting to those whose aims have been frustrated by them. But we must maintain some balance and proportion in that perception, realizing that none of us, in the past 39 years of the existence of the United Nations, has been blameless regarding the use of the rules of procedure to maximize support. Perhaps the time has come when we should exercise maximum restraint in viewing our voting proceedings in terms of a diplomatic or political scorecard. In this context, it would clearly be advisable to develop methods for moving away from postures where voting in the Assembly is seen in terms of gaining or losing. Such postures are not helpful, and more often than not they are counter-productive.

143. While certain decisions may not have been comfortable to this or that Government, we all must have gained some satisfaction from the constructive approach taken by the General Assembly in at least two broad areas. Despite the wide divergence of views on some key points, the Assembly was able to adopt by consensus the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. This new Convention is yet another symbol of faith in the dignity and worth of the human person. We have, in that document, realized the dreams of many of our fellow human beings in various parts of the world where torture is practiced.

144. Equally gratifying is the painstaking manner in which Member States were able to reach a consensus on the critical economic situation in Africa. By dint of perseverance, compromise and flexibility, an agreed position was reached. The political processes which culminated in the adoption by consensus of the Declaration on the Critical Economic Situation in Africa testified to the validity of interdependence and to the ability of the United Nations to provide prescriptions for many of the problems which confront the nations of the world.

145. Regrettably, we have been unable to employ that same strength, that same unifying element of multilateral diplomacy, for the purpose of launching the long overdue global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development. Despite the intensive and detailed exploratory process which had been successfully concluded earlier in the year and which had been characterized by an atmosphere of mutual understanding and goodwill, no substantive progress has been possible since then.

146. Yet I do not consider this a total failure, nor would I place it in the debit column of the bookkeeping exercise of this thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly. On the contrary, I see it as an opportunity to renew our efforts and our commitment in the spirit of accommodation and flexibility. Indeed, as a result of the adoption of the Declaration on the Critical Economic Situation in Africa, a new momentum in multilateralism has been created, one which, I hope, will in the not too distant future take us over the last hurdle which has stood in the way and has delayed the launching of global negotiations.

147. In this context, it is pertinent to recall the long and often stormy voyage which eventually took us to a successful conclusion of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. By 10 December 1984, that Convention had received 159 signatures, including those of the members of the European Community. The way has thus been paved for a more rational exploration and exploitation of the resources of the international sea-bed area for the benefit of all mankind.

148. Encouraging developments on the international scene as well as at the United Nations have, regrettably, been accompanied by other, disappointing and frustrating, events. First and foremost, we must all deplore the increase in violence and terrorism which have plagued the international community in recent months. Recent hijackings and the killing of diplomats—and, in one case, of an international civil servant—should prod Governments to take concerted action with a view to bringing an end to this terrible crime of terrorism. Here again, I wholeheartedly support the statement by the Secretary-General on this matter.

149. In my statement at the opening of the session, I asked whether it was not within our capacity to find just and lasting solutions to regional conflicts such as those in Afghanistan, Kampuchea, Central America, southern Africa and the Middle East. The decisions which we have since taken on those issues confirm once again that we are indeed capable of at least providing a framework or formula for resolving the conflicts. To the extent that these problems remain unresolved, we have had no choice but to reiterate virtually all the recommendations which we had made in previous sessions, recommendations concerning, among other things, the withdrawal of troops, the recognition of the rights of States and peoples, and the acceptance and implementation of broadly-based peace initiatives and plans.

150. In the context of the Middle East, the search for peace remains an essential responsibility of the United Nations. In the absence of a comprehensive and durable solution, this session of the General Assembly had no alternative but to review both the situation in the Middle East and the question of Palestine. That is why the Assembly reiterated once again that the question of Palestine is still at the core of the Middle East problem, and that a just and lasting solution should, above all, guarantee the exercise by the Palestinian people of their inalienable right to self-determination and nationhood.

151. I am conscious that the call made by the Organization for the convening of an international conference on the Middle East has not yet obtained the support of some of the parties concerned which would make it possible. In any case, I hope that all concerned will redouble their efforts to bring about a convergence of views on this matter.

152. As far as Namibia is concerned, we have not witnessed during this session any advance towards the independence of that Territory. On the contrary, we have seen in recent weeks the now familiar pattern of tempting prospects and a final let-down. We have long been led to believe that independence for Namibia was around the corner, but the continued insistence by South Africa on linking Namibia's independence to the withdrawal of Cuban forces from Angola shows clearly that we are a long way from the cherished goal of Namibia's freedom. It was, therefore, necessary and proper for the Assembly to reiterate its strong position that Namibia should be free and genuinely independent, in accordance with Security Council resolution 435 (1978).

153. In relation to apartheid, the Assembly conveyed to South Africa once again the international community's abhorrence of the inhuman policy of apartheid. The Assembly's message was loud and clear, that apartheid is an evil and inhuman system that must be eradicated, and that the Organization will not remain silent until racial discrimination and segregation in all their forms and manifestations are eliminated.

154. The rising tide of protests both inside and outside South Africa is a clear manifestation of the response of the oppressed people of South Africa and of the international community to the alarming increase in repression by the minority régime of South Africa against the black majority of its citizens. Perhaps it is the revulsion that peoples of the world express against apartheid that will begin to convince those Governments which are at present reluctant to join the growing majority to take effective measures against this evil system.

155. I am certain that we are all cautiously optimistic about the prospect of a lasting solution of the Cyprus problem, which has been on our agenda for the last 20 years. The Secretary-General in his modesty has not claimed a diplomatic breakthrough, but those who have followed with keen interest his tireless efforts in carrying out his good offices will not fail to recognize that he has provided an important framework that may lead to a mutually acceptable agreement on the Cyprus problem.

156. At this stage of the work of the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly, I am fully aware that I owe you all a debt of profound gratitude. In the conduct of the proceedings of the Assembly you have demonstrated unfailing courtesy and understanding. Without your co-operation and willingness to accommodate one another, developments would have been much more difficult. I therefore wish to express my deep appreciation of the manner in which you have enabled the Assembly to go through its very long agenda.

157. This, the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly, in spite of all its unresolved and unfinished business, has fulfilled some of the hopes of the peoples of the world. My message as President of the Assembly is still one of hope. Why should we slide back? Is it not better and safer to put our hope and trust in the United Nations than in the machines of war and mass destruction? We still have a choice.

158. Let me take this opportunity to express my thanks to all those who have been responsible for what we have been able to accomplish thus far: first to you, Mr. Secretary-General, and to your team of dedicated Secretariat staff, including of course my closest associate in the conduct of the Assembly, the Under-Secretary-General for Political and General Assembly Affairs, Mr. William Buffum, his staff, the interpreters and translators, editors, messengers, conference and press officers, and others. I am most grateful to them all for their invaluable contributions to the work of the Assembly.

159. I wish also to commend the Vice-Presidents of the Assembly, the Chairmen, Vice-Chairmen and Rapporteurs of the various main Committees, and of course the Chairmen of the regional groups, who have facilitated the smooth running of the session thus far.

160. As I stated on another occasion, everyone who is involved in the work of the United Nations in one capacity or another is a peace-maker.

161. I wish you all a joyous and peaceful New Year.

Suspension of the session

162. The PRESIDENT: I hereby declare the thirty-ninth session suspended.

The meeting rose at 6.15 p.m.

United Nations
GENERAL ASSEMBLY
THIRTY-NINTH SESSION
Official Records

106th PLENARY MEETING

Tuesday, 9 April 1985,
at 3.30 p.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

Resumption of the session

1. The PRESIDENT: I declare the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly resumed in accordance with General Assembly decision 39/456 of 18 December 1984.

Tribute to the memory of Mr. Konstantin Ustinovich Chernenko, President of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and General Secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, and of Mr. Tom Adams, Prime Minister of Barbados

2. The PRESIDENT: It is my sad duty to recall to the General Assembly the deaths of Mr. Konstantin Ustinovich Chernenko, President of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and General Secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, and of Mr. Tom Adams, Prime Minister of Barbados, which occurred since the suspension of the thirty-ninth session of the Assembly on 18 December 1984.

3. I invite representatives to stand and observe a minute of silence in tribute to their memory.

The members of the Assembly observed a minute of silence.

AGENDA ITEM 115

Scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of the United Nations: report of the Committee on Contributions (continued)

4. The PRESIDENT: I invite the attention of the General Assembly to document A/39/883, which contains a letter addressed to me by the Secretary-General informing the Assembly that 13 Member States are in arrears in the payment of their financial contributions to the United Nations within the terms of Article 19 of the Charter.

5. I should like to remind delegations that, under Article 19 of the Charter,

> "A Member of the United Nations which is in arrears in the payment of its financial contributions to the Organization shall have no vote in the General Assembly if the amount of its arrears equals or exceeds the amount of the contributions due from it for the preceding two full years."

May I consider that the General Assembly duly takes note of that information?

It was so decided.

AGENDA ITEM 11

Report of the Security Council (concluded)

6. The PRESIDENT: May I consider that the General Assembly takes note of the report of the Security Council [A/39/2]?

It was so decided (decision 39/457).

AGENDA ITEM 12

Report of the Economic and Social Council (continued):*

(a) Report of the Council (chapters I, II, III (part I, sections D, F and G and part II, sections A to C and E to G), IV, V (sections A to C), VIII and IX (part I, sections D, E, J to N and Q));

(b) Reports of the Secretary-General

7. The PRESIDENT: Members will recall that in its decision 39/444, entitled "Consumer protection", the General Assembly decided to take note of the consensus reached, on an ad referendum basis, on a set of guidelines for consumer protection, and to consider the draft resolution annexed to that decision for adoption at a resumed session in 1985. May I take it that the Assembly now wishes to adopt that draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/248).

8. The PRESIDENT: I call now on delegations wishing to explain their position.

9. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): The consensus agreement on the consumer guidelines marks the end of a long road. This is an agreement that many thought impossible when we first began the journey, and there were points along the way when there was indeed real cause to doubt that a consensus text was possible. But perseverance and good will have prevailed.

10. My Government still has reservations, however, about both the concept and the specifics of these consumer guidelines. This should come as no surprise to anyone. We made this quite clear in December of last year at the time we agreed to their adoption on an ad referendum basis.

---

11. Since then we have subjected the guidelines to an arduous examination, both within our Government and with representative groups of varying interests from many areas of American society. I can say in all sincerity that virtually no one who has studied these guidelines is overly pleased, but the overwhelming view seems to be that they represent a reasonable compromise and are therefore acceptable. At the same time, there is a strong feeling, on the part of my Government and a large majority of those interested groups which have followed this exercise and given us their views, that these guidelines represent the last step in this long process, and that they can indeed serve adequately to be what they are supposed to be, namely, guidelines for assisting countries, particularly developing countries, in their efforts to protect their consumers. Thus, I believe it is entirely fair to say that the work of the United Nations in this area is now concluded.

12. As we mentioned briefly last December, there are a number of things in these guidelines which continue to cause us problems and which we believe detract from their quality and potential usefulness. I should like to spell out here those areas where we maintain reservations, though not sufficient reservations to prevent our joining the consensus.

13. First, we would have very strongly preferred to see the guidelines speak throughout about unreasonable risks or hazards, and we interpret the risks or hazards mentioned in the guidelines to be only those that are unreasonable. We all regularly accept routine risk wherever we are, whether in our homes, at work or travelling from one place to another. Consumer protection efforts cannot be expected to deal with every conceivable risk we face, but rather only with those that are unreasonable. We believe this to be a most important point.

14. Secondly, we are not happy to see references in the document to specific products or industries. To single out a few, even such important ones as those mentioned, is to distort the picture. Many other product areas, too numerous to mention, might logically have been included. It would have been fairer and more balanced to omit mention of any specific products or industries, particularly when we consider that the relative importance of any product varies from country to country.

15. Thirdly, we believe the guidelines remain biased towards government intervention in the marketplace. We believe that self-regulatory mechanisms by business and the forces of free and competitive markets will generally prove to be the most effective means of protecting consumers and advancing their interests.

16. Fourthly, while the original language has been vastly improved, it is still possible that the guidelines might be used to justify protectionist measures or discrimination against foreign investors. This would be unfortunate and damaging to much-needed efforts to expand international trade. It is surely not what the guidelines are designed to do. All countries should take pains to ensure that the guidelines are not misused for protectionist purposes.

17. Finally, we remain dubious that the United Nations has a truly useful role to play in this and other similar efforts in the regulatory area. To join in the negotiations in the first place was a difficult decision for us. We believe that there are better ways of achieving the goals sought here and better things on which the United Nations should expend its limited resources and time. It is our view that the free flow of trade and investment offers the best means of meeting the interests of consumers. We have seen all too often the pernicious effects of excessive government controls and intervention in the marketplace. The principal beneficiaries of such regulation and control are all too often the regulators and controllers.

18. But, when all is said and done, we have, despite these many concerns, determined that the guidelines are an acceptable conclusion to our efforts, and that they do what they were meant to do—namely, offer useful guidance to countries in their own efforts to develop reasonable and useful programmes in consumer protection, appropriate to their particular circumstances.

19. Ms. ERIKSSON (Sweden): Sweden has always attached great importance to questions regarding consumer affairs. It was therefore with particular satisfaction that we joined other delegations in adopting by consensus the draft resolution annexed to decision 39/444.

20. The consumer guidelines approved today are the result of many years of hard work by delegations, government experts and the Secretariat. At the beginning of the thirty-ninth session the outlook for a consensus solution still seemed bleak. It is a tribute to the perseverance and the negotiating skills of the delegations most immediately concerned—we are particularly grateful to the representatives of Pakistan and the United States—that we could reach a basic agreement on the guidelines in December. Since then the internal process of approval within the United States has been concluded and it has thus been possible to reach the final step in approving the guidelines.

21. In my delegation's view, this resolution should be seen as one of the major accomplishments of the thirty-ninth session in the economic field. As they are followed up by action at national levels, the guidelines will in a very concrete way be of direct benefit to millions of consumers all over the world in their everyday life.

22. Mr. PASHKEVICH (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) (interpretation from Russian): In the Second Committee, on 14 December last year, the delegations of the People's Republic of Bulgaria, the Hungarian People's Republic, the German Democratic Republic, the Mongolian People's Republic, the Polish People's Republic, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic and the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic made a joint statement on taking note of the achievement of consensus, on an ad referendum basis, on the draft resolution on consumer protection. Now our delegations consider it necessary to reaffirm their position of principle on the question of consumer protection, set forth in particular in the replies of our countries to the questionnaire sent by the Secretary-General.

23. We believe that the interrelationship between consumers and manufacturers of goods and services is an internal matter for States and should be resolved at the national level. This question becomes international in character only when it comes to matters of international trade in the context of protecting the interests of developing countries as collective importers and consumers of goods and services. The work of the United Nations in this field is justified only if and when it promotes the defence and protection of the interests of the developing countries in the realm of international economic relations and also the protection of the broad working masses in the developing and developed capitalist countries against the dictates of transnational corporations.

24. We regret that the task of eliminating the ill effects of the activities of transnational corporations has not been reflected at all in this text of general principles or guidelines for consumer protection, although it did appear in all the previous versions of the document. The decision of some of the sponsors to yield to the pressure of certain delegations and to delete any reference to transnational corporations from the final text has led to a situation in which the whole idea of producing general guidelines for consumer protection has departed from reality, become very abstract in nature and virtually lost its initial significance. All of this, of course, inevitably changed our attitude towards this idea.

AGENDA ITEMS 12 AND 92

Report of the Economic and Social Council (concluded)

International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women: report of the Secretary-General (concluded)*

25. The PRESIDENT: I should like to draw the attention of the General Assembly to part I of the report of the Fifth Committee on agenda item 12, concerning the report of the Economic and Social Council; part I of the report of the Committee on item 12 deals also with item 92, concerning the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women. It is contained in document A/39/613. In paragraph 4 of that report, the Fifth Committee recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of a draft resolution entitled "Statute of the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women". The Fifth Committee adopted it without objection. May I take it that the Assembly also wishes to adopt that draft resolution?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/249).

AGENDA ITEM 17

Appointments to fill vacancies in subsidiary organs and other appointments (continued):

(g) Appointment of members of the Joint Inspection Unit

26. The PRESIDENT: I should now like to invite the attention of the Assembly to document A/39/881, dealing with a vacancy in the Joint Inspection Unit.

27. Even though the Assembly has already considered agenda item 17 (g), may I take it that the Assembly has no objection to reopening it in order to appoint one member of the Joint Inspection Unit at this meeting?

It was so decided.

28. The PRESIDENT: As indicated in document A/39/881, the General Assembly is required to appoint a person to fill a vacancy in the Joint Inspection Unit created by the death of Mr. Toman Hutagalung of Indonesia on 19 December 1984.

29. As a result of consultations, including consultations with the President of the Economic and Social Council and with the Secretary-General in his capacity as Chairman of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, I now submit to the Assembly the candidacy of Mr. Kahono Martohadinegoro of Indonesia for appointment as member of the Joint Inspection Unit for a five-year term beginning on 9 April 1985 and expiring on 31 December 1989. May I take it that it is the wish of the General Assembly to appoint this candidate?

It was so decided (decision 39/305C).

Launching of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development (continued)

30. The PRESIDENT: Next, the Assembly will turn to agenda item 38. I suggest to the Assembly that this item be considered at our next plenary meeting this week. If there is no objection, it will be so decided.

It was so decided.

AGENDA ITEM 80

Development and international economic co-operation (continued):*

(c) Trade and development:

(i) Report of the Trade and Development Board;

(ii) Reports of the Secretary-General

31. The PRESIDENT: Next, I should like to draw the attention of the General Assembly to a note of 21 March 1985 contained in document A/39/867, in which the Secretary-General informed the Assembly that the United Nations Conference on Conditions for Registration of Ships had requested him to seek the approval of the General Assembly at its resumed thirty-ninth session to resume the Conference for a period of two weeks in July 1985. May I take it that the General Assembly has no objection to reopening consideration of item 80 (c) in order to consider at this resumed session the request submitted by the Conference?

It was so decided.

---

*Resumed from the 101st meeting.

*Resumed from the 104th meeting.

32. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will consider this agenda item again as soon as the Fifth Committee has met on the programme budget implications of the proposed resumption.

AGENDA ITEM 81

Operational activities for development (concluded):

(j) Liquidation of the United Nations Emergency Operation Trust Fund and allocation of the remaining balance: report of the Secretary-General

33. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will turn next to agenda item 81 (j). The Assembly, by its decision 39/456 of 18 December 1984, decided to consider this item at its resumed session. In this connection, the Assembly has before it the report of the Second Committee [A/39/791]. The recommendation of the Second Committee appears in paragraph 30 as draft decision IV entitled "Liquidation of the United Nations Emergency Fund and allocation of the remaining balance". May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt that draft decision?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/458).

AGENDA ITEM 93

(b) Preparations for the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women

34. The PRESIDENT: Finally, I should like to draw the attention of the Assembly to document A/39/884, which contains a request addressed to me by the representatives of Argentina, Egypt, India, Indonesia and Kenya to seek the approval of the Assembly at its resumed thirty-ninth session to reopen agenda item 93 (b), entitled "Preparations for the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women". May I take it that the General Assembly has no objection to reopening agenda item 93 (b) as requested?

It was so decided.

35. The PRESIDENT: There is no formal proposal at this stage. As soon as one is submitted, and if it appears to have programme budget implications, may I consider that the Assembly agrees that it be referred directly to the Fifth Committee?

It was so decided.

36. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will take up this item again at a later stage this week.

The meeting rose at 4 p.m.

*Resumed from the 101st meeting.

United Nations
GENERAL ASSEMBLY
THIRTY-NINTH SESSION
Official Records

107th PLENARY MEETING
Friday, 12 April 1985, at 12.20 p.m.
NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

Tribute to the memory of Mr. Enver Hoxha, First Secretary of the Central Committee of the Labour Party and Chairman of the General Council of the Democratic Front of the Socialist People's Republic of Albania

1. The PRESIDENT: It is my sad duty to inform the Assembly of the death of Mr. Enver Hoxha, First Secretary of the Central Committee of the Labour Party and Chairman of the General Council of the Democratic Front of the Socialist People's Republic of Albania.

2. On behalf of the General Assembly, I extend heartfelt condolences to the Government and people of Albania.

AGENDA ITEM 115

Scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of the United Nations: report of the Committee on Contributions (continued)

3. The PRESIDENT: I should like to draw the General Assembly's attention to document A/39/883/Add.1, which contains a letter addressed to me by the Secretary-General informing me that, since the issuance of his last communication [A/39/883], dated 9 April 1985, Saint Lucia has made the necessary payment to reduce its arrears below the amount specified in Article 19 of the Charter. May I take it that the General Assembly duly takes note of this information?

It was so decided.

4. The PRESIDENT: In accordance with the decision taken at its 106th meeting, the Assembly will now consider agenda item 38.

5. In my statement on 18 December 1984 [105th meeting, para. 100], I proposed, and the Assembly agreed, to keep agenda item 38 open in order to allow for the continuation of informal consultations after the suspension of the session and to reconvene on short notice to consider any decisions or agreements that might emerge from the consultations. Regrettably, nothing substantive has emerged from those consultations.

6. It is clear from the statements in the general debate at the thirty-eighth session and in discussions in the Second Committee and other bodies of the United Nations system that international co-operation for economic development is one of the essential prerequisites for the maintenance of international peace and security in all their aspects. It is also clear from the current international economic climate that the decision of 14 December 1979 to launch global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development [resolution 34/138] is perhaps even more valid today than it was five years ago.

7. The purposes of the Charter of the United Nations oblige us to continue to search for solutions to the economic problems which confront the nations of the world.

8. Allow me to go to the extent of suggesting that it would be an abrogation of Article 1, paragraphs 3 and 4, of the Charter, especially during this year of the fortieth anniversary—a time for recommitment—if we were to abandon the search for the consensus which is required to launch the negotiations. It is in the interest of all States not only to keep alive the concept of global negotiations but also to make a determined effort to break the current stalemate.

9. I therefore once again propose to keep the agenda item open in order to allow for further informal, but intensive, consultations after the suspension of the session and to reconvene on short notice to consider any decisions or agreements that might emerge from the consultations. If I hear no objection, it will be so decided.

It was so decided (decision 39/454 B).

10. The PRESIDENT: I understand that the representative of Egypt, in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of 77, would like to make a statement, and I now call on him.

11. Mr. KHALIL (Egypt): In this very Hall, many prominent speakers over the years have reiterated time and time again their commitment to the launching of global negotiations; and at certain junctures we were closer to reaching our goal. It is indeed regrettable and disappointing that, up to the present day, overall solemn commitments to work towards attaining the new international economic order have not been met.

12. This sad fact remains a source of deep concern for the Group of 77, which has initiated the idea of global negotiations in the firm conviction that it offers a positive and coherent response to the growing complexity of international economic relations and draws its support from the principles of mutual benefit, solidarity and interdependence.

13. The crisis which still besets the world economy, with its acute manifestations particularly in the developing world, confirms to our mind the continued validity of the idea of global negotiations for bringing about a peaceful restructuring of international economic relations.

14. The Group of 77 has consistently reaffirmed its full commitment to global negotiations, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 34/138, and has always maintained a flexible approach in its persistent endeavours to bring about an early launching of those negotiations. Unfortunately, this spirit has not so far been reciprocated by our partners, and it is indeed regrettable that, at a time when interdependence is more compelling, we find ourselves in a situation where our partners are shying away from joining with us in a genuine and meaningful dialogue that is aimed, after all, at promoting the interests of all countries and is based on the principles of justice, equality and mutual benefit. We all face a challenge that needs all hands to be joined together in order for it to be met forthrightly and resolutely.

15. The developing countries intend to continue to pursue their efforts to reach, in co-operation with the developed countries, a common conceptual approach aimed at taking the necessary measures for coping with the structural interrelated problems confronting the world. We continue to believe that this common approach can be attained only through a process of constructive dialogue that recognizes the global character of the problems involved. We see in the continued deadlock in sectoral negotiations further proof of the continued validity of the concept of global negotiations which is predicated on the need for an integrated and simultaneous approach that would consider the full range of questions in the major spheres of international economic relations in terms of their interrelationship.

16. Almost 40 years after its inception, the United Nations is still facing the challenge of realizing the full potential of international co-operation. You rightly reminded us, Mr. President, of the relevant Charter provisions and we equally want to reiterate that we firmly believe that the United Nations is an effective instrument for the achievement of progress for the international community as a whole. This is why, as we approach its fortieth anniversary, we are in the forefront in defending its role and remain wedded to our conviction that the United Nations system is uniquely and solely capable of devising formulas that could translate interdependence into concrete steps that could progressively achieve prosperity, stability and peace for all mankind.

17. Mr. President, we thank you for your efforts and understand the considerations that prompted you to make your statement on this issue before us. For its part, the Group of 77 will continue to give you full support and constant co-operation in your consultations to bring about the necessary conditions for launching global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development.

18. Mr. PASHKEVICH (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) (interpretation from Russian): At the outset, I too should like to extend profound condolences to the delegation of Albania on the death of the First Secretary of the Central Committee of the Albanian Labour Party, Enver Hoxha.

19. I am speaking on behalf of the delegations of the People's Republic of Bulgaria, the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, the German Democratic Republic, the Hungarian People's Republic, the Mongolian People's Republic, the Polish People's Republic, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic.

20. The delegations of our countries consistently and unswervingly favour the prompt beginning of global negotiations at the United Nations, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 34/138.

21. The position of principle of the socialist States in supporting this initiative of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and of the Group of 77 has been expressed many times at the highest levels of leadership of our countries in documents of the Warsaw Treaty Organization and of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance.

22. Our readiness to proceed immediately to the process of reaching agreement in the United Nations on issues regarding the practical preparation of global negotiations was once again reaffirmed by the joint statement of the delegations of the socialist countries made in plenary at the resumed thirty-eighth session of the General Assembly on 17 September 1984 [106th meeting, paras. 40-47]. That position remains fully in force.

23. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the representative of Italy, who will speak on behalf of the 10 member States of the European Community.

24. Mr. ZUCCONI (Italy): I should like first of all, on behalf of my delegation, to express to the delegation of the Socialist People's Republic of Albania sincere condolences on the death of the First Secretary of the Central Committee of the Albanian Labour Party.

25. The European Community and its member States have listened to the statement of the Chairman of the Group of 77 and will consider it in the light of their position on this matter. The Community and its member States have always participated actively and constructively in the North-South dialogue, in all forums in which such dialogue has taken place, with a view to achieving concrete results wherever possible. We have done so, and intend to continue our efforts in that direction, because we recognize the increasing degree of interdependence between different countries and areas in the world economy and the consequences that economic policies pursued by individual countries or groups of countries have for developments in other parts of the world. The European Community, moreover, has a number of specific reasons to be particularly conscious of world economic interdependence.

26. First, its member States have widespread and diverse traditional links with many countries and regions of the world. The Community itself has developed an extensive network of relations, including trade and co-operation agreements, with a large number of individual countries and regional groupings throughout the world.

27. Secondly, about 40 per cent of the Community's external trade takes place with developing countries, which provide about 40 per cent of total Community imports.

28. Thirdly, the Community is convinced that its future prospects for economic growth and successful structural adjustment are very much interwoven with further economic development in the developing countries and their more effective participation in the open world economy.

29. In fact, we believe that the North-South dialogue is of great value, as it permits the international community to build up elements of common understanding among all interested parties which, in time, can lead to fruitful results in terms of impact on individual policies, consultation, co-operation and, ultimately, negotiated agreements. This attitude towards the dialogue as a whole is reflected in the position of the European Community on the launching of global negotiations, on a basis acceptable to all, as we have expressed on many occasions. The European Community will continue to be guided by a constructive and co-operative spirit in the ongoing dialogue with the developing countries.

30. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): My Government, together with many others represented here, has devoted a considerable amount of time to the effort at achieving agreement on a basis for launching global negotiations. We will maintain our constructive and co-operative interest in this issue and will continue to play a full and active role in this process.

AGENDA ITEM 80

Development and international economic co-operation (concluded):

(c) Trade and development:

(i) Report of the Trade and Development Board;

(ii) Reports of the Secretary-General

31. The PRESIDENT: In connection with item 80 (c) the Assembly has before it draft resolution A/39/L.46, entitled "United Nations Conference on Conditions for Registration of Ships", and the report of the Fifth Committee on the programme budget implications of that draft resolution [A/39/886].

32. I call on the representative of Egypt in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of 77.

33. Mr. KHALIL (Egypt): On behalf of the Group of 77, I wish to address the question relating to the reconvening of the United Nations Conference on Conditions for Registration of Ships.

34. As stipulated in the note by the Secretary-General of 21 March 1985 [A/39/867], the Conference, at its resumed session held at Geneva from 28 January to 15 February 1985, adopted a resolution by which it decided unanimously to request the General Assembly to convene a resumed session of the Conference for a period of two weeks in July 1985. The unanimous support of that resolution shows the significant progress achieved during the resumed session in January-February 1985, and it is our sincere hope in the light of that progress that the momentum will be maintained in order to bring about a successful conclusion to the Conference's work on the adoption of an international agreement on conditions for registration of ships.

35. In the aforementioned resolution, the Secretary-General was requested to seek the approval of the General Assembly at its resumed thirty-ninth session for the resumption of the Conference. We have submitted a draft resolution on the subject in document A/39/L.46 to formalize the agreement reached at Geneva concerning the resumption of the Conference in July.

36. On behalf of the Group of 77, I wish to express the earnest hope that draft resolution A/39/L.46, on which an understanding has been reached in the Fifth Committee along the same lines as the resolution adopted by the Conference, will receive the same unanimous support.

37. The PRESIDENT: May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt draft resolution A/39/L.46?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/213 B).

AGENDA ITEM 93

United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace (concluded):

(b) Preparations for the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women

38. The PRESIDENT: In connection with this item, I wish to draw the Assembly's attention to draft decision A/39/L.47 and the report of the Fifth Committee [A/39/887] on the programme budget implications of that draft decision. May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt draft decision A/39/L.47?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/459).

39. The PRESIDENT: The adoption of that decision reaffirms the commitment of all delegations to spare no effort for the success of the conference to be held at Nairobi. Consultations should start as soon as possible to pave the way for the early completion of all the documentation, in particular the forward-looking strategies to be adopted by the conference. This, no doubt, will be the major preoccupation of the preparatory body. I feel sure that the preparatory body will have the wisdom to utilize available arrangements in the most flexible and expeditious way in order to achieve our common objective of success for the Nairobi conference.

40. Mr. FISCHER (Austria): As was made clear in the course of deliberations in the Fifth Committee, the resumption of the session of the preparatory body for the conference in New York involves a departure from General Assembly resolution 31/140, which stipulates that United Nations organs should meet at their respective established headquarters—in this case, in Vienna.

41. My delegation regrets the departure from the General Assembly's conference servicing regulations that the resumption of the session in New York entails. It is only in view of the particular circumstances of this case and the overriding need to ensure a successful outcome of the world conference to be held at Nairobi that my delegation accepts this decision.

42. My delegation hopes that the resumed session in New York will be successful in providing the conference with a substantive and forward-looking basis for its work.

AGENDA ITEM 110

Programme planning (concluded):*

(a) Report of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination;

(b) Reports of the Secretary-General

43. The PRESIDENT: As members of the General Assembly will recall, the Assembly decided at its 105th plenary meeting, on 18 December 1984, that agenda item 110, concerning programme planning, should be held open for consideration at a resumed session [see decision 39/456] after appropriate review and analysis had been completed. In this connection, the Assembly has before it the report of the Fifth Committee contained in document A/39/840. In paragraph 14 of the report, the Committee recommends to the Assembly the adoption of two draft decisions, I and II.

44. In regard to draft decision I, entitled "Correction to General Assembly resolution 38/227 A", following extensive informal consultations, a new draft decision has been submitted to replace it. The new draft decision is contained in document A/39/L.48.

45. I call now on Mr. Ernest Besley Maycock of Barbados, who wishes to introduce that draft decision.

46. Mr. MAYCOCK (Barbados): At its 105th plenary meeting, on 18 December last, the General Assembly decided that agenda item 110 should be held open for consideration at a resumed session. Subsequently, informal consultations were held within an open-ended contact group. An understanding emerged in the contact group that matters of substance were too important and too difficult to be dealt with in the time available and that such matters should be left for in-depth discussion during the forthcoming session of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination and at the fortieth session of the General Assembly. According to the draft decision which I have the honour to introduce, the General Assembly, having considered the statement by the Under-Secretary-General for Administration and Management before the Fifth Committee [see A/C.5/39/SR.17, para. 46], would decide to take note of the information and assurance provided by him. I hope that all delegations will find it possible to agree to the proposal in document A/39/L.48.

47. The PRESIDENT: May I take it that the General Assembly wishes to adopt draft decision A/39/L.48?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/460).

48. The PRESIDENT: I call now on those delegations wishing to make statements after the decision. I remind representatives of the 10-minute time limit for such statements.

49. Mr. FIGUEIRA (Brazil): It was our understanding that in resolution 38/227 A of 20 December 1983 the Secretary-General was requested to provide, inter alia, further indications of clear implications of draft resolutions with regard to the existing programmes within the relevant section of the programme budget, in the case of possible funding through existing resources. Therefore, we welcomed the information transmitted by the Under-Secretary-General for Administration and Management, referred to in document A/C.5/39/SR.17, paragraph 46, that in the editing and finalizing of the text of that resolution for submission to the Fifth Committee and to the General Assembly a plural form had been erroneously introduced into the expression "relevant section" in section II, paragraph 7 (c) (iii). We also welcomed his assurance that in the implementation of the said resolution the correct wording of the agreed text would be respected. We firmly trust that the matter will be treated as a clear mandate for the Secretary-General to act in the way that has been indicated.

50. Let me add that the initiative taken by the Under-Secretary-General for Administration and Management in conveying this timely clarification of the matter reflects the professionalism and accuracy of the Secretariat in the discharge of its responsibilities and duties. We could not expect the Secretariat to do otherwise.

51. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): That the United States has joined in the consensus on the decision to take note of the statement by the Under-Secretary-General for Administration and Management should in no way be construed as an agreement with the contents of that statement, which attempts to construe an agreement among delegations which, in our understanding, implied the use of the words "relevant sections", not "relevant section".

52. The PRESIDENT: I call now on the representative of Italy, who will speak on behalf of the States members of the European Community.

53. Mr. JANNUZZI (Italy) (interpretation from French): The 10 States members of the European Community, on whose behalf I am speaking, agreed in a spirit of compromise to the adoption without a vote of draft decision A/39/L.48. We wish, however, to stress our position that that decision does not imply any approval on our part of the interpretation given by the Under-Secretary-General for Administration and Management to section II, paragraph 7 (c) (iii) of General Assembly resolution 38/227 A.

54. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now turn to draft decision II recommended by the Fifth Committee and entitled "Amendments to the Financial Rules of the United Nations". The Committee adopted that draft decision without a vote. May I take it that the Assembly wishes to do the same?

The draft decision was adopted (decision 39/461).

AGENDA ITEM 115

Scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of the United Nations: report of the Committee on Contributions (continued)

55. The PRESIDENT: Members of the General Assembly will recall that at its 105th plenary meeting, on 18 December 1984, the Assembly decided to postpone further consideration of agenda item 115, concerning the scale of assessments for the apportionment of expenses of the United Nations, to a resumed session of the General Assembly [see decision 39/456]. In this connection, the Assembly has before it part II of the report of the Fifth Committee on the item, which is contained in document A/39/844/Add.1. The recommendation of the Committee appears in paragraph 7 of the report in the form of a draft resolution entitled "Scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of the United Nations".

---

56. I call now on delegations wishing to make statements before a decision is taken, and I ask them to bear in mind the 10-minute time limit for such statements.

57. Mr. KEYES (United States of America): For a period of some years, the United States has participated in the deliberations of the Committee on Contributions and the Fifth Committee on the assessment process. We do so in a disinterested way, since our activities cannot affect, in one way or another, our assessed contribution to the United Nations budget. It is widely known that, as a result of action by both the United States Congress and the General Assembly, our proportionate share is fixed and, therefore, unaffected by this process. We have acted, instead, out of a principled interest in the well-being and future effectiveness of the United Nations, whose future we sincerely believe will be adversely affected if all countries do not share equitably in the burden of support for the Organization. Equitable burden-sharing has a direct effect on the Organization's willingness to pursue a course of fiscal responsibility and restraint, as well as on its dedication to effective use of its resources. Therefore, we are convinced that our decisions on this matter have an importance that transcends the issue of the precise level of each Member's contribution to the United Nations. Indeed, wrong decisions on this issue can have—will have—far-reaching consequences, affecting the very fabric of multilateralism.

58. My delegation has participated actively in the negotiations over the last several months. It has negotiated constructively and in good faith. Despite our strenuous efforts during those months, we regrettably find ourselves confronted with a document still marred by the provisions we found objectionable when the negotiations began. In my statement before the Fifth Committee last October [see A/C.5/39/SR.9, paras. 25-35], I indicated our serious concern that the current structure of the scale of assessments, with its numerous discounts and subsidies for various classes of countries, made it very difficult, if not impossible, to have equitable burden-sharing. The statement described our specific objections to two of the recommendations of the Committee on Contributions: the increase from $2,100 to $2,200 in the upper limit of the per capita income allowance for the least developed countries and the continuation of the 10-year base period. We indicated our strong belief that a more equitable system of assessment must be developed in the long term to avoid serious damage to the fiscal foundations of the United Nations system.

59. The document before us contains both of those objectionable provisions. Their intended effect is, of course, to reduce the contributions of some Member States. It also includes a number of provisions that go far beyond the recommendations of the Committee on Contributions in providing a welter of actual and potential discounts and subsidies. Rather than moving us towards the objective of a more equitable distribution of the financial burdens of the Organization, the multiplication of those ad hoc loopholes moves us further away from that goal.

60. The provision in paragraph 1 (c), for instance, implies that developing countries, no matter how prosperous, should not share fully in the costs of providing discounts to the least developed countries. How is this consistent with a fair implementation of the capacity-to-pay principle?

61. The provision in paragraph 1 (d) purports to benefit the least developed countries, but, as far as my delegation can discern, it changes not a single assessment. What contribution do such illusory political palliatives make to increased fairness and fiscal responsibility?

62. The provisions in paragraph 3 further complicate the scale by adding a subsidy based on total national income. Paragraph 1 (e) invites the Committee on Contributions to devise a method for determining a scale even more complicated than the present one. Paragraph 1 (f) greatly limits the responsiveness of the assessment mechanism to changes in world economic conditions.

63. Do provisions such as those, which complicate, distort and rigidify the assessment process, provide incentives for countries to be concerned about the size, substance and priorities of the United Nations budget? Given the proliferation of discounts and subsidies arising from the most narrow and self-serving political interests, how are we to avoid increased politicization of a process that should be primarily technical in nature? How are we to stem the growing perception in the capitals and legislatures of many Member States that most of the States Members of the United Nations intend to give as little as possible and take as much as possible? Does it serve the interest of taxpayers in developed or developing countries to acquiesce in an assessment process that does not have incentives for responsibility and efficiency? Does it strengthen the future prospects of the United Nations to heighten the growing public concern and even cynicism about the Organization?

64. The draft resolution before us is based on the pessimistic notion that most States Members of the United Nations are permanently condemned to the status of underdevelopment. What does such a notion say about the efficacy of the United Nations contribution to development efforts? How does it reflect the efforts of developing countries themselves? How does it reflect the positive hopes the Organization is supposed to represent? Given its despairing premise, how will the adoption of this draft resolution increase public understanding of, and support for, the development assistance process?

65. Because of our strong belief that the draft resolution before us is not in the interest of the United Nations, the United States opposes its approval by this Assembly. In fact, its faults are so glaring that we find it hard to understand why most Member States seem prepared to adopt it by consensus. Member States publicly profess a determination to strengthen the United Nations. Yet this worthy objective is quickly set aside when critical decisions are to be made, and, instead, narrow and self-serving political calculations prevail. Why is it that States that claim to care so deeply about the Organization lack the courage and political will to oppose draft resolutions that they know will damage its effectiveness?

66. As the United Nations approaches the celebration of its fortieth anniversary, we should all be working together to put the Organization on a more constructive course and to stem the universally acknowledged process of decline and ineffectiveness. Instead, the draft resolution before us reinforces the tendencies that have greatly contributed to the present crisis in the Organization.

67. The United States will work tirelessly, as we have done in the past, to encourage trends towards greater responsibility and more effectiveness. We are willing to join others who share the same views and objectives in seeking to make the Organization a more effective, stronger and more appreciated instrument for the well-being of all mankind. We deeply regret that the document before us does not move the United Nations in that direction, and therefore we find ourselves unable to participate in any decision to approve this draft resolution.

68. Mr. PEDERSEN (Canada): The Canadian delegation would like to express its appreciation to the officers of the Fifth Committee, and in particular to Mr. Maycock for his splendid guidance and leadership, which enabled us to conclude the work on the scale of assessments. In seven years of negotiations in the General Assembly, this was among the most arduous, fraught, as it was, with the difficulties of many competing interests. In this sense we are encouraged by the outcome, because at the end of the day the spirit of moderation, generosity and good will prevailed, in the interest of the Organization as a whole, to further the unity that we all seek.

69. Yet I am left with a certain apprehension that future scales may become even more difficult, because we seem embarked on a course that increasingly departs from an objective determination of the capacity to pay. In this regard, subparagraphs (a), (b), (c), (e) and (f) of paragraph 1 represent distortions of the capacity-to-pay principle.

70. At the same time, we look forward to the study referred to in paragraph 3 to see whether that might reverse the current trend and provide a step towards a more objective and refined calculation of capacity to pay.

71. In conclusion, the United Nations cannot afford to see the scale of assessments become a matter that engenders acrimony and confrontation. We believe, therefore, that the best way to avoid that very real danger and to achieve a sharing of the burden that can be accepted by all Member States is to entrust the Committee on Contributions with the task for which it was created.

72. The PRESIDENT: The Fifth Committee adopted the draft resolution without a vote. May I take it that the General Assembly also wishes to adopt it?

The draft resolution was adopted (resolution 39/247 B).

73. The PRESIDENT: Several delegations have expressed the wish to speak after a decision has been made.

74. Mr. EL-SAFTY (Egypt): I have the privilege and honour to speak on behalf of the Group of 77 on so important a matter as the scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of the United Nations.

75. Members of the Group of 77 joined the consensus and fully participated in the efforts to reach it. They spared no effort and made many concessions so that agreement could be reached.

76. This constructive approach came out of our deep concern for the subject, because we knew that the alternative would be worse. We were deeply involved in seven months of negotiations, while at the same time we were aware, and we are still aware, that, had anybody wanted to vote on this issue, it would have been the easiest course to follow. We did not even despair when our efforts sometimes were met with arrogance by some of the so-called hard-liners. Let me be candid and quote one of those hard-liners describing his position: "Those who have nothing to lose can afford to be hard-liners, and even unreasonable."

77. Our attitude, from the beginning, was different. We tried to reach an agreement and worked for it. We offered a whole range of concessions and formulations for the sake of that agreement. The outcome does not satisfy us, but we consciously decided to accept it as a consensus and go along with it. Had there been a vote we definitely would not be in a position to agree on such a text. It needs many improvements, even additions, deletions and substitutions.

78. Before going into the details of the matter, let me just mention one thing. Over the years we have seen many countries in arrears in the payment of their contributions, in accordance with Article 19 of the Charter. Many of these countries are developing countries that face real economic hardships that temporarily prevent them from making payments. In the rare case that a non-developing country fell within the scope of Article 19, it was either for political reasons or reasons of principle, so it is not fair to use the argument that the actual amounts involved are relatively small. If the relationship is established between the amounts involved and the wealth we see in some parts of the world, then the argument is true. But if the relationship is with most of the world—namely the developing countries—then the amounts are relatively huge.

79. Let me now go into the specifics of the matter.

80. First, we would have preferred a clearer resolution that spelled out the economic difficulties facing the world today—especially, and to a greater extent, by far, the developing countries; also, we wanted the resolution to spell out in clear, unambiguous terms that those problems facing the developing countries have to be addressed by the Committee on Contributions in the preparation of the next scale of assessments.

81. Secondly, we would have preferred that the resolution state that the methodology used to determine the real capacity of Member States to pay served a good purpose in the past, but that it is becoming increasingly inadequate at present, not to mention the future. It is inadequate for measuring the real capacity to pay, and it should be supplemented by further measures.

82. Thirdly, we would have liked a resolution that raised the gradient to 90 per cent, a resolution that stated that the redistribution of the burden of relief should not fall on the developing countries.

83. Fourthly, the resolution should have clearly mentioned that an additional methodology should be developed immediately to take into account in the second stage of the exercise, and before the mitigation process, the serious and deteriorating economic situation in developing countries, spelling out the most important components of this serious situation. However, we are confident that the resolution adopted instructs the Committee on Contributions to develop and apply the requested methodology in the preparation of the next scale of assessments, thus satisfying the General Assembly's decision.

84. Fifthly, we think also that the resolution should have instructed the Committee on Contributions on how to modify scheme III, contained in paragraph 49 of its report [A/39/11 and Con. 1].

85. Sixthly, we should also like to draw attention to paragraph 1 (d) of the resolution, which, if interpreted by a twisted mind, could lead to some sort of discrimination against some of the least fortunate among us, namely the least-developed countries. Of course, the General Assembly never did and does not now or in the future intend to discriminate against those countries.

86. Seventhly and lastly, we should have liked the resolution not to be selective, mentioning some studies by name, as it did in paragraph 2.

87. In its preambular and operative parts, the resolution speaks of bringing to the attention of the Committee on Contributions the elements of the discussion of this subject in the Fifth Committee. I expect—indeed demand—that this statement also be brought to the attention of the Committee on Contributions. We expect the Committee on Contributions to take into account, in all phases of its work, including the mitigation phase, all the points mentioned during the discussion of this item in the Fifth Committee and in plenary meeting.

88. Mr. RYDZKOWSKI (Poland): The Polish delegation would like to explain its position with regard to the resolution just adopted by the General Assembly, and to put the following on record.

89. While we have joined in the consensus, we wish to restate once again before the General Assembly Poland's position of principle with regard to the assessment for our country for the United Nations regular budget. In doing so we reiterate our request that the matter be finally and satisfactorily resolved during the revision of the scale this year.

90. May I recall that on 17 December 1982, in the plenary Assembly, the representative of Poland, while supporting the scale of assessments for the years 1983, 1984 and 1985, stated, inter alia:

> ". . . we should like to make it crystal-clear that my country, despite the substantial decrease in the new scale, continues to be over-assessed . . .
> "Guided by a spirit of compromise, accommodation and moderation, and despite our well-known financial and economic difficulties, Poland has found it possible to accept the new scale of assessments on the condition that during the next revision of the scale our contribution will be corrected downward so as to be in agreement with our real capacity to pay."[1]

This position remains fully valid.

91. We expect that the Committee on Contributions and, later, the General Assembly, will, when revising the scale of assessments this year, give full satisfaction to our legitimate claim and thus finally solve the case of Poland's assessment.

92. The PRESIDENT: The representative of Albania has asked to make a statement. I call upon him.

93. Mr. PAPAJORGJI (Albania): On behalf of the Government of the Socialist People's Republic of Albania, allow me to express heartfelt thanks to you, Mr. President, and to the representative of Italy for the deep condolences expressed on the passing away of the leader of the Albanian people, Comrade Enver Hoxha, as well as to the other delegations that have already done so to us personally.

94. Enver Hoxha was the founder of the Communist Party of Albania—today the Labour Party of Albania—the organizer and leader of the war of national liberation and our people's revolution, the founder of the new Albanian State and the architect of the construction of socialist Albania. Indeed, the life of Enver Hoxha is the living history of present-day Albania.

95. In all the stages that the Albanian people have traversed, in all the key moments when the destinies of the people and the homeland were decided upon, his thinking and personality were always present. His leadership and direction were decisive.

96. If Albania is today an advanced socialist country which develops by relying on its own forces, a homeland of the people that are free from every social and spiritual oppression, a country of democracy and well-being for all and of education and culture for the broad masses of the people, this is attributed to the war waged by the Albanian people, with the Party and Comrade Hoxha at the head. It was he who worked out the general lines of the foreign policy and the stands of our State on international questions.

Suspension of the session

97. The PRESIDENT: I should like to thank all representatives, the Secretary-General and the Secretariat staff for their co-operation in the work of this resumed session.

98. In accordance with Assembly decision 39/456 of 18 December 1984, and bearing in mind the action taken by the Assembly at this meeting, the following items remain on the agenda of the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly: item 17 (i): Confirmation of the appointment of the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development; item 25: The situation in Central America: threats to international peace and security and peace initiatives; item 38: Launching of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development; item 41: Observance of the quincentenary of the discovery of America; item 42: Question of Cyprus; item 43: Implementation of the resolutions of the United Nations; item 44: Consequences of the prolongation of the armed conflict between Iran and Iraq; and item 140: Celebration of the one-hundred-and-fiftieth anniversary of the emancipation of slaves in the British Empire.

99. I now declare the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly suspended.

The meeting rose at 1.25 p.m.

United Nations

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

THIRTY-NINTH SESSION

Official Records

108th PLENARY MEETING

Monday, 16 September 1985,
at 3.35 p.m.

NEW YORK

President: Mr. Paul J. F. LUSAKA (Zambia).

Resumption of the session

1. The PRESIDENT: I declare the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly resumed, in accordance with decision 39/456 of 18 December 1984.

Tribute to the memory of a head of State and former Presidents of the General Assembly

2. The PRESIDENT: Before we consider the items on the agenda for this afternoon, it is my sad duty to recall to the General Assembly the deaths of Mr. Linden Forbes Burnham, President of the Republic of Guyana; Mr. Luis Padilla Nervo, President of the sixth session of the General Assembly, former Minister for Foreign Affairs of Mexico and former Judge of the International Court of Justice; and Sir Muhammad Zafrulla Khan, President of the seventeenth session of the General Assembly and first Minister for Foreign Affairs of Pakistan, which have occurred since the suspension of the thirty-ninth session of the Assembly on 12 April 1985.

3. I invite representatives to stand and observe a minute of silence in tribute to their memory.

The members of the Assembly observed a minute of silence.

4. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Guyana.

5. Mr. KARRAN (Guyana): I make this statement with mixed feelings. It is very kind of you, Mr. President, and the General Assembly to express your sympathy in the way you have. Comrade Linden Forbes Sampson Burnham guided the destiny of the Guyanese people for 21 years. During that period he saw Guyana move from colonialism to independence—independence which he cherished dearly. He brought our small nation out of obscurity, and through his foreign policy Guyana became known and respected internationally. I speak in particular of Guyana's commitment to and involvement in the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, its involvement in issues of the third world and its involvement in the councils of the United Nations. Under his presidency, Guyana dedicated itself to the development of regional integration and was a driving force in the process which culminated in the establishment of the Caribbean Community [CARICOM].

6. By his death, the national liberation movements throughout the world have lost a committed friend and the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries has lost a true friend. He felt deeply for the oppressed peoples of the world.

7. The Commonwealth countries have lost a friend and so has CARICOM. It was with great shock and deep sadness that the Guyanese community learned of his sudden death. However, he has laid a foundation for development within our national boundaries. He believed in multilateral institutions and he was committed to the Organization—the United Nations—and its workings. It had his unswerving support.

8. On behalf of the Government and the people of Guyana and the bereaved family of the late President Burnham, I should like to extend my warmest and sincerest thanks for the sentiments expressed here this afternoon.

9. Mr. MUÑOZ LEDO (Mexico) (interpretation from Spanish): Luis Padilla Nervo, a distinguished Mexican and an eminent internationalist, passed away on 9 September at the age of 87. A career diplomat and a government official for over half a century, he gave service to the international community.

10. He was President of the General Assembly at its sixth session and Judge of the International Court of Justice from 1964 to 1973. Minister for Foreign Affairs of my country from 1952 to 1958, Padilla Nervo was twice representative of Mexico to the United Nations and, together with Brazil, was one of the first Latin American members on the Security Council.

11. Throughout his long career, he distinguished himself as one of the most faithful interpreters of my country's foreign policy and of the deeply nationalist feelings of our people, firmly expressed in the Mexican revolution of 1910 and of which our own diplomatic action has been both the reflection and the spearhead.

12. Padilla Nervo carried out that policy in an exemplary way, a policy which has always been based on principles. Since the days of San Francisco when the United Nations was being formed, he accomplished his work and he can therefore quite rightly be considered one who fashioned our contemporary multilateral diplomacy and one of the steadfast champions of decolonization, disarmament and international co-operation. He always sought harmony among States, but he also stood firmly against the excesses of the mighty.

13. May his work be a lesson to everyone as well as encouragement to all. May the sovereignty of Mexico, vigorously reaffirmed in this forum, continue to strengthen equality among nations and the dignity of the Organization. That, Mr. President, is my hope as I thank you, on behalf of my country and on that of Mr. Padilla Nervo's family, for your generous words.

14. I also wish to thank the General Assembly for the tribute that it has paid to the memory of my outstanding fellow countryman on the eve of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations and on the day when, by a significant coincidence, Mexico is celebrating the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of its own independence.

15. Mr. Shah NAWAZ (Pakistan): It is a sad day for me to make this brief statement on the passing of one of the most brilliant statesmen of our time, Sir Muhammad Zafrulla Khan, who died only a few days ago at the age of 92. He was a well-known internationalist and has been greatly respected and admired by the world community for a number of years. His life span covered practically a whole century of our time. During his long and fruitful career, he served the international community in many diverse ways.

16. First, he began his great career in Pakistan and, with the coming of Pakistan's independence, he had already played a very important role in the freedom movement. Soon afterwards he became the first Minister for Foreign Affairs of the free country of Pakistan.

17. During his time as Foreign Minister, he served the cause of Islam and of the Arab world in particular, as well as the cause of all liberation movements, during a fruitful and brilliant career. A number of nations that are free today and are Members of the United Nations must surely remember the sterling part that he played in their freedom movements.

18. Later on, he had a great career in the field of law, in which he excelled as a brilliant lawyer. Sir Muhammad Zafrulla Khan was recognized by the international community and he became a Judge of the International Court of Justice, where he had a long and fruitful career. His name is still remembered and highly respected.

19. Thereafter he retired to private life, but he continued his interest in international affairs and was the author of a number of books in which his great experience of world affairs was richly reflected.

20. I knew him personally over a long period and I had the greatest admiration and affection for him. It is really a sad occasion for me today to make this statement on the occasion of his demise.

21. Mr. President, I am most grateful to you and to the international community represented in this hall for the honour that has been done to us and to his memory. I am most grateful for the words of praise and the message of condolence that were read out, and I wish to thank you.

AGENDA ITEM 115

Scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of the United Nations: report of the Committee on Contributions (concluded)

22. The PRESIDENT: I should now like to invite the attention of the General Assembly to document A/39/883/Add.2, which contains a letter addressed to me by the Secretary-General informing me that, since the issuance of his last communication [A/39/883/Add.1] dated 11 April 1985, Chad, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Paraguay, Romania and Zaire have made the necessary payments to reduce their arrears below the amount specified in Article 19 of the Charter. May I take it that the General Assembly duly takes note of this information?

It was so decided.

AGENDA ITEM 17

Appointments to fill vacancies in subsidiary organs and other appointments (concluded):*

(i) Confirmation of the appointment of the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development

23. The PRESIDENT: The Secretary-General has informed me that he is continuing his consultations in regard to this matter and that he hopes to be in a position to present a name during the fortieth session of the General Assembly. In the interim period, the senior Deputy Secretary-General of UNCTAD will continue to act as its officer-in-charge.

24. May I take it that the Assembly takes note of this information and wishes to include sub-item 17 (i) in the draft agenda of the fortieth session?

It was so decided (decision 39/324 B).

25. Mr. OUDOVENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) (interpretation from Russian): On behalf of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, the People's Republic of Bulgaria, the Hungarian People's Republic, the German Democratic Republic, the Mongolian People's Republic, the Polish People's Republic, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic and the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, I should like to make the following statement.

26. The socialist countries, which have participated very actively in the creation of UNCTAD, are aware of the great importance of that organization, whose contribution in the preparation of new ideas and concepts dealing with radical changes in international economic relations on a just and democratic basis is widely recognized. The role of UNCTAD at the present time is even greater, since it is a forum where it is possible to discuss and adopt decisions on a wide range of topical economic, financial and trade issues that are more urgent than ever for the international community, and above all for the developing countries.

27. At the present time, as we are approaching the seventh session of the Conference, we must once again draw attention to an abnormal situation. For almost a year now, that important organization has been working without a Secretary-General. In the joint statement of our delegations to the General Assembly on 18 December last [105th meeting, para. 79], we indicated our hope that the question of the appointment of the Secretary-General of UNCTAD would be resolved as soon as possible, to make it possible for that organization to accomplish its work under normal conditions.

28. We now ask once again that there be no delay in resolving this problem, because UNCTAD's continued success requires that it have at its head a leader with authority who enjoys the broad support of Member States.

*Resumed from the 106th meeting.

AGENDA ITEM 25

The situation in Central America: threats to international peace and security and peace initiatives: report of the Secretary-General (concluded)*

29. The PRESIDENT: May I take it that it is the wish of the General Assembly to include this item in the draft agenda of the fortieth session?

It was so decided.

AGENDA ITEM 38

Launching of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development (concluded)

30. The PRESIDENT: In my statement on 12 April 1985, at the resumed session, I proposed, and the Assembly agreed, in regard to agenda item 38, to "keep the . . . item open in order to allow time for further informal, but intensive, consultations after the suspension of the session and to reconvene on short notice to consider any decisions or agreements that might emerge from the consultations" [107th meeting, para. 9]. Regrettably, no substantive progress has emerged since that time to allow the launching of global negotiations by the General Assembly.

31. As I, as well as my predecessors, have stated on various occasions, the concept of global negotiations, as initiated in Assembly resolution 34/138 and as it has evolved subsequently in the last few years, continues to be valid. It is in the interest of all States to concert their efforts in promoting international co-operation for economic development, one of the essential prerequisites for the maintenance of international peace and security.

32. In my last statement, I went to the extent of suggesting that "it would be an abrogation of Article 1, paragraphs 3 and 4, of the Charter, especially during this year of the fortieth anniversary—a time for recommitment—if we were to abandon the search for the consensus required to launch the global negotiations" [ibid., para. 8]. This remains my conviction today, and I believe that efforts should continue to be made to achieve this common objective of ours.

33. On the course of action to be followed by the General Assembly at the closure of this session, I would propose, on the basis of informal consultations, that the Assembly include in the draft agenda of its fortieth session the item entitled "Launching of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development". If there is no objection, it will be so decided.

It was so decided (decision 39/454C).

34. The PRESIDENT: I wish once again to address a plea to all Member States seriously to take stock of the current situation and to renew their efforts and commitment to co-operate in a spirit of mutual understanding and flexibility, and in the interest of the international community as a whole, in our common pursuit of solutions to the economic problems which confront all of us today.

35. I now call on the representative of Egypt, who will speak on behalf of the Group of 77.

36. Mr. KHALIL (Egypt): One more session of the General Assembly is drawing to a close with nothing to show on a very important issue, namely the launching of global negotiations on international co-operation for development.

37. For its part, the Group of 77 has, I hope it will be conceded, spared no effort to create conditions in which the international community could find ways and means to reactivate the stalled North-South dialogue. Unfortunately, these efforts to obtain a favourable response to global negotiations from our partners to the north continue to meet with a deafening silence.

38. Some quarters may wish to see the concept of global negotiations abandoned. Allow me to stress that these voices do not deter us, for we in the developing world believe that the concept of global negotiations basically reflects a sincere call for international co-operation. Interdependence is a reality, and hence we continue to uphold multilateralism and to reject a return to narrow nationalistic approaches with their negative consequences for the international economic system as a whole.

39. It was the inequity and inadequacy of the present international economic system in the first place that prompted the Group of 77 to initiate the idea of global negotiations, and it is the crises which clearly continue to plague the world economy that demonstrate the continuing validity of that idea in bringing about an orderly restructuring of international economic relations.

40. The Group of 77 has consistently reaffirmed its full commitment to global negotiations in accordance with General Assembly resolution 34/138, and we have maintained a flexible approach in our endeavours to bring about an early launching of those negotiations. We continue to believe that if that spirit is to be genuinely reciprocated by our partners, any approach to the subject from a narrow perspective of short-term loss and benefit should be discarded, for it negates the fact of interdependence and ignores the realities of the present world economy.

41. That is why we believe that lasting solutions to the inherent structural imbalances besetting the world economy will be attained only through a process of constructive dialogue that recognizes the global character of the problems involved. That approach is certainly better than the sectorally compartmentalized approach that has characterized past efforts, which are still deadlocked. That fact in itself provides further proof of the continuing relevance of the global negotiations. That concept, as is well known, is predicated upon the need for an integrated and simultaneous approach that addresses the full range of issues in the major spheres of international economic relations in terms of their interrelationship. We believe that that basic concept bears repetition. It is our considered opinion that that concept, which draws its support from the principles of mutual benefit, solidarity and interdependence, offers a coherent response to the growing complexity of international economic relations.

42. At the close of the thirty-ninth session, we in the Group of 77 wish to express anew our deep concern that 11 years after the unanimous adoption by the General Assembly of resolutions 3201 (S-VI) and 3202 (S-VI) on the Declaration and Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International

---

*Resumed from the 105th meeting.

Economic Order, there has been no significant progress in their implementation.

43. We are all, North and South, in the same boat; we all run a risk and face a challenge that must be met with all the resolve and foresight that we can muster. Forty years after the inception of the United Nations, we are still facing the challenge of realizing the full potential of international co-operation.

44. We in the Group of 77 are and always will be in the forefront in defending the role and objectives of the United Nations system, which we believe is uniquely capable of devising formulas that can translate interdependence into concrete steps that can progressively achieve prosperity, stability and peace for all mankind. That is our message to our partners.

45. Allow me also, Mr. President, to express appreciation of your efforts and assure you that the Group of 77 will continue to maintain its constructive approach. We are legitimately seeking greater international economic co-operation and development. That for us will remain in the centre of the global agenda. We shall continue to urge the international community to move towards attaining an international economic order based upon the principles of justice, equality and mutual benefit.

46. We also consider that the commemoration of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations could provide a valuable opportunity for reaffirmation by the international community of the goals and objectives of international economic co-operation and for strengthening the multilateral economic system. You were kind enough, Sir, to remind us a few moments ago again of one of the basic principles expressed in the opening words of the Charter. We hope and believe that the participation of an impressive number of heads of State or Government will prove a propitious occasion for individually and collectively providing the political impetus for a renewed dialogue between the developed and the developing countries.

47. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the representative of Luxembourg, who will speak on behalf of the States members of the European Community.

48. Mr. PHILIPPE (Luxembourg) (interpretation from French): The European Community and its member countries, on whose behalf it is my honour to speak, have on many occasions in the past indicated the reasons why they continue to participate actively and, we believe constructively in the various bodies in which the North-South dialogue is taking place. We are more than ever convinced that the growing interdependence of economies makes it all the more important to narrow the differences between the views of the interested parties, in terms of both the objectives of the dialogue and the identification of ways and means. It is in that spirit that we will persist in our efforts to bring about a greater convergence of views on a basis that makes it possible to achieve negotiated agreements at the various levels of international co-operation.

49. The European Community and its member States consider the objective of launching global negotiations in the light of that overall concept of the North-South dialogue.

50. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, who will speak on behalf of the Eastern European States.

51. Mr. OUDOVENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) (interpretation from Russian): The delegations of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, the People's Republic of Bulgaria, the Hungarian People's Republic, the German Democratic Republic, the Mongolian People's Republic, the Polish People's Republic, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic wish to state that the socialist countries supported General Assembly resolution 34/138, on the question of global negotiations relating to international economic co-operation for development and continue to support the early implementation of that resolution. That position has been repeatedly confirmed at the highest Party, State and governmental levels of our countries in documents of the Warsaw Treaty and the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance.

52. The Declaration on the Preservation of Peace and International Economic Co-operation adopted on 14 June 1984 at the high-level Economic Conference of the member countries of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance held in Moscow states:

> "The participants in the Conference reaffirm the need to expand the role of the United Nations and its organizations as important forums for harnessing the efforts of States in order to strengthen peace and international security and help to solve urgent world problems. To achieve that end, the member countries of CMEA are prepared to continue to participate actively in their work. They favour the earliest possible start of global negotiations within the United Nations on the most important international economic problems in accordance with the decisions of the Organization, with the participation of all States and with regard for their legitimate interests." [See A/39/323, annex II.]

53. On the basis of this position of principle, the socialist States on whose behalf I am speaking wish to express their high appreciation of the efforts by you, Sir, in order to accelerate the beginning of global negotiations as provided for in General Assembly resolution 34/138. We agree with your proposal to refer the question of global negotiations for inclusion on the agenda of the fortieth session of the General Assembly. The delegations of the socialist countries wish to express the hope that discussion of this question at the fortieth anniversary session of the General Assembly will make it possible to break the cycle of procedural debate and to embark on the actual work of preparing for global negotiations, in the interests of equitable economic co-operation and the carrying out of United Nations decisions on the restructuring of international economic relations and the establishment of a new international economic order.

54. Mr. WANG Baoliu (China) (interpretation from Chinese): Mr. President, first of all I wish to express our appreciation to you for your efforts during the past year on this item. Since the adoption of resolution 34/138 by the General Assembly on the basis of consensus, six years have passed. In spite of the positive and constructive efforts made by the Group of 77 and a number of delegations, the launching of global negotiations has been delayed year after year. Consultations conducted since April this year have not yielded any concrete result. People cannot but feel regret.

55. In recent years, the structural flaws of the world economy and the harm they have done to the economies of the developing countries have increasingly demonstrated the need to conduct global negotiations so as to deal comprehensively with the global economic issues, to establish a new system of international economic relations and to revitalize the world economy, in particular the economies of the developing countries.

56. Therefore it is correct for you to remind all Member States of the continuing validity of the concept of the commitment by the General Assembly to global negotiations as embodied in resolution 34/138. Although our path may be arduous and difficult, we should not give up our efforts to seek ways and means to launch global negotiations. We support your proposal to include this item in the draft agenda of the fortieth session of the General Assembly.

57. China will continue to participate actively in the work on this item. It is our hope that all sides will make further efforts and strengthen international economic co-operation for development. In particular, the parties concerned should give serious consideration to the reality of increasing the interrelatedness of the economies of various countries and to the overall interest of the international community and adopt a flexible and constructive attitude so as to facilitate an early agreement on the launching of global negotiations.

58. Mr. IMMERMAN (United States of America): Mr. President, the United States delegation would like to thank you for your efforts in this area. The Government of the United States, together with a great many others represented here, has devoted a considerable amount of time and effort attempting to achieve agreement on the matter subsumed under agenda item 38. We will maintain our constructive and co-operative interest in this item and we will continue to play a full and active role in this process.

AGENDA ITEM 41

Observance of the quincentenary of the discovery of America (concluded)*

59. The PRESIDENT: In connection with this item, representatives will recall that on 21 September 1984 the Assembly decided to include this item in the agenda of the thirty-ninth session [3rd meeting]. May I take it that it is now the Assembly's wish to defer its consideration and to include this item in the draft agenda of the fortieth session?

It was so decided (decision 39/463).

AGENDA ITEM 42

Question of Cyprus: report of the Secretary-General (concluded)*

60. The PRESIDENT: Members will recall that on 21 September 1984 the Assembly decided to include this item in the agenda of the present session [3rd meeting], but deferred a decision on the allocation of the item to an appropriate time in the future. It is my understanding that it would be desirable to defer consideration of this item to the fortieth session of the General Assembly. May I take it that it is the wish of the Assembly to defer consideration of the item and to include it in the draft agenda of the fortieth session?

It was so decided (decision 39/464).

AGENDA ITEM 43

Implementation of the resolutions of the United Nations (concluded)*

61. The PRESIDENT: In connection with this item, I have received a letter from the representative of Cyprus requesting that the item be included in the draft agenda of the fortieth session. If I hear no objection, I shall take it that it is the wish of the General Assembly to include the item in the draft agenda of the fortieth session?

It was so decided (decision 39/465).

AGENDA ITEM 44

Consequences of the prolongation of the armed conflict between Iran and Iraq (concluded)*

62. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly decided on 21 September 1984 [3rd meeting] to include this item in the agenda of the thirty-ninth session. It is my understanding that it would be desirable to defer consideration of this item to the fortieth session of the General Assembly. May I take it that it is the wish of the Assembly to defer consideration of the item and to include it in the draft agenda of the fortieth session?

It was so decided (decision 39/466).

AGENDA ITEM 140

Celebration of the one-hundred-and-fiftieth anniversary of the emancipation of slaves in the British Empire (concluded)*

63. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly decided on 21 September 1984 [3rd meeting] to include this item in the agenda of the thirty-ninth session. May I take it that it is now the wish of the Assembly to defer consideration of the item and to include it in the draft agenda of the fortieth session?

It was so decided (decision 39/467).

Statement by the President

64. The PRESIDENT: Nine months ago, when we suspended the work of the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly [105th meeting], I pointed out that at that stage each one of us in this Hall would assess the work of the session on the basis of our respective national policies and perceptions of the Organization, as well as from the perspective of successes and failures.

65. Today as we formally conclude our work and as we make our final assessment or stock-taking, I should like to suggest once again that the correct yardstick of any objective evaluation should be based on the Charter of the United Nations, and that we ask ourselves whether the thirty-ninth session has achieved any of the hopes and aspirations of the peoples of the world, which, after all, we represent.

---

66. When we consider the number of items on our agenda—143 in all—when we consider the magnitude and complexity of the problems which confront us at all levels, and judging from the international climate in the past 21 months, I strongly believe that the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly did advance the cause of international peace—and here I mean all aspects of peace.

67. Some of the problems with which we had to deal with were deep-rooted. Many of them had even preceded the founding of the United Nations. Others were complicated and aggravated, not so much by the so-called acrimonious debates, if any, within these walls, but perhaps more so by human and natural forces external to the Organization—forces such as narrow nationalism, misguided policies, political intransigence, delaying tactics, short-sightedness, honest mistakes and, I should add, the vagaries of the weather—that is, floods, hurricanes and drought. Allow me to mention that much of what is painstakingly accomplished within the walls of this building is often undone or destroyed outside the Organization.

68. What others may describe as the failures of this session of the General Assembly should, in my view, be regarded as unfinished business. The pursuit of peace—peace at home and peace in the world—is an ongoing process. Despite the obstacles and despite the disappointments, we cannot abandon the pursuit of peace.

69. In view of the importance which previous sessions attached to it, and based on my own conviction that economic self-sufficiency is one of the most effective instruments for achieving the goals and objectives of the Charter, I was particularly interested in the agenda item entitled "Launching of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development". Unfortunately, we have not yet been able to reach the stage where we can say with confidence that those negotiations will be launched on a specific date.

70. Granted that the Assembly did not solve the serious debt and foreign exchange problems which are crippling the economies of a large number of States represented here; granted that the threat of nuclear weapons still hangs ominously over mankind; granted that the inhuman policy of apartheid—a subject which has been on the agenda of the United Nations for over three decades—has not been eliminated; granted that the questions of Palestine, Namibia, Kampuchea and the Middle East, and the situations in Afghanistan and Central America, and others, were not completely resolved during this session; and granted that many of the resolutions and recommendations which were adopted by the thirty-ninth session of the Assembly appear to have fallen on partially deaf ears, we should at the same time realize that the Assembly did provide a meeting place for friend and foe alike. In the midst of what some may describe as rhetoric, there were genuine words of commitment and hope. We have already seen some positive results from our deliberations and from the political atmosphere which the thirty-ninth session created.

71. The seeds of co-operation and consensus which we planted on 3 December 1984 have already borne fruit. I refer to the adoption of a comprehensive Declaration on the Critical Economic Situation in Africa [resolution 39/29, annex]. Directly and indirectly, the Declaration and the spirit behind it have already saved the lives of millions of our fellow human beings. Here I should like to state that the efforts of the Secretary-General, through the United Nations Office for Emergency Operations in Africa, and all other United Nations agencies and those of individual Governments and non-governmental organizations—including those in the entertainment field—deserve our deep appreciation. Unfortunately, thousands of our brothers and sisters did not benefit from these efforts. Assistance came too late. Their world did not heed in time the signals of alarm—and, by the way, the alarm is still on.

72. I wish to mention further that, as a result of our deliberations, the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women did take place, to the surprise of sceptics who had predicted its doom. As a result of perseverance over the years, and the spirit of accommodation which prevailed in many areas during the session, we were able to complete a new symbol of comfort and protection for the victims of torture and other cruel and degrading treatment or punishment.

73. The Secretary-General's profound and timely statement at the present session, on 12 December 1984 [97th meeting, paras. 292 to 307] on the question of disarmament complemented the record number of resolutions which the Assembly adopted on that subject. At least the session placed all aspects of the arms race and the threat posed by nuclear weapons in their true perspective. The new dimensions of the nuclear age were analysed. The Assembly, through its candid debate, set an example in international behaviour—an example which underlines the view that channels of communication should be constantly kept open if we are to move forward in the area of disarmament. We are therefore encouraged by the prospects for high-level dialogue on arms control between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

74. I still maintain the position which I advanced last December that, in spite of its unresolved and unfinished business, the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly has fulfilled some of the hopes and aspirations of the peoples of the world. As I mentioned earlier, we have already seen some of the results of the work of the session; it is my earnest hope that others will be forthcoming. It will obviously take some time for some of the seedlings which we have planted to grow and bear fruit. They will need attention, care and nurturing.

75. This is the end of an Assembly session; it is also the beginning of the next step ahead on the long and often hazardous road towards the ultimate goal of universal peace. If we do not get there, we should at least be able to say that we have tried and that along the way we made the world a better place—better than we had found it.

76. Finally, I take this opportunity to express once again my sincere thanks to delegations, to the Secretary-General, to the Bureau, to the Chairmen of the regional groups, to the Under-Secretary-General for Political and General Assembly Affairs and to other members of the Secretariat for their co-operation and assistance, without which I would have found it extremely difficult to preside over the Assembly. I should also like to express my appreciation to the representatives of non-governmental organizations and members of the media, who in their own way have contributed to the work of the session.

AGENDA ITEM 2

Minute of silent prayer or meditation

77. The PRESIDENT: We are now coming to the end of the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly. I invite representatives to stand and observe one minute of silent prayer or meditation.

The members of the Assembly observed a minute of silence.

Closure of the session

78. The PRESIDENT: I declare closed the thirty-ninth session of the General Assembly.

The meeting rose at 4.35 p.m.
